That being your oath, you men should demand government by law and oppose government by and through bureaucracy. Keep alive and vigorous our risk capitalistic system—the incentive to produce and buy and sell in competitive, free markets, which makes possible the tax milk to support government. Kill it and government becomes your employer. Then human ambitions become stultified and retard the future. Then administrative bureaucracy pulls the strings and we bounce like puppets in a Punch and Judy show—those who pull the strings are hidden behind the curtain. Then proud and strong men become cringing beggars. Then and only then they destroy the incentive to produce. We, the people, become employees of the state. Then and only then, we in America will have a dictator. Some one man's tongue becomes the law. God forbid that day shall ever come—when as General Eisenhower states: "One thing we must fear—the decay of our freedom through our own neglect. * * * By every step we take toward making the state the caretaker of our lives, by that much we move toward making the state our master."

I am only an amateur. I do not presume to be an expert economist, political scientist, or attorney at law. I don't profess to know it all. I am certainly not a writer. I am just a businessman; but my thoughts and heart are more wrapped up in America than in business in these times. That is why I feel impelled to say to you, "There must be others in America who think and feel as I do and want to do what I am doing here. Speak up without fear of reprisal. Do the best you can with your thoughts. Become articulate." They say silence is golden. Today silence is cowardly and suicidal. And that's all there is to it.

Our National Leadership Is Weak and Uncertain

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS A. JENKINS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 14, 1950

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, there has come to my desk an article the author of which I do not know. This article is pointed and well-written. While I do not approve of every sentence in this article, I do approve of most of it, and I think it would be interesting to the readers of the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The article is as follows:

THE FUTURE DIMLY SEEN

The dismay in America is historic today. We can go to few dates in our history which compare with it. We have a feeling that we have created the present crisis by abject blunders, by neglect of normal prudence. Our leaders have not been tough enough. They have not looked at our ultimate and possibly final enemy with clear, masculine eyes.

Someone, some group, will pay. It is the way of the world to seek retribution. This, despite the fact that the Russians have telegraphed their intentions since 1917. World conquest was on their agenda more than 30 years ago, and still is. The enemy has builded strongly for a bid toward the world domination he seeks. The hour is approaching—12 o'clock is near in our chronicles—when the great test will be made. It will probably come sooner than later. The American people know this. They are years ahead of their Government. They are at the ground level, and their bitterness is growing.

No solitary blame can attach itself to Mr. Truman, as President, but the leftish liberals and the clever intelligensia will soon suffer. The disaster in Korea will transform itself into more strength—and a profound reassessment of American values. America will return to the ways of strong men and women either in a victory over Russia in the field, or in the underground after defeat.

We can lose world war III. As a matter of fact, we are probably in a far more perilous position with the unified despotism of China spreading over Asia and the Pacific. Russia can turn the 450,000,000 Chinese into a scourge worse than the Huns, and probably cannot stop them once they are started.

America will return to Spartan times, either before victory or after defeat. The future holds little in store for present values, for the loose moral tone and the license permitted in the name of liberty. Character and not cleverness must finally prevail.

The solemn duty that we have nowadays to have fun, to be constantly entertained, to select good fellows instead of good men for high places, will be replaced by the necessity for fortitude. Duty, that short and forgotten word, will return to common usage.

We can trace the skein of ease and softness through almost every facet of American life to illustrate the path we have trod and the reliance needed. But let us turn to the military, for that is destined to be our chief preoccupation for a long time to come.

We all knew, or have been told, ever since Russia said she was going on the warpath, that the traditional foot-soldier, or infantryman, would be the final deciding factor in a world struggle. Infantry is the queen of battles. Our graduates of West Point know this, and have told us about it since the First World War.

So we have neglected our infantry. We have decorated regiments, divisions, with glittering histories. Where are they now? On paper, with the flags stacked in closets with their battle streamers shrouded. The American public, in some queer manner, has the notion that the No. 1 Clever Boy is the one who is exempted, and does not have to get into uniform. The No. 2 Clever Boy is the lad who makes a quick commission in the Navy or Air Force. He makes sure of his comfort, not through any individual precociousness, but because he gets credit at home for being smarter than the lad who gets drafted into the line outfits.

Foreign troops who have faced our men say that the shock of battle, which has long been concealed from our boys, is the worst thing that Americans first have to contend with. They never were told how tough they had to be. But they got tough, and brought home the wisdom of battle. Then the Army junked the infantry by not standing up strong enough for the one final weapon. The atomic bomb, as anyone knows, is a weapon against civilians.

Trace the decline of the infantry, of soldierly Americans, and you trace the slackness and neglect which has gotten us into the fix that we are in today. The country which holds its first line of defense in contempt naturally becomes a prey. Let's face it.

The Casualties Are 90 to 1 and Present Foreign Policy Is Suicidal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDGAR A. JONAS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 14, 1950

Mr. JONAS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I desire to include a most enlightening and informative article which appeared in the Chicago Tribune on December 15, 1950, entitled "Balance Sheet of United States Aid and Help Given to Us in Korea."

The article states that James P. Kennedy, former United States Ambassador to Britain, submitted facts and figures to his audience when he addressed the University of Virginia Law School Forum. Kennedy is quoted as urging the United States to pull its armies out of Europe and Asia and build up its defenses in this hemisphere. Kennedy said:

Our present foreign policy is suicidal, and we have suffered 90 times the number of casualties that other nations have suffered in Korea.

The article as published in the Chicago Daily Tribune follows:

BALANCE SHEET OF UNITED STATES AID AND HELP GIVEN US IN KOREA

CHARLOTTESVILLE, VA., December 12.—Former Ambassador Joseph P. Kennedy today offered the following "balance sheet" of aid given by the United States to other countries and the aid they are giving the United States in the Korean War:

UNITED KINGDOM

Aid given in Korea: No troops, 1 field ambulance unit, 400,000 jute bags under negotiation.

Address of Hon. William M. Boyle, Jr.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD BOLLING

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 14, 1950

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following address by the Honorable William M. Boyle, Jr., chairman of the Democratic National Committee dinner, Waldorf-Astoria, New York City, December 12, 1950:

We are meeting tonight at a serious and solemn hour. At this moment our Armed Forces with the forces of other countries of the United Nations are fighting heroically.

Because the security of our Nation is at stake we do not meet solely as partisan members of a political party. Instead we gather together as Americans to join hands with all other Americans to pray, to work, to fight for the security of our country.

Your meeting in this spirit of patriotism and unity is a tribute to the leader of the Democratic Party, our great President, Harry S. Truman.

He has the courage, determination, and the will to confront the dangerous forces that would seek to destroy us. I know that all patriotic Americans, regardless of political affiliations, will join together to cooperate with him.

The Congress and the President need continuous and outspoken support from all loyal Americans for the steps which must be taken.

The danger to our security has been growing increasingly clear as the enemies of freedom drive relentlessly on.

Thus we gather, not to celebrate, not to achieve political aims, not as representatives of any partisan group, but as Americans who are concerned about the problems which confront our Nation and the world.

I know the feelings with which thousands of families, in every part of the country, have waited for news of their loved ones. They have been fighting to win for us the right to live in security and peace.

I, too, know these feelings.

We must all be worthy of the sacrifices that are being made for us. We are worthy when we stick to our jobs. We are worthy when our farmers, working men and women, in fact every citizen, puts in the productive energy which has made the United States the greatest nation in history.

Today, civilization wavers between a better life than we have ever known, or a world of total slavery. As we stand at this crossroad let us realize that the battle for the survival of democracy will not of itself be resolved. This struggle for the world now being waged is a contest to the finish, because the triumph of brutal aggression would spell the doom of freedom.

In this battle for life let's look up with confidence to what we have and to our capacity for engineering the triumph of good over evil.

Not many decades back the founders of this Nation reached above the rule of tyranny and with divine guidance brought down a segment of that power from above—and gave to man the power to rule himself.

They gave vitality to the thoughts of philosophers and statesmen. They launched democracy by instituting a government which derived its right from the consent of the governed. In so doing we recognized that man—the individual man—was first, and that the state existed but to protect his rights. We openly acknowledged that man was greater than the state, because the state has no immortal soul.

This is the hour in which we proudly point to our heritage as Americans. Those who pioneered this great Nation were ready and willing to make any sacrifice for the good of the Nation and its people. In the same way we in our generation must meet whatever demands are made upon us for the sake of our country.

No sacrifice will be too great for patriotic citizens to make for the security of the Nation. When the security of this Nation is at stake there is no time for partisan politics.

Patriotism must come before politics and before profits.

The hour has passed when men may think in terms of pettiness. Selfishness, envy, and greed must not be a part of the thinking of mankind if we are to save America, preserve our freedom, and give hope to a staggering world.

Now, more than at any time in the past, the need is for steady nerves, for resolute purpose, for calmness of judgment, and firmness of action. Above all, we need a single-minded unity in our determination to preserve our national integrity and our way of life against any attack.

Certainly we must refuse to listen now to the shrill voices of discontent and disuntiy. Those individuals who seek to sow distrust and to divide us should feel the full weight of public condemnation.

I can no longer refrain from plain speaking about the small group whose words are aimed to divide our country in time of peril. I believe the people of this country will rise up in wrath against these narrow selfish men who put partisan advantage ahead of the safety of their country.

While politics in a partisan sense is out, politics in the highest meaning of patriotism and service to mankind should be continued and advanced.

The Democratic Party will hold intact the progress we have made for the benefit of the farmers, workers, business and professional men, and women and for all the people of this country.

The Democratic Party will continue to be the party of the people, as it has been since the days of Thomas Jefferson, and as it has advanced under the stirring leadership of Woodrow Wilson, Franklin Roosevelt, and Harry Truman. But, in so doing, the Democratic Party will cooperate with all Americans for the good of the country.

Let no one outside of the United States be misled by the clamor of our election campaigns into thinking that Americans are so divided that they cannot unite for the security of our Nation.

When the votes are counted, both sides, Democrats and Republicans, take their gains and losses in accordance with the will of the majority of the people.

Totalitarian dictators, who make a farce of elections by forcing their subjected people to vote as they are told, find it difficult to understand how free people may vote against a man and yet, when he is elected, support him. These dictators miss the whole point of democracy. They underestimate the hidden wells of strength that feed life and courage to our people.

I believe each of our two great parties has an important part to play in maintaining our free way of life in these times.

That is why I intend to stick to my job as chairman of the Democratic National Committee.

I intend to do the best I can to help make sure that democracy works at home while the free world looks to the United States to help bring victory and peace.

The fundamental issue of the moment—the fight between freedom and Communist slavery—is part of the continuous progress in the government of men. In this fight our country, by the grace of God, stands a free, prosperous, and strong nation.

This is an hour in which men with firm convictions renew their belief in the democratic way of life—indeed, in the faith in Almighty God. The faith of our fathers must be found in our hearts, in our minds and souls, as we stand steadfast today in support of our leaders.

As America has no desire for 1 inch of territory, as we fight to preserve the decency of mankind and the freedom of the world, so we who are a part of the Democratic Party have no desire for partisan political advantage as we join hands with loyal Republicans to give America its greatest strength.

If we will stand as loyal Americans we can survive the terrific ordeal which faces us. And, when the clouds of the crisis have cleared away, we will continue to have the right and privilege of perpetuating a government which will be the servant of the people. That is made possible by our traditional two-party system.

We realize that no nation ever had greater responsibility for the future of the world. American democracy is the hope of the world. If the light of freedom were to be extinguished here, future generations would know only slavery. Accordingly, as the responsibility of world leadership is ours, let us, Americans, all Americans, go forward with unity of purpose.

Let us not leave to the future a task which we ourseves must face. If we are to accomplish this end it cannot be done by mere feeble words or petty bickering. It cannot be won by indifference. It cannot be achieved by delegating the task to someone else.

It can only be gained by constant, positive, individual action on the part of each of us, working together.

Without this approach we struggle in vain, because the strength of policy, the power of government itself, is only as strong or as weak as you and I make it.

This year is the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the election of Thomas Jefferson as President of the United States. As Democrats we can take justifiable pride in the fact that he founded the Democratic Party. We can take pride in keeping our party strong and vigorous. We can be proud of the Democratic program for the benefit of all the people of America.

America will win through this period of danger. I pray God that the day will soon come when the blessings of peace and prosperity will be made secure to every person in this land, and when the bountiful production of all the great industries of the world will be fully available for the peaceful advancement of mankind instead of for destruction.

These are our objectives. I ask all Americans to join with us tonight in the spirit of the words of Thomas Jefferson: "Let us unite with one heart and one mind."

Unemployment Situation in Connecticut

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANTONI N. SADLAK

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 14, 1950

Mr. SADLAK. Mr. Speaker, many of my colleagues have been asking about the unemployment situation in Connecticut. I am, therefore, including the latest report from the Employment Security Division of the Department of Labor of the State of Connecticut. The release follows:

STATE OF CONNECTICUT, DEPARTMENT OF LABOR, EMPLOYMENT SECURITY DIVISION

JOBLESS CLAIMANTS SHOW LITTLE CHANGE AT 13,241

The number of jobless claimants for unemployment benefits in Connecticut rose slightly for the second consecutive week. The number applying for benefits was 13,241 for the week ended December 9 compared to 13,141 during the previous week.

Women claimants numbered 7,452 or 56 percent of the total.

A year ago there were 41,068 claimants of whom 36 percent were women.

INITIAL CLAIMS RISE

Initial claims, which start a new period of unemployment, rose to 2,771 from 2,395 the previous week.

A year ago there were 6,227 initial claims.

BRIDGEPORT HIGHEST NUMBER

Bridgeport still led the State in the number of claims with 2,556 followed by New Haven 1,747 and Hartford 1,368.

LAY-OFFS AND HIRINGS

Lay-offs were reported in the following industries: Garment 50 seasonal and 177 partials, textile 115 and 25 were for lack of material and 25 week on week off, electrical 20 and 25 lack of material and 60 partials for lack of material, building supply 41 lack of material and 55 renovation of plant, and plastics 20 lack of material. There were 75 scattered lay-offs.

General hirings were reported by various plants throughout the State.

BY AREA

The Ansonia area reported a lay-off of 27 on a part-time basis.

In the Bridgeport area, an electrical firm laid off 20 and a garment company put 150 on a part-time schedule. Seventy-five people were affected by scattered lay-offs.

In Manchester a textile plant laid off 25.

In the Meriden area, an electrical manufacturer laid off 25.

A textile printing company in Middletown laid off 110 for lack of orders.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

The New Britain office reported that an electrical firm placed 60 on a part-time basis for lack of material.

In New Haven a building-supply company laid off 41 for lack of material.

The New London area had a lay-off of 55 while a building-supply plant was renovated.

A Norwalk garment manufacturer reported a seasonal lay-off of 50 and an auto accessories firm rehired 20.

In the Waterbury area, a plastic company laid off 20 for lack of materials. A textile plant started a week-on-week-off schedule which will affect about 25.

Self-Respect or Appeasement

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS H. BURKE
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 14, 1950

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following newspaper article:

SELF-RESPECT OR APPEASEMENT

The events of this week and the next in Washington can very likely shape the lives and deaths of all of us. The safest thing for an editor to do is ignore the whole thing. If he writes at all, he should probably do the smart thing and talk big, tough, loud, and patriotic. If he comes out for appeasement, he is going to be a very unpopular guy.

Since I can't play it safe, however, and don't feel like playing it smart, I am probably going to be unpopular.

The question in Korea boils down to this: Do we get out of Korea, losing pride, prestige, and self-respect, or do we begin world war III now?

Of course, it's easy to be a big-shot hero behind a desk in Oak Harbor, Ohio, beat my chest publicly and roar: Appeasement, never. We'll hold the line: We'll fight to the finish before we give in to the Commies. We've never been licked and we're not going to be now. I could spout all that hoopla and probably get credit for being a real 100 percenter.

It's easy to talk big in Oak Harbor, to tell everybody publicly what we are going to do and what we should do and that we aren't going to take anything from anybody. The only thing is: Who is we? The big talkers here aren't the ones who are being wiped out in Korea. The bullets aren't flying around here. The ones who cry for a last stand, a fight to the finish and all that aren't the ones who are out there now in the process of making that stand. Talk is cheap when you don't have to carry a gun to back it up.

So, for this reason, I don't chose to talk big about what we should do.

I think, maybe right now, it's better to look at the situation from the standpoint of what we can do.

Let's take the side of the drum thumpers and flag wavers, for a minute. Let's say we refuse to accede to possible Chinese terms of backing down to the thirty-eighth parallel and maybe clearing out of Korea completely. Let's say we tell the Chinese where to head in and start world war III rolling.

In the first place, what forces we and other UN countries have in Korea at the present time will take an unbelieveably savage beating; while they will probably not be wiped out completely, losses will be so staggering as to shock this Nation and the world at large. This isn't my theory on it: It's what the military experts around the UN halls believe.

That's the first thing that will happen. The next thing is this: We will go to war with China—and Russia—in a state of woeful unpreparedness. Our draft machinery has not turned out enough trained men to throw into the framework of total war. A large part of our Navy is still in mothballs. Our industry is far from geared to a level of wartime production. We will go to war at a time when our pants are practically off and those of our enemy are pretty well anchored around the hips.

What is more, we will be at war without much popular support from the rest of the world's nations. So we have a stockpile of atomic bombs? So where de we drop them in Korea to be effective? Where in China? Korea has no large cities of a size to warrant dropping a bomb for strategic purposes. China has large coastal cities. But once the bombs are dropped and the cities wasted, the people can move inward and fight on. And in China the people are used to living on the march, living off the land, living hard and fighting back. During World War II, the Chinese Communist armies furnished the bulk of resistance to Japan's armies in China. And through a brand of guerrilla fighting that military experts consider about the best in the world, they wasted, immobilized, and rendered important the armed might of Japan in China.

China is huge, nearly as huge as Russia. Together they form a land mass almost impossible to defeat in a military sense. The land itself is large enough to absorb and snuff out invading armies. And as the attackers' supply lines grow longer and longer, Chinese lines grow shorter, more concentrated. Their striking power grows in intensity as they retreat into the land and wage guerrilla warfare.

And if we use the bomb, except as a last resort, we can't kid ourselves about it. The rest of the world will not be for us. We'll be alone. We'll stand condemned by the world today and by history forever.

That's the picture, objectively, as it will more than likely be if we move for war today rather than appeasement.

I don't like that word, "appeasement." Since Munich it has had a rotten sound. I don't know of anyone else who likes it either. Still, we're faced with it, or with its alternative, total war now, today.

That's why, despite my dislike of the word and what it stands for I find myself in favor of appeasement. I could disguise it under pleasanter titles. But a spade is a spade.

If world war III is inevitable—and I don't completely believe that it is—then let's go into it geared and ready for it. The price of appeasing China is time. All right, let's pay the price.

By paying it, we save the remnants of our own Armed Forces now being slaughtered in Korea. Knowing what is coming, we can begin to prepare for it. We can swing into wartime production, move into a wartime economy, we can step up the draft quotas, begin training men, civilians, cities and counties in the practice of bombing and atomic defense. We can get ourselves ready for the inevitable so that when the hour comes, we'll know what to do, how to behave, how, when the show-down comes, to win.

That's the essential thing. To win when it is necessary.

The British have a nice saying about this sort of thing. England has lost many battles, they say. But they've always won the last one. And that's what we've got to do.

When the show-down comes, the last battle, the big one, we've got to be ready to win it.

Even at the cost of appeasement today.

Address of Arthur V. Burrowes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PHIL J. WELCH
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 14, 1950

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting a speech made by Arthur V. Burrowes, editor of the St. Joseph News-Press, before the Sedalia, Mo., Business and Professional Women's Club, on December 7:

Call me the devil's advocate if you will. But I am offering a defense, if one be needed, of that much maligned, much slandered, much berated, but to my mind very capable, efficient, and profoundly patriotic, Department of State as headed by the Honorable Dean Acheson.

Department of State is one of the four original cabinet departments of this country, the others being Treasury, War, and Justice. The first three are officially governed by Secretaries, the fourth by the Attorney General of the United States. The Navy Department did not come until 10 years later. War and Navy are now subordinate sections of the Department of Defense. Our original Post Office Department was a subsidiary of the Treasury Department, and did not rate a Cabinet member until 1829 in the administration of Andrew Jackson.

Department of State from its infancy held sacred the revered traditions and through the years has kept the faith and fought the good fight. When State was created our heritage had been the early covenants of freemen, the tiny seeds at Jamestown and at Plymouth. Our heritage had been the despairing winter at Valley Forge—blackest of all our history, excepting perhaps alone that day of infamy spoken of by Franklin Delano Roosevelt—that day we commemorate today, the 7th day of December of the year of our Lord 1941.

Our heritage has been the glory of Yorktown and of a gallant ally, not a democracy, mind you, such as we speak of today when we denounce despotism and dictatorship. Except for that gallant ally, America might not have won her independence. And who was that ally? It was reactionary Bourbon France, so decadent that less than a decade after the treaty giving us our independence, and less than 40 months after our Constitution was adopted, that Bourbon King and his pretty queen were guillotined and the Red Terror overcame poor France, to remain until there arose the man on horseback, the Little Corporal, the Corsican, Napoleon Bonaparte.

Our first Secretary of State, named by President Washington, was Thomas Jefferson. Mr. Jefferson, as he is affectionately called to this day in Taylor County, Va., was to become President and buy from that same Napoleon the vast territory out of which has been carved the sovereign State in which we reside.

It is significant how many of our first Cabinet members, our premiers, our Secretaries of State were destined to become President. Jefferson was Washington's. Madison was Jefferson's. Monroe was Madison's. John Quincy Adams was Monroe's (and it was he who drafted the historic document that bears the name of his chief—the Monroe doctrine). Van Buren was Jackson's. Buchanan was Polk's Secretary of State.

Even more significant is the roster of mental giants who were Secretaries of State and towered above their chiefs. The first Adams had for his Secretary of State John Marshall, later to be Chief Justice of the United States for 35 years. 'Twas the monumental John Marshall who defined the Constitution, who made it a living, breathing thing, who made it the bulwark of our present Government. Well might Old Liberty have cracked tolling his demise, for with his death there passed almost the last of the great American Constitution builders, Benjamin Franklin, George Washington, John Adams, Alexander Hamilton, and Thomas Jefferson. Two yet survived, he who was to be the great expounder of that same Constitution, Daniel Webster, and then the savior of the Constitution and the savior of the Union, our first martyr President, Mr. Lincoln.

I have mentioned the significance of the giants who have been Secretary of State and who did not attain the Presidency. In some instances their names are still household words but only the student can recall their contemporaneous Presidents. Of course we know that Henry Clay was premier to J. Q. Adams. Who can name the President Daniel Webster served? Or John C. Calhoun? Or James G. Blaine? Or John Sherman, brother of the famed Civil War general? Or Richard Olney? Or John Hay? Or Elihu Root?

It is amazing to ponder how many Secretaries of State we have had who would make, or had the background to make, excellent Presidents. Edmund Randolph, second Secretary, immediately succeeding Mr. Jefferson, was brilliant, almost a genius. So was Edward Livingston, who served Jackson. So was Edward Everett who served Fillmore. So was Seward, Lincoln's chief rival for the Republican nomination in 1860. Mr. Lincoln wisely named Seward premier.

It has been my privilege to know the last six Secretaries of State and I might say parenthetically when I make my annual pilgrimage to Washington, I get more from the State Department than from the White House. These Secretaries, the last six, have been Henry L. Stimson, Cordell Hull, Edward R. Stettinius, James F. Byrnes, George C. Marshall, and the incumbent the Honorable Dean Acheson.

At the risk of starting a controversy I want to say I consider Dean Acheson an abler international diplomat, a more profound thinker in foreign policy than any of the other men I have met and heard in Washington—Stimson, Hull, Byrnes, Stettinius, and Marshall. Probably closest to Mr. Acheson in mental prowess I consider the former Under Secretary, Mr. Sumner Welles, who served so ably in the administration of Mr. Roosevelt.

Dean Acheson is a product of Yale and Harvard. Not that I consider this an open sesame. But I have talked with classmates of his from both institutions—Mr. Acheson is 9 months older than I. Mr. Acheson was Under Secretary of the Treasury in the FDR honeymoon, being named 2 months after Mr. Roosevelt was inaugurated. He previously had been private secretary to Louis Brandeis, one of the all-time noblemen of the United States Supreme Court. But Mr. Acheson stayed only a few months in Government, resigning before 1933 was run out. Friends have told me that he could not see eye to eye with the administration on its fiscal, its financial policy.

Anyway, Mr. Roosevelt, though differing radically from Mr. Acheson, kept his eye on him and brought him back as Assistant Secretary under Hull, then as Under Secretary under Mr. Hull's successors.

It has been my pleasure to meet and hear Mr. Acheson on a number of occasions. Last April after listening for 2 hours to Senator JOSEPH MCCARTHY, of Wisconsin, bitterly assail the State Department and especially Mr. Acheson, I 2 nights later heard Mr. Acheson both on the record for an hour and off the record for more than an hour. My faith in Mr. Acheson has never been shaken.

I think at this critical time in the international affairs of this Nation, this free people of 165 and more years, that it would be an international tragedy—and it could happen—for the President to remove his Secretary of State.

Some day the world will know Dean Acheson for what I consider him to be—a great diplomat.

Keep in mind this: The Secretary of State does not lay down international policy. One man and one man alone, neither a Cabinet officer nor Houses of Congress, has that right. Our international policy is the mandate, if you please, of the President of the United States.

I am not here to defend either Mr. Truman or his predecessor. Only now are we beginning to understand the international policies of Cleveland, of McKinley, and of the first Roosevelt. We are too close to the Wilsonian era to appraise justly and judiciously the merits of our international policy that was coincident to if not partly responsible for leading us into World War I. Certainly this soon after we cannot begin to say that the long planning of lend-lease, of our policy toward Japan were always right. We do know that Mr. Truman inherited a highly explosive diplomatic package. But we will be in our graves long before the historian will say he has handled it for weal or woe.

I do say and hope you will agree with me that nothing would please the Kremlin more this very week than for Mr. Truman to discharge Dean Acheson and in effect repudiate, not what Mr. Acheson has initiated or inaugurated, but what he has merely carried out as the wish of a chief.

Sumner Welles once told us editors at a briefing at State in Washington that always a Nation's foreign policy is based on the utter, the extreme, the complete selfishness of that nation. This is true of every nation in the world, and it is true of America today, was true in every one of our 165 years of freedom.

What is our foreign policy? We are an independent Nation and want to stay so. We attach highest importance to individual freedom and intend to keep ours.

We are a peaceful people and intend to get rid of wars and war threats.

We have the highest standard of living in the world today, and we want to raise that so that everyone in the most backward state will have a chance to earn a decent secure living.

We are a friendly people. We have no traditional enemies. We want no war. We want to be at peace with all nations—and that includes Russia.

It is the job of the Government to promote these national interests. That is as clean-cut as it was the job of Mr. Jefferson to buy the Territory of Louisiana, for thereby we eliminated fear of France or Spain. It is the job of Government as it was the job of Secretary Seward to buy Alaska to get it away from Russia. It is the job of Government as it was John Hay's to promote the Open Door to the Far East under William McKinley. It is the job of Government as it was that of Charles Evans Hughes to conduct the disarmament conference, futile as that gesture yet turned out to be. It is the job of Government as it was that of Henry L. Stimson in the Hoover administration to demand sanctions against Japan for Chinese invasion.

Had the American people been brave in that era 20 years ago and had Britain stood pat, China would not have been invaded by Japan, there might have been no war between the United States and Japan, there might have been no Red China. Had Secretary Stimson had his way—but who of us saw it then? China might have been saved from bolshevism as the Marshall plan seems to be saving Western Europe from Red ravages.

I want now to get away from history of statecraft and defense of Dean Acheson, that much misunderstood gallant gentleman of Christian culture, and talk about something close to my heart.

We are where we are today, in this daze, this haze, in this vale of tears because we have forsaken God. America and the world will never get back to peace and right living until she abandons the false gods, the golden calves. Let us forget the power and the pelf and recite Kipling's Recessional lines:

"Lord God of Hosts be with us yet,
Lest we forget, lest we forget."

Too long have we forgotten Him, who made us and who made us for one purpose.

What is, after all, our purpose on this earth? The answer is as old as the words of the Master in ancient Galilee by the Lake of Gennesaret: God made us know Him, to love Him, to serve Him in this life and to be eternally happy with Him in the next. That, and only that, is the be all and then end all here. All else is trivial.

I am not a minister or priest but a hard-boiled newspaperman who thrilled at the handshake of Franklin Roosevelt in the White House one week and cringed like a child 3 weeks later when I sat for 2 hours between midnight and 2 a. m. and saw the execution, by hanging, of five Nazi prisoners of war in the military prison at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., a few miles down the river from St. Joseph, and I talk now as editor, not preacher.

What this world needs is prayer. Let us learn once again to pray and pray as we did in childhood when at our mother's knee we learned "Now I lay me down to sleep, I pray the Lord my soul to keep."

In my church there is a beautiful prayer, short, and I often have regretted the ritual of the Mass requires that it be in Latin, for too few of us follow the Latin.

"Agnus Dei, qui tollis peccata mundi, dona nobis pacem." That means "Lamb of God, who takest away the sins of the world, give us peace."

From the rising of the sun to the going down thereof that simple prayer is said every day, for at some hour of the day that ancient rite, the Mass, is being said somewhere on this earth and pious men and women are striking their breasts in humble supplication to the God of our fathers known of old.

And why should we not pray? It was not a Catholic but the world renowned Anglican poet laureate of England, Alfred Lord Tennyson, who wrote these lines from the Idylls of the King. In the Passing of Arthur he said: "Pray for my soul. More good is wrought by prayer than this world dreams of. Wherefore let thy voice rise, like a fountain for me night and day, for what are men better than sheep or goats that nourish a blind life within the brain, if, knowing God, they lift not hands of prayer both for themselves and those that they call friend, for so the whole round earth is every way bound by gold chains about the feet of God."

Prayer can save the world. Prayer can convert Red Russia from the grip of the anti-Christ. Prayer has saved Christian civilization before so that men, abhorring war, could spend their lives in peace and tranquillity.

And now, I close with lines from one of my favorites? The lines are known to you all, I am sure. Let them be our philosophy of life, our modus operandi, our aim and our purpose.

"So live that when thy summons comes to join the innumerable caravan that moves to that mysterious realm where each shall take his chamber in the silent halls of death, thou go not like the quarry slave at night, scourged to his dungeon, but sustained and soothed by an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave like one who wraps the drapery of his couch about him, and lies down to pleasant dreams."

Continuation of the Omaha Doctors' Lie and Smear Campaign Publicized Through the Omaha World-Herald

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN
OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 14, 1950

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, part 11 of this series of the Omaha doctors lie and smear campaign as publicized through the Omaha World-Herald is as follows:

[From the Omaha Evening World-Herald of October 23, 1950]

DOCTORS CITE GAINS IN CARE—HOWARD ANSWERS POINTS IN MEDICAL BILL

Omaha and Nebraska doctors have distinguished themselves in improving medical care in all the seven fields covered by S. 1679, the socialized medicine bill now pending before Congress, Dr. M. C. Howard declared Monday.

Dr. Howard is chairman of the Second Congressional District healing arts committee which has challenged Representative EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN because of his backing of the bill.

Mr. O'SULLIVAN has circulated a pamphlet which lists the aims of the bill:

1. Train more doctors, dentists, nurses, and hospital personnel.
2. Advance medical research.
3. Expand hospital building programs.
4. Help rural and other shortage areas; aid farmers' health cooperatives.
5. Expand State and local public health services.
6. Increase State maternal, child health, and crippled children's services.
7. National health insurance.

ANSWERS BY SECTIONS

Dr. Howard's answers by sections:

"1. Omaha is an outstanding medical center with two top-flight medical schools. They graduate 150 doctors annually, and make possible the building of new hospitals and expansion of present hospitals.

"The new veterans' hospital was built in Omaha on account of the two medical schools. The faculties of Creighton and Nebraska medical schools will make up the staff * * * veterans may be assured of the highest quality of medical care.

"St. Joseph's Hospital has completed a $2,000,000 addition which will accommodate another 175 patients. St. Catherine's Hospital has completed a $1,000,000 addition to accommodate 75 patients. Methodist, Clarkson, Lutheran, Douglas County, and Immanuel Hospitals have made additional facilities available. The hospitals are rapidly expanding their training programs."

POLIO STUDY GAINS

"2. Numerous research projects are being carried out at Creighton University and University of Nebraska medical schools. Experts are studying the use of radioactive isotopes in leukemia. Progress is being reported in the study of the polio organism. Extensive research is being carried out in the diagnosis and treatment of cancer. Numerous cases of 5-year survivors of cancer who have been treated with X-ray and radioactive substances are being reported.

"3. Answered in first paragraph.

"4. One hundred seventy-five doctors have been located in small towns and rural communities through the Nebraska Medical Association and its Rural Health Committee, the medical schools, and the Omaha-Douglas County Medical Society. Voluntary prepayment hospital and medical care plans have been made available to these areas."

IMPROVE MILK SUPPLY

"5. The Omaha-Douglas County Medical Society for more than 20 years has worked to establish a city-county health unit. This is now an accomplished fact. * * * The current program of mass chest X-rays is being carried out through the cooperation of the society. Immunization against diphtheria, whooping cough, lockjaw, and smallpox are continuously under way * * * cooperation has been extended to the health unit in improving milk supply, inspection of eating and drinking places, and other good public health measures.

"6. Extensive maternal-child health programs have been under way for many years. * * * Nebraska and four other States enjoy the lowest maternal mortality rates in the Nation. Nebraska holds the same position in infant mortality."

SET FOR EMERGENCIES

"Child health and crippled children's services are available in the new Children's Memorial Hospital; the 65-bed pediatric department at St. Joseph's; the Hattie B. Munroe Home; the Rheumatic Heart Clinic in connection with the University of Nebraska Medical College; the Dr. Lord School for Crippled Children, and the pediatrics departments of the other hospitals.

"7. The Omaha-Douglas County Medical Society in cooperation with the Physicians Bureau has established an around-the-clock emergency telephone service which makes available emergency medical care to everyone.

"It has been estimated conservatively that between $2,000,000 to $2,500,000 in free medical care has been rendered in Omaha annually for the last several years * * * in the clinics and dispensaries of the medical schools, at the hospitals affiliated with the schools, at Children's Hospital, County Hospital, and the Hattie B. Munroe Home. This service has been rendered by the members of the Omaha-Douglas County Medical Society and the Omaha medical profession."

DOCTORS TARGET OF O'SULLIVAN—CITES BANKRUPTCY, AID OF GOVERNMENT

Representative EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN charged Wednesday that doctors and hospitals are causing bankruptcy, that private medical schools can no longer pay their way, that hospital facilities are inadequate, and that pharmacists in Omaha are underpaid.

He held up the President's health program as a remedy in attacking recent statements by Dr. Maurice C. Howard.

Dr. Howard heads the Second Congressional District Healing Arts Committee, which is fighting to defeat socialized medicine and for the election of Republican HOWARD H. BUFFETT, Mr. O'SULLIVAN'S opponent.

Mr. O'SULLIVAN said that Dr. Howard, in listing what the doctors and medical fraternity had done generally in the Omaha area, had not pointed out that the new veterans' hospital was built by Federal money, that "Creighton Medical School no longer can pay its own way," and that Federal money helped pay for additions at St. Joseph, St. Catherine, and other Omaha hospitals.

Also, he said, Dr. Howard did not list the following:

1. "In 85 percent of the bankruptcy cases filed in the United States the past year excessive doctor and hospital bills are listed as the main liabilities."
2. "Thirty-three counties in Nebraska have no hospital facilities.
3. "There are a score of Nebraska cities and towns which have had no doctors or dentists in several years."
4. Johns Hopkins University "lost $900,000 last year which has to be made up by popular subscription; most of the remaining private medical schools are in the same fix."
5. "Nurses generally are out of sympathy with his program, and underpaid pharmacists in Omaha drug stores are on the verge of revolt."
6. "Employees of the Union Pacific have been under a system of socialized medicine almost since the inception of the railroad to a greater extent perhaps than England today. Union Pacific employees find $4 taken out of their pay checks each month. When they get sick, they cannot pick their own doctor, their own hospital, or even their own apothecary."
7. "He [Dr. Howard] and his colleagues have fought every effort to produce more doctors and medical services in this country."

VOLUNTARY HEALTH PLAN GROWTH TOLD

"The growth in America of the voluntary health insurance system has been one of the most spectacular economic developments of our time," Dr. M. C. Howard asserted Tuesday.

He made the statement at a meeting of the Second Congressional District Healing Arms Committee, which is opposing the reelection of Democratic Congressman EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN, a supporter of the proposed national health insurance law.

"A recent survey reveals that more than 90 percent of employees groups in Omaha are now covered by hospital and medical insurance plans," Dr. Howard said, "so the problem of health insurance for the people of Omaha has already been solved."

DOCTORS USE SHORT TALKS—STRESS FIGHT AGAINST SOCIALIZED MEDICINE

Now come the 2-minute interview to play its role in the doctors' fight against socialized medicine.

To see how it works, step into the office of Dr. James Bradley, 1118 Medical Arts Building. He had just finished a medical consultation with Mrs. Charles Nye, of 2101 South Sixty-second Street.

Then Dr. Bradley says:

"I would like to discuss with you for 2 minutes a topic of vital importance to you and to me. It is compulsory national health insurance, or socialized medicine."

SECOND-RATE CARE

"Socialized medicine would mean another tax on your paycheck which would eventually amount to a 6- to 8-percent increase in taxes to carry out the services promised in the socialized-medicine bill, Senate file 1679.

"This socialized medicine would produce second-rate medical care.

"It would make assembly line medicine a reality.

"Personal relationship between the patient and physician would be lost.

"There would be a great decrease in quality of medical care and service. The cost would be greatly increased."

VOTE FOR BUFFETT

Then Dr. Bradley adds:

"I urge you to fight state socialism in America by voting for HOWARD BUFFETT for Congress, who has always fought State medicine and State socialism."

The 2-minute interview has become standard with Omaha doctors—whether the patient visits them, or they visit the patient in his home or at the hospital.

Said one physician: "I have talked to more than 150 persons in this manner. Only 2 have said they are not willing to go along.

"I have also urged my patients to talk this important subject over with their friends across the backyard fence or over a cup of coffee."

[From the Omaha World-Herald of October 27, 1950]

ANOTHER WHO DARES

Since socialized medicince is much in the news these days our readers may be interested in a brief quotation from a recent sermon by Omaha's Archbishop Bergan. In addressing the new Catholic Doctors Guild, he said:

"You doctors realize better than I that your profession is in danger. It is being attacked in many quarters, even high in Government circles, in the present-day tendency toward State absolutism. Lobby after lobby and law after law is being fostered, and after many years of slumbering—this could not happen here—the medical profession has finally awakened to its own danger and is courageously and intelligently presenting its case."

Physicians and surgeons who dare to oppose socialized medicince have been described by Representative EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN as "practice-mad doctors," "hypocrite doctors," "golden-calf worshipers, and otherwise evil men."

Those phrases would hardly apply to Archbishop Bergan. Mr. O'SULLIVAN will have to think up some new ones.

DOCTORS MUST TELL STORY—THAT'S WAY TO DEFEAT SOCIALIZED MEDICINE

Doctors cannot tell their story by telepathy, the editor of the Journal of the American Medical Association said Thursday.

"They must take a greater responsibility as a citizen and enter more into community affairs," Dr. Austin Smith told a dinner session of the Omaha Midwest Clinical Society.

To defeat socialized medicine the doctor must report without heat or rancor what his profession has accomplished under the present system, he said.

The tall, calm, Canadian-born doctor gave this example:

"We hear cries that the supply of doctors is too small. We hear that only by the opening of a great number of new medical schools can we solve the health problem."

GRADUATES INCREASING

"But do you know that every year the medical schools graduate 2,000 more doctors than the number who die or retire? That is certainly keeping pace with our population gains."

It is wrong, he said, to speak of how many doctors are allotted to areas. Medically speaking, county lines and State lines do not exist.

The fact that there are counties which do not have doctors does not mean they have no medical care," he pointed out. "The automobile and airplane have taken care of that."

Because of technical advances doctors are providing more service, he said. Any given 1,000 doctors today can give one-third more medical care than 10 years ago, he said.

RECOVERY EARLIER

"Time was," he said, "that when a patient had pneumonia all you could offer was sympathy. You waited for the crisis and then for the recovery. This sometimes took months."

Today, he said, with penicillin you can nip pneumonia in hours. The patient is on his feet sooner, with fewer complications. He is back at his job earning money quicker, and everybody is better off.

DOCTORS TELL EARLY PROGRAM—AIDED PUBLIC HEALTH BEFORE CIO FOUNDED

State and county medical societies had an excellent program to improve the health of Americans long before the CIO was organized, Dr. J. Phil Redgwick asserted Saturday.

The chairman of the nonpartisan doctors committee said his group had these answers to specific charges against local medical societies made in a CIO health committee advertisement Friday:

Charge: They (the medical societies) fought Federal aid to States which would reduce infant and maternity deaths.

Answer: "For more than 15 years the Omaha-Douglas County Medical Society has cooperated in an extensive maternal-child health program that has brought Nebraska in a class with four other States as enjoying the lowest maternal mortality rate in the Nation. Nebraska holds the same position in infant morbidity and mortality."

Charge: They opposed vaccination against diphtheria and other contagious diseases by public health authorities.

Answer: "The local society for years has cooperated with the Omaha Health Department in active immunization programs against diphtheria, smallpox, and other diseases."

Charge: They fought against reporting of communicable diseases and public health services to control TB, and still oppose free diagnostic centers for TB and cancer.

Answer: "For years the local society and profession, through cooperation with the Nebraska Tuberculosis Association, visiting nurses, the clinics and dispensaries of Creighton and the University of Nebraska medical schools have carried on extensive free detection and treatment programs for tuberculosis. The mobile X-ray truck now in active use in South Omaha is one result. Nebraska now has one of the lowest incident rates for tuberculosis in the Nation.

"Free cancer detection and treatment centers are available at the two medical schools, St. Joseph's Hospital, University Hospital, and other places."

Charge: They fought against setting up free venereal disease clinics.

Answer: "Long before CIO, many free venereal-disease clinics were in operation in Omaha."

Charge: They fought workmen's compensation laws.

Answer: "Both local and the Nebraska Medical Association cooperated very actively in making these laws effective in this congressional district and State."

Charge: They fought group medical practice.

Answer: "The Omaha-Douglas County Society and its members always have cooperated with medical practice groups in this area."

Charge: They fought the Red Cross blood-bank plan.

Answer: "The society and its members participated very actively and have been very instrumental in making the Omaha Red Cross blood bank an outstanding success."

Charge: They fought voluntary insurance plans.

Answer: "The Omaha-Douglas County Medical Society in June 1944, established and placed in operation the voluntary Blue Shield Medical Care Plan before the CIO became health conscious."

Charge: In the last session of Congress an AMA lobby blocked Federal aid to medical schools and other Federal aid programs.

Answer: "The AMA and its component medical societies have been active in the enactment of legislation to assist medical education without the scourge of Federal domination."

Retired Railroad Workers Victims of Inflation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OVERTON BROOKS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 8, 1950

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, it has been repeatedly brought to my attention that the retired railroad workers in our Nation are the victims of a rabid inflation.

Again and again I have heard the pleas of the retired railroad men and women who, with a great degree of justification, decry a deplorable inequality between Federal pension legislation affecting them and Federal pension legislation affecting other retired persons.

Railroad employees do not fall under the provisions of the general Social Security Act. Many years ago the Congress set up for workers in the rail industry a special retirement program into which the workers and their employers have contributed funds throughout the years. Under the Social Security Act, established years later, some elderly persons receive benefits who never made contributions into a retirement fund. Benefits received by retired rail workers who have contributed into such retirement fund for years certainly are not in keeping with similar benefits under the social-security program.

One of the most important factors in maintaining the railroad retirement fund after the establishment of the social-security program was the fact that it was necessary to salvage and recognize the credit toward retirement benefits that had been built up by railroad workers through prior service. The general system of old-age insurance under social security does not recognize prior service.

How, then, can the benefits derived from a contributing plan like the railroad retirement program compare so poorly with benefits derived from noncontributing plans?

It takes neither the mathematical talents of the actuary nor the deep contemplation of a practiced logician to recognize that an injustice does exist. And when an injustice affecting hundreds of thousands of our older people is so perceptible, so flagrant, and so tragic, a correction of the grievance becomes necessary and urgent.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

The men and women who are now retired under the Railroad Retirement Act—and those facing such retirement—have lost much of the security that they had naturally expected as part of the return for their services during active careers. Some of these people have spent three, four, and even five decades in railroad employment and for much of that time received wages considerably smaller than those being paid to other skilled workmen. These workers looked ever forward to the day when the contributions that they were making into the retirement coffers, plus the matching funds provided by their employers, would provide a small but sufficient income during their twilight years. But now, these retired people who have contributed so much to the building of our Nation and its vital communication links are finding that soaring prices have turned their retirement-pension dreams into a bitter disappointment.

Inflation which began during World War II has pushed the essentials of life almost beyond the reach of many of these people who must subsist on these meager pensions.

In January, I introduced H. R. 7063, a bill designed to increase by 25 percent the benefits under the railroad retirement program. While I am afraid that this amount is not enough to replace the buying power lost through inflation, I know that it will help to alleviate some of the hardships of these unfortunate pensioners.

A quarter of a million retired railroad workers are awaiting an equitable adjustment by their Congress.

Twenty-second Annual Scholarship Fund Dinner of Yeshiva University—Address of Hon. Charles H. Silver

OF

HON. JACOB K. JAVITS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, appended is the address of Hon. Charles H. Silver, chairman of the committee of sponsors, at the twenty-second annual scholarship fund dinner of Yeshiva University held on Sunday, December 10, 1950, at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel. Yeshiva University is a great institution of learning in my community, training its students for leadership in these very troubled times. Under the direction of Dr. Samuel Belkin, president, and Hon. Samuel Levy, chairman of the board of trustees and their fellow officers, the board of trustees, the executive staff and faculty, the university plays an outstanding role in the spiritual life of American Jewry and in the intellectual and scientific advance of the whole American community. The university possesses the same privileges and rights as all the ancient seats of higher learning and bestows the same degrees as all the distinguished and accredited institutions of higher learning in the United States. It is widely known for its work in the fields of theology and education as well as in the scientific field of mathematics, and a great effort is now being made in a community sense to establish a medical school in the university.

The address of Mr. Silver follows:

My friends, it is my very great pleasure to welcome you for the third consecutive year. It is an honor to be identified with the activities of Yeshiva University and in a sense, you who are present share with me this honor, for together we have shown our deep faith in Yeshiva by supporting it, not only in a financial way but by our encouragement and wholehearted cooperation.

I am, however, a little disappointed this evening. I had hoped to make an important and thrilling announcement to you about the proposed medical school. Unfortunately, I cannot properly do this because a statement by official sources cannot be made at this moment.

I ask your indulgence and I promise you now that when official action is taken, I will write a personal letter to each one who is here this evening giving you the happy tidings so that you may rejoice in this great first step toward the realization of our dream—a medical school for Yeshiva.

We mark this evening another milestone in the life of Yeshiva University. We are here gathered in a time of turmoil and insecurity throughout the world. It would be foolish for anyone to predict what the future hold for the civilized world. The forces that control our thinking and our actions are so confused that it would seem that they are not within the power of an individual or group of individuals to fully understand.

But we are all agreed—and by that I include every civilized man and woman on the face of the earth—we are all agreed, I say, that we want peace.

It seems so simple to have peace. It is so much easier to love than to hate. On all sides, we hear the preaching of brotherhood and friendship and cooperation, and no one in his right mind would want it otherwise. But with all our achievements in science and scholarship and invention, we stand today on the brink of another great war which may destroy all of us.

Please do not mistake my meaning. I do not yield to anyone in my high admiration for the marvelous progress that has been made, but we must be realistic. The strides in technology have made this world a more convenient place in which to live. But I ask what progress have we made toward destroying forever the motives and actions which bring slaughter and misery to the world. That is the question we are all asking ourselves.

And yet we are unwilling to pay a price for peace that will make slaves of us. We will insist, and I think reflect the feeling of all Americans of all faiths and creeds when I say that we will accept only one kind of peace—and that is a peace that is based on the freedom of the individual. Let us not forget that when the right of human beings to live their lives as freemen is lost, then everything is lost, including honor and decency.

When our founding fathers wrote that immortal document, the Declaration of Independence, they had in mind only one thing—the survival of the individual. They did not plan from an economic standpoint for they knew that would take care of itself. They laid down the principle that all men are created equal and endowed by their creator with certain inalienable rights, they recognized the right of every one to worship God in his own way.

We, as Jews, wanderers over the face of the earth for centuries, found in this country a haven where we could set up and foster our houses of worship, our schools and our universities. As good Americans we have been loyal to the country of our adoption or birth, but we have also stood steadfast in keeping alive our traditions and religious life. Our watchword has always been not only to friends but to our neighbors, and, indeed, to the whole world, "Peace be unto you."

And so tonight Yeshiva dedicates its dinner to peace. It holds up the torches of love, compassion, and understanding. You will see shortly a beautiful pageant in which this ideal is unfolded through the medium of a stirring dramatic presentation and inspiring music.

And so I greet you in the spirit of universal peace. The young men who emerge from Yeshiva University are being grounded not in the arts of warfare but rather in a better understanding of what makes a richer and nobler life. They shall spread the gospel of brotherhood; we Jews have been preaching that gospel and philosophy down through the ages.

But these young men also understand that in planning for a happier world they must hold their heads high and not yield to the attempts to break down the dignity of the individual. As loyal Americans and as Jews we have never wavered. We have shown the world that we will stand up and fight for the principles of freedom. The new Republic of Israel has demonstrated to mankind that basically we are a democratic people and will stand firm against the attempts of the masters of the slave states to make slaves of us all.

Although the Republic of Israel has been a member of the United Nations a little more than 2 years, this new member of the democratic society of nations has played an important part in the struggle of our free world against those who would destroy it. The program which Israel has inaugurated to uphold individual freedom and peaceful progress is beginning to make itself felt.

Secretary of the Treasury Snyder recently pointed this out in an address on Israel, and I quote: "The most inspiring thing about the rehabilitation program is the high goal which has been set for individual, community and national effort. The leaders of Israel have taken up the challenge of proving that in the east, as in the west, ever-increasing benefits for the common man can be combined with political freedom and protection of human rights."

In this struggle for peace the faculty and students of Yeshiva will march shoulder to shoulder with those of other institutions of learning on the road to a just peace. Since we know the road; let us all follow, come what may. It is a duty we have to ourselves and our children. We cannot afford to lose the most precious possession that we have—the freedom of the individual.

Yeshiva University is a great institution of learning of which we, as Americans and Jews, all are proud, but in a larger sense it is also a symbol of our democratic way of life. It is a living and potent answer to those who would seek to destroy the very foundation on which this republic has been built.

Democracy in this country and indeed through many parts of the world is now on the march. The path which it travels can have no turning. It leads straight to human decency and love of fellow men. We Americans of the Jewish faith will not falter, for we know in our hearts that democracy will live so long as men cherish the ideals of our founding fathers.

And when the forces of democracy have triumphed, we shall stretch out our hands in friendly greeting to the peoples throughout the world who have thrown off the yoke of their masters. We shall not speak of victories nor will we gloat over our triumph.

For it will be victory of truth and justice; instead of being written in letters of blood it will be written in lofty and inspiring words and phrases from the hearts and minds of peace-loving men.

Additional Smear-Campaign Tactics of Omaha Medicos as Publicized by the Omaha World-Herald

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 14, 1950

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I shall now present as part 10 in this series, the following publicity appearing in the Omaha World-Herald, relating to additional smear-campaign tactics of the Omaha medicos:

DRUGGISTS AID HEALTH BATTLE—JOIN DOCTORS TO FIGHT SOCIAL MEDICINE

Omaha druggists Tuesday night lined up with the medical profession in opposing compulsory health insurance.

Some 175 druggists from Omaha and Sarpy, Cass, Otoe, and Washington Counties, attended the special meeting at the Medical Arts Building called by the drug service committee of the healing arts committee.

The committee is out to defeat socialized medicine by electing Republican HOWARD H. BUFFETT and defeating Representative EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN.

Elmer Lindberg, secretary of the drug service committee, told the druggists:

"It is a despicable thing when people will capitalize with cynical cruelty on the ills of the people."

FACTS IGNORED

"There is a group which would use the needs of people as an excuse for turning over the most wonderful medical care in the world to a bankrupting Federal bureau," he charged.

"They ignore the fact that from the day of Bismarck, when he put Germany under socialized medicine, the quality of German medical service declined."

HOWARD BUFFETT, Republican candidate for Representative from the Second District, said:

"If the people go to work they can turn back socialism."

DONATIONS ASKED

He indicated those in favor of compulsory health insurance think people don't know how to spend their money wisely for medical care.

A donation from every drug store was asked by W. E. Shainholtz, who was chairman. The money will go to the healing arts committee to help pay for radio time and for printing, used to fight the administration's health plan.

"We're up against a tough combination with lots of money," commented Mr. BUFFETT.

COMPULSORY HEALTH INSURANCE ASSAILED

The South Omaha Optimist Club Tuesday heard three doctors denounce the proposed compulsory health insurance law.

Dr. L. W. Lee said the cost to a person with an income of $5,000 a year likely would be 10 percent of that income, aside from all other taxes.

He said he feared hospital privileges would be abused to the point where it would be impossible for many bona fide patients to get in.

Dr. John H. Brush declared the proposed law was vague in most of its terms.

Having just returned from a trip to Britain, Dr. Edwin Davis reported the doctors there are dissatisfied with the health insurance set-up.

DRUGGISTS PLAN ATTACK ON SOCIALIZED MEDICINE

Omaha druggists and others closely associated with them will rally against socialized medicine at 10:30 p. m. October 17 at the Paxton Hotel.

The announcement was made Monday by Sam Ban and Wilbur E. Shainholtz, cochairmen in charge of arrangements. HOWARD H. BUFFETT, Republican candidate seeking to regain his Second District Representative position, will talk.

Mr. Ban said the druggists plan an extensive nonpartisan campaign within the framework of the healing arts committee program.

CHIROPODISTS JOIN IN FIGHT—GROUP ENLISTED TO BATTLE SOCIAL MEDICINE

Chiropodists officially came into the Second Congressional District Healing Arts Committee fold Tuesday.

Dr. H. G. Wiesman was selected chairman of the nonpartisan chiropodists committee, which like other affiliates of the healing arts group has as its aim the defeat of socialized medicine and the election of Republican HOWARD H. BUFFETT to Congress.

Dr. M. C. Howard, healing arts committee chairman, told the chiropodists:

"We doctors are not at all surprised to find ourselves the political targets of a smear campaign as launched by our Congressman, EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN, in his radio address of last week.

"FOLLOWS PATTERN

"Our present Congressman is only following a pattern set up for him by the national socializers."

Dr. Howard said Mr. O'SULLIVAN would have Nebraskans believe hundreds of thousands of dollars are being spent against him in Omaha.

"It is probable that these large sums which our Congressman reels off so glibly stem from his intimate association with Washington from whence come all these astronomical figures," Dr. Howard said.

PLAN SOCIALISTIC

The President's omnibus health program, which Mr. O'SULLIVAN supports, is socialistic, Dr. Howard said, because the Government proposes to—Collect the tax (another payroll deduction).

Control the money.

Determine the service.

Set the rate.

Maintain the records.

Control not only the medical profession but hospitals—both public and private—dentistry, nursing, and allied professions.

Direct both the citizen's and doctor's participation in the program, through administrative lines from the Government in Washington, down through State agencies and local communities.

"It is in these local committees that your health affairs can become a matter of public gossip, as has happened in England," Dr. Howard declared.

BUFFETT IS CALLED "ABLE FOE OF REDS"

HOWARD BUFFETT "has become one of the ablest foes of communism and socialism both in this country and abroad," Arthur Renstrom, chairman of the Committee To Combat Socialism and Communism, said at a meeting of that group Tuesday.

The Republican candidate for Second District Congressman "has given the pink crowd in Washington so many headaches they have done everything they can think of to smear him in every way possible," Mr. Renstrom said.

The Committee To Combat Socialism and Communism is another of the groups formed to support Mr BUFFETT and to try to defeat Representative EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN.

DOCTORS' WIVES IN VOTE DRIVE—OFFER TRANSPORTATION TO REGISTRY SPOTS

The wives' division of the non-partisan doctors committee had the first motorcade of the political season rolling Wednesday.

First stop was St. Joseph's Hospital, where nurses and other employees were offered free transportation to the election commissioner's office to register to vote.

Mrs. L. W. Lee will head the registration motor corps committee with members donating their services, cars, and time. The purpose, she said, simply is:

"To assist the people by transporting them to the election commissioner's office to register, so that they are eligible to vote on November 7 for HOWARD H. BUFFETT for the continuance of the American way of life and against socialism."

Her cochairwomen are Mrs. A. J. Hruby, Mrs. Maurice C. Howard, and Mrs. J. Phil Redgwick.

A second committee has been formed to provide transportation to the polls on election day. Members of this committee are:

Mesdames Harold Neu, John D. Hartman, Arnold McDermott, Frank R. Barta, Chester Farrell, Thomas Gurnett, Zeno Korth, Joseph Drazda, Frank Mnuk, Harry McCarthy, and Miss Marcella Riley.

All of this activity is part of the campaign by the Second District healing arts committee. Its aim: To strike a blow against socialized medicine by electing Republican BUFFETT to Congress and defeating Representative EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN.

STICKERS ARE USED TO SUPPORT O'SULLIVAN

President Gordon Preble of the Nebraska Federation of Labor exhibited samples Thursday of what he said is one of the answers to the Democrat problem of combating the healing arts campaign.

Little stickers are being given members to attach to their doctor bills when they pay on them, he said. They read:

"Through the efforts of Congressman O'SULLIVAN I am better able to pay on this account."

Doctors have been writing their patients urging them to help fight socialized medicine by supporting Mr. BUFFETT. They report favorable reaction.

[From the Omaha (Nebr.) Evening World-Herald of October 19, 1950]

"NO ALTERNATIVE TO O'SULLIVAN ATTACK"

"Dentists and doctors are not politicians and have no desire to take part in politics but attacks by men like Congressman O'SULLIVAN leave them no alternative."

This assertion was made by Dr. Maurice Howard, general chairman of the Association of Healing Arts, before the dental division of the association Wednesday night at the Fontenelle.

"Payroll deductions that are not voluntary and very indefinite as to amount should awaken the workers to the danger of statism," Dr. Howard said. "The worker already has a considerable chunk removed from his check; any more would be ruinous."

Dr. C. H. Schroeder, Dr. Elmer Bay, and Dr. A. R. Sofio discussed plans to work for the election of HOWARD BUFFETT as Congressman.

Organization of the dental unit of the Second District Healing Arts Committee was completed at the meeting. Dr. Schroeder was selected chairman of the dentists group.

DR. NOLAN HEADS OPTOMETRISTS GROUP

Dr. W. F. Nolan will head the newly formed nonpartisan optometrists committee, it was announced following a meeting at the Athletic Club.

Like other units of the Second Congressional District Healing Arts Committee, Dr. Nolan promised that his group would go ahead with aggressive plans to send HOWARD BUFFETT to Washington.

[From the Omaha (Nebr.) Evening World-Herald of October 19, 1950]

NEW GROUP GIRDS TO ELECT BUFFETT

Another associated group of the Healing Arts Committee is ready for action in the fight to beat socialized medicine and elect Republican HOWARD H. BUFFETT to Congress.

It is the newly formed drug service committee.

Wilbur E. Shainholtz Thursday was announced as chairman, following a meeting of the druggists and their allies. He is also president of the Omaha Pharmaceutical Association.

Elmer Lindberg, president of a drug-store system, was elected secretary.

The executive committee has 17 members, broken down into four divisions, each with a chairman, the first listed. They are:

Pharmacy: John O'Brien and Sam Ban, drug store operators, and W. A. Jarrett, dean of the Creighton University College of Pharmacy.

Drug travelers: W. C. Sharpe, C. S. Schiltz, R. F. Arthurs, J. D. Crabtree, G. H. Sheffield, and E. F. Hassler, all drug-firm representatives.

Creameries: Myron Westcott, Vaughn L. Ashenbrenner, Robert Fitzpatrick, and Wells Weatherwell.

Wholesalers: A. N. Dow and Howard Jensen.

The drug service committee has scheduled a general meeting of all druggists and all allied groups for 10:30 p. m. next Tuesday in the Medical Arts auditorium. Their plans for joining in with the Healing Arts campaign will be announced then.

GROUP RAPS AT O'SULLIVAN—"ORGANIZATION OF VETS FOR AMERICANISM"

The veteran's committee now supporting Republican HOWARD BUFFETT for Congress will become a permanent organization, Chairman Donald DeVoe said Thursday noon at an open meeting in the American Legion Club dining room.

Mr. DeVoe, a Democrat, said this will be "an organization to fight for Americanism." In the coming election, he said, it means opposing Representative EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN.

"This continues to be the fastest growing organization in town," said Charles Peters. "It is truly nonpartisan. We have regular Democrats, Southern Democrats, and Republicans all working together to fight for the American way."

"NOT ACCIDENT"

Speaking to the group, Mr. BUFFETT said "it was not an accident" that a noted Washington newspaperman called Representative O'SULLIVAN "the great reservoir of hogwash."

Mr. BUFFETT predicted that Mr. O'SULLIVAN's attacks against him would become more vicious "as he becomes more desperate."

"Why doesn't he talk about the issues?" Mr. BUFFETT said. "Perhaps this incident from his own record will give you a clue.

"VOTE FAVORED REDS

"On June 22, 1949, Congressman O'SULLIVAN voted to kill an amendment to keep Communists off public-housing payrolls.

"Fortunately there were enough patriots in Congress to pass the amendment by better than a 2-to-1 margin, but Mr. O'SULLIVAN voted against the amendment to bar from public payrolls those who propose the overthrow of our Government by force or violence.

[From the Omaha (Nebr.) World-Herald of October 22, 1950]

O'SULLIVAN IS ON THE RUN—VETS GROUP DECLARES HE'S INCONSISTENT

Representative EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN is on the run, Chairman Donald B. DeVoe told the Veterans Committee for Buffett meeting Thursday at the American Legion Club.

"One night he exclaims on the radio against socialized medicine," said Mr. DeVoe. "The next night he attempts to sell the Truman health program, which includes a provision for compulsory health insurance—the first step in socialization of medicine.

"One night he cries out against the evil men engaged in medicine. The next night he proclaims the doctors are his friends."

SKIPS REAL ISSUES

Another night, continued Mr. DeVoe, Mr. O'SULLIVAN says his opponent, Republican HOWARD H. BUFFETT, is against the farmer.

"But," Mr. DeVoe declared, "Mr. O'SULLIVAN forgets that on March 7 he said in Congress: 'I am for the Brannan plan and I think it is the only solution.'

"How can he claim to be a friend of the farmer when none of the Nebraska farm organizations have seen fit to back the Brannan plan?"

Mr. DeVoe said the Democrat's failure to deal with any of the real issues in this campaign is alone sufficient, we believe, to cause his defeat.

VOTES LIKE MARCANTONIO

Why, he asked, doesn't Mr. O'SULLIVAN explain:

How American boys were allowed to fight in Korea without modern weapons?

Where did the $45,000,000,000 appropriated for national defense go?

Why he defended the State Department, which we fear is honeycombed with pinks?

The reasons behind the recent cut in your pay check by imposition of higher taxes.

His near perfect record of voting with VITO MARCANTONIO on important issues.

WILL GET PAMPHLET

"According to Mr. O'SULLIVAN," said Mr. DeVoe, "the real issues in this campaign are such things as the number of pamphlets left in the congressional office when Mr. BUFFETT turned it over to him.

"And the thought occurred to me that as long as Mr. O'SULLIVAN feels so badly about not having pamphlets in his office, we should take occasion to give him one."

That one, he explained, will be in the form of 65,000 pamphlets put out by the Veterans Committee for BUFFETT and largely based on Mr. O'SULLIVAN's statements and acts in Congress.

[From the Omaha (Nebr.) World-Herald of October 22, 1950]

O'SULLIVAN BEWAILS ATTACKS UPON HIM

Representative EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN said Friday that "I wouldn't let some of these doctors take my temperature."

Speaking to the student bar association at Creighton University, he said: "I have been the doctor's friend. I see no reason for this assault upon me."

Mr. O'SULLIVAN spent considerable time reading from the proposed national health bill, which the Second Congressional District Healing Arts Committee contends is the first step to socialized medicine.

He said he is not for socialized medicine or a compulsory health program and charged the World-Herald "is another falsifier" along with the doctors.

Yugoslavia Grant Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, I have given very careful consideration and reflection to the question involved in this measure of an additional proposed gift of $38,000,000 to the Government of Yugoslavia.

Our Nation has already lavished many millions of dollars upon that country in efforts to alleviate hardship and rehabilitate its national economy. As recently as November, we sent thirty-one millions to Tito supplementing fifty-five million which we had sent him in 1949. On neither of these occasions was it contended that there was an emergency existing in that country because of food shortages and the evidence presented in this instance is indeed most inconclusive on that point. In fact the production figures show a favorable situation regarding basic crops. Although the funds or the equivalent which we have so generously dispatched to Tito up to this time amount to almost $500,000,000, there is no satisfactory showing whatever, in my opinion, that present conditions in Yugoslavia are such that we should be impelled for solely humanitarian reasons to make this additional gift.

In the past I have supported many proposals for grants and gifts by our Nation to many other nations, with the thought in mind that by furnishing needed relief and rehabilitating their economic strength, our own Nation might be joining with other democratic-minded people in checking communism, strengthening the forces of democracy throughout the world and acquiring friends among the nations who would stand by us loyally, as we have stood by them, in the event of emergency and war. Although we have spent literally billions of dollars in efforts to relieve and rehabilitate foreign nations and in outright grants of money, foodstuffs, clothing, medical supplies, and other necessities for the alleviation of privation and suffering in many countries, the results of our humane benefactions have been extremely disillusioning.

As the result of our almost unstinted help, many foreign nations have made very substantial economic recovery. Great Britain has found it possible to terminate Marshall-plan aid and other countries have vastly improved their economic, social, and political conditions. That is gratifying. On the other hand, it is very sad to note that many nations greatly benefited by our generosity have not up to this point rallied to our support in the current Korean crisis in any substantial way. While they have given a certain glib lip service in the United Nations to our cause, they have furnished very little concrete material support in terms of manpower, equipment, or weapons of war to aid us in combating our enemies in the Pacific. It is a sobering but incontravertible fact that only a few of the nations receiving our aid have moved to help us in any way. The number of foreign troops assisting us in Korean operations is relatively meager and no one could honestly call the assistance we have been receiving from them either wholehearted or effective.

While this failure on the part of our friends and allies to move to assist us in this grave crisis is a source of bitter disillusionment to the American people, the fact that some of our friends have recognized the Chinese Reds in efforts to protect their commercial interests in the Far East is even worse. These same nations are now strongly urging that the United States accept the policy which they have laid down of appeasing the Chinese Reds, the Soviet Union, and Communists elsewhere in the world, and be willing to pay any price for peace, regardless of our interests, our security, our prestige and self-respect, and the dire threat visible now to every thoughtful person of Communist-world domination.

I am of the firm conviction that the American people will never accept such a spineless and dangerous policy. Our freedom is at stake. Our liberties are endangered. Our security is threatened. These great issues which affect our existence as a free nation and our very destiny in the world, as well as the safety, well-being, and happiness of our people, can never, and will never, be compromised. Liberty means too much to Americans to hold it too lightly. We are determined to defend those liberties, whatever the cost, and, if I gage accurately the will and spirit of the American people, we will never be swerved from that course.

But let no one mistake our motives or our purposes. We desire peace as earnestly as any other people in the world. We are not seeking and we are not inviting global war. We have no chip on our shoulder. But we proposed to defend our country, without and within, against aggression and conspiracy. We will defend America against all those who would destroy it and we do not propose, great Nation and great people that we are, to crawl on our bellies in abject fear and supine surrender before the forces which are moving through all parts of the world seeking with evil and malignant design to destroy us and to blot out freedom and civilization.

The evidence is before us as a result of the ill-fated experience in Korea and it is clear, unmistakable, and convincing. It illustrates with a brilliant light the proposition that we have not been able, despite our grandiose unstinted benefactions, despite the billions we have poured out to help others, despite the unprecedented generosity which our Nation has displayed, to purchase the friendship of other nations or other peoples, with money, with gifts, with grants and subsidies. The stark realities of the moment demonstrate that fact with irresistible effect.

It is clear to me that we must reappraise our situation at home and in the world and remobilize our own resources of manpower, industrial strength, and over-all productivity on the supposition that from this time forward we must rely principally on our own strength. We must be sure that we have this strength in terms of organized manpower, modern weapons, equipment, ships, tanks, planes, and other matériel to be able to safeguard our own shores against any developing contingency as well as fulfill any commitments of a legitimate nature affecting our interests which we may have concerning the cause of human freedom.

If this bill contained certain conditions and reservations, and if I believed, as I do not, that it was required for humanitarian reasons to relieve hunger and starvation, I might be disposed to support it. I would not render this support because I believe it possible to purchase the friendship or active help and cooperation in war or peace of Dictator Tito. His career, his background, his affiliations, his political ideology, his monstrous and iniquitous persecution of helpless, God-fearing religious people certainly do not inspire my confidence. I am certainly not impressed with some of the statements made on this floor that we can have in him a faithful, dependable ally in future world policy. Nor am I much impressed by the assertions made here concerning the importance of his military neutrality or assistance in the event of war. I am impressed very little, indeed, concerning his ability to stand off Soviet military pressure once it should be exerted against him.

Nor am I anxious, directly or indirectly, to traffic with Communist governments of any kind. Communism seeks world control. Insofar as I am concerned, that means that Communist governments wherever they exist are potential enemies of my own democratic Nation. If certain conditions were met as I have outlined them above regarding the humanitarian need for this assistance, I should still demand further provision in this bill requiring Tito:

(a) To agree to release Archbishop Stepinac and all the religious and other persons in Yugoslavia presently suffering persecution because of their religious convictions and practices.

(b) The Dictator Tito immediately order the return of the thousands of Greek children which were by his forces most cruelly and heartlessly kidnaped away from their parents and their native homes.

(c) That Tito agree to support the principles enunciated by the United Nations relating to basic human rights.

If Dictator Tito were willing to comply with these conditions and could make a showing of real emergency, existing or impending hunger and privation, I would be willing to give further consideration to this measure. Since it is obvious from this debate and what has transpired on the floor that there is no possibility of these terms and conditions being written into the bill, I am constrained to cast my vote against it.

Let me say in conclusion that I do not believe it to be wise national policy in an hour of such grave peril and crisis for this Nation to undertake further relief programs throughout the world which will result in spreading its substance, dissipating its strength, wasting its resources in futile efforts to purchase the friendship of other nations at the expense of the American taxpayers and at the risk of further strengthening the very forces of communism which are working toward the destruction of the United States and our precious free way of life.

Ten Pillars of Wisdom—Or Just Something That Makes Sense?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 14, 1950

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, there is ample evidence all about us to the effect that only a few of our people really understand the flow sheet of our productive economy whether it be of foods, fats and fibers, or of manufactured goods. Great stress is now being placed before the managers of American industry to the effect that they must "sell" the American way to Americans here in the United States. I happen to be one of those who believes that our industrial management has been selling goods but that it has not been selling the enterprise system upon which we must depend for our production.

The General Electric Co. has recently made a valuable contribution in the form of Ten Pillars of Wisdom and in the hope that it will be read by millions of people, I herewith submit it for the RECORD:

TEN PILLARS OF WISDOM—OR JUST SOMETHING THAT MAKES SENSE?

1. The material things we want just can't come free to us out of thin air. They have to be produced by somebody, at a cost.

2. Government doesn't produce anything. So, when government gives something away to its people or to others, it must first take that something away from its people.

3. Our jobs come from customers. The only real job security is customer security. That's because in our system, where the customer is free to choose one or another or none out of the many products offered, sales and jobs depend on getting and keeping the customer.

4. This customer security, or job security for the worker, is attained only when management succeeds in guiding workers and investors toward accomplishing the things which the customers want done, while avoiding the things customers don't want done.

5. The amount of money in the bank or in the pay envelope doesn't measure the true material welfare of any one of us. The only real measure is how much that money will buy.

6. Wages are the biggest cost in any product. Wage increases across an industry or the whole country—which are general for everybody and not in proportion to the added productivity resulting from increased ingenuity or effort of the individual—simply raises costs and prices, as our experience has shown. Such general wage increases do not add to the welfare of the worker.

7. The "greatest good for the greatest number" simply means, from a material standpoint, the most goods for the greatest number, and that means the greatest productivity per worker.

8. All productivity comes from muscular and mental human energy being applied to natural resources, such as coal, iron, copper, tin, oil, lumber, farm land etc. How much productivity we accomplish—how much material welfare we have—depends on the availability of natural resources and on the degree to which our human energy is multiplied by the quantity and quality of the tools we use.

9. We cannot increase the natural resources and human energy available at any one time. We can increase the tools available, if we offer an attractive reward. Tools are bought with the savings of people who temporarily deny themselves some needs or comforts or pleasures. They risk their savings in the hope of being rewarded in the future with a small part of the extra productivity of the tools bought with their savings.

10. There are the most tools per worker—and each of those tools is most productive—where there is a worth-while urge for individuals and groups to compete for the favor of millions of citizens who are individually free to buy and sell and work and vote as they please. These millions of economic decisions, made daily by these millions of free individuals, result in a far higher material well-being for workers and all citizens than can be attained in any state-planned society where those decisions are made by a handful of economic czars, regardless of how well-meaning, sincere, and intelligent those czars may try to be.

Among the truths we live and work by, these 10 ideas seem to be basic. They seem particularly worthy of our examination right now when we are seeking the shortest, soundest path to the highest level of living we can enjoy—while having at the same time to defend ourselves from enemies within and without.

GENERAL ELECTRIC CO.

United States Must Sell Freedom Idea To Survive

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALT HORAN
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 14, 1950

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, I am privileged to extend my own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD. First of all, I want to commend two of my colleagues, Dr. WALTER JUDD, of Minnesota, and Mr. BROOKS HAYS, of Arkansas, for the effort they are putting out in a national barnstorming tour in behalf of a sound foreign policy for the United States. I am pleased to include with my remarks a news write-up of Dr. JUDD's speech made at Seattle recently and carried in the Wenatchee Daily World of November 28. Incidentally, it is interesting to note that the write-up carries the subheading of Dr. JUDD's cousin, Willa Woods Hiltner, daughter of the late Rufus Woods, famous editor and publisher of the Wenatchee Daily World. Mrs. Hiltner's mother is a cousin of Dr. JUDD's. I think the write-up is very ably done. It is a clear presentation of the message Dr. JUDD delivered to the people of the State of Washington. Mrs. Hiltner's article follows:

UNITED STATES MUST SELL FREEDOM IDEA TO SURVIVE, DR. JUDD SAYS

(By Willa Woods Hiltner)

"We've got to start selling the idea of freedom-under-law, and selling it hard, if we are to survive, Dr. WALTER JUDD told a forum audience in Seattle Tuesday evening. Dr. JUDD, Republican Congressman from Minnesota, and BROOKS HAYS, Democratic Representative from Arkansas, are on a national barnstorming tour in behalf of a sound foreign policy for United States.

"The Communists know the value of an idea," JUDD said. "They have been successful in selling lies. We can be more successful in selling truth. But we have to start.

"The basic struggle in the world today is between two ideas: 'Man is an animal' vs. 'Man is the son of God.' According to the Communist concept, there is no morality. Human life is of no value. They think no more of killing off a million people than of squirting DDT on flies.

"How can we get along with this other world? We don't have to agree with them to get along with them. We have to get a set of traffic rules that are too dangerous to break.

"It is futile to dream of a world of no conflict. What we must do is learn to deal with it. We can't ignore the opposing idea. We can't give in. We can't buy it off, for it is a religion. What can we do?

"We must expand and organize our area of freedom. From 1776 to 1931, that area steadily expanded. Since 1931, it has been contracting rapidly."

STOP COMMUNISTS

"For 500 years Russia has been on the march.

"But she is more dangerous under the commissars than under the czars, for she has learned new and deadly techniques. Now she has an organization in every country. She has learned how to get Chinese to fight Chinese, Koreans to fight Koreans, Germans to fight Germans.

"We must stop that expansion. Three and a half years ago we started to build up resistance in Europe. It wasn't perfect, but there was some hope if we did, no hope if we didn't.

"At the same time we sold out our friends in Asia. We refused to help China because she didn't meet our standards. We sent our greatest soldier, General Marshall, to China to insist that they take Communists into their Government.

"We are paying the price for this today, as our boys die in the freezing Korean winter.

"But we can't be overwhelmed by our difficulties. We have got to build up the free world to assume the burden of being the policemen. We can't do it alone.

"We know now that Russia came into the UN, not to help peace, but to disrupt Therefore, we must—

"1. Improve the United Nations, so that the monkey wrench of the veto can't cripple it, as it does now.

"2. Improve the police force, so that trained international soldiers will be ready at every trouble spot.

"3. Strengthen regional organizations of the free countries within the framework of the UN.

"There are some who worry about our 'sovereignty,' but what sovereignty are they talking about when it's Russia who calls the turn. We didn't choose the Korean war.

"Under a world organization we would gain sovereignty, rather than lose it.

"We get peace from order, not friendship. We don't have to be friends with Communists to live in the same world with them. We have tried alliances as a means of peace. They haven't worked because each side is expected to send soldiers without having a part in the policy-making.

"We have tried a debating society, which was the League of Nations. That's too slow.

"We now have a combination of both. It's a step in the right direction, but must go farther.

"To have peace we must have order.

"To have order we must have justice.

"To have justice we must have the machinery.

"To have effective machinery we must have people who believe.

"So we are back to our war of ideas.

"Our present danger is that we—

"1. Fail to underestimate the nature of the enemy and underestimate his ruthlessness.

"2. Fail to understand the nature of our own system.

"The best may win automatically in the long run, but in the short run it's the strongest. And it is our lifetimes that we are concerned with, not 20 centuries from now."

United States Does Not Quit Easily

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OVERTON BROOKS
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 14, 1950

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I present a very good editorial published in the New Orleans Item on December 9, 1950:

DESPITE DEFEATISTS UNITED STATES DOES NOT QUIT EASILY

As the shadows lengthen in Korea, as our heroic forces wearily give ground before the Red masses, the voices of doom and despair rise across the Nation.

The brickbats are beginning to fly. The hindsighters, the opportunists, the fearful are having their day.

So it has been in every dark hour in the history of man. George Washington was the target at Valley Forge. Lincoln in the Civil War. Churchill when Singapore and Tobruk fell. Roosevelt after Pearl Harbor.

Today, the cries are aimed at President Truman and General MacArthur:

"Get out of Korea now. * * * Asia means nothing to us anyway. * * * Keep out of Europe. * * * Drop the UN—just a debating society of foreigners who want our money. * * * Quit giving milk to the hottentots and prepare to defend our own shores."

The words have a familiar ring. (Roosevelt and Churchill were meeting 9 years ago this month.) If the crisis worsens, and it well may before it improves, we can expect the howling to grow in volume and venom.

In peace or war there is, of course, a legitimate area of review and criticism. Neither statesmen nor generals are infallible and the public welfare is served by a constant scrutiny of their words and deeds.

But a basic difference exists between this type of criticism and the defeatist recriminations we are hearing from some quarters today.

Despair is contagious. It has a way of infecting loyal Americans who should know better.

BYRD'S VIEW

As a case in point, take a man whose integrity and ability we have some regard—Senator BYRD of Virginia.

The Senator made a speech last Tuesday in which he said, "Our mistake to start with was going into Korea." Another mistake, he said, was the UN's crossing of the thirty-eighth parallel.

He called the Korean conflict nothing but a civil war between the two halves of that country, and observed "we can't go about the world making Democrats out of people who don't want to be Democrats."

And, finally, the Senator declared, "we will be very fortunate" if Korea can be evacuated in time to save American lives.

Unwittingly, Byrd gives comfort to our enemies. Vishinsky and his puppet from Peiping miss no chance to tell the world just what the Senator told America—we had no business in Korea, have none now, and should get out.

We may have to get out, just as the British in the last war had to evacuate Greece. But it will be for lack of men and arms—not for lack of having business there.

For Senator BYRD and those who share his views, we should like to review the chronology of Korea.

On June 25, the Russian-inspired North Koreans invaded the southern republic. The UN's Security Council ordered a cease-fire, then called on its members to meet the aggression. President Truman publicly pledged aid to the South Koreans.

On June 27, it was announced this country had ordered air and naval units to Korea and the Seventh Fleet to Formosa, had also appealed to Russia to recall the invaders.

In Washington the House rose en masse and cheered the news and Senators of both parties added their acclaim. Senator LODGE (Republican, Massachusetts) hoped Mr. Truman "would not shrink from using the Army" if the "best military judgment" dictated it.

NO DISSENT

When the President subsequently informed legislative leaders, both Democratic and Republican, of the decision to commit ground troops, there was no dissent. Instead, newsmen reported a wave of pride surging through the Capital because we were putting precepts into practice.

Where was Senator BYRD then? Where were the other politicians, commentators, writers who now preach a philosophy of fear?

These distributors of gloom must not be allowed to prevail. If they had their way, we would be standing alone, denying our strength to other freemen and their strength to us.

This is a time for courage, for resolve, for hard work, and sacrifice—not for the counsel of defeat.

If we are eventually forced out of Korea it will not be with apologies to the Communists for interfering in "civil war."

It will be with our rear guard in action, and with a word to the freedom-loving people of Korea that we will not forget them.

If Korea arouses the determination of the free world to resist, if it leads to courage and thence to strength, it may go down in the history books as the trumpet call that saved civilization.

This was implicit in the inspiring communique issued yesterday afternoon by President Truman and Prime Minister Attlee, following their week-long talks. From their words and the course of action they projected, it is plain that America and Britain do not quit as easily as Senator BYRD.

The World Situation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NOAH M. MASON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 14, 1950

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, during World War II Stalin was dictator over 300,000,000 Russians. Today, 5 years later, he is dictator over 900,000,000 people. He has surrounded Russia with satellite nations, puppet nations, iron-curtain nations, and so Joe Stalin today sits in Moscow like a big fat spider in the center of his web. He pulls a string and the flames of war break out in Korea, and we have to send our boys there and spend three or four billion dollars to put out the flames. Then he will pull a string in Indochina, in India, in Siam, in Turkey, in Greece, in Yugoslavia, or in Berlin, and the flames of war will break out, and again we will have to send our boys and spend billions of dollars to put out those war flames. After 3 or 4 years we will be exhausted, bled white, and Stalin, without losing a man of his own, will then be ready to take over.

Mr. Speaker, during these same 5 years we have spent $100,000,000,000 to contain communism, to keep it from spreading. This we have been calling a cold war. Our cold war has been under the management of Dean Acheson, Alger Hiss, Owen Lattimore, Dr. Jessup, and others. Isn't it about time to change our cold war leaders, to place someone in charge of our interests in Asia that knows something about the situation there, someone like Gen. Douglas MacArthur? We should get rid of Acheson, the man who got us into the present mess in Asia, and rely on the advice of General MacArthur.

The situation in Korea today is very critical. It has become that way because we have placed General MacArthur under the orders of the United Nations, and the UN refuses to follow his advice; they prevent MacArthur from bombing the Communist Chinese troop concentrations and war supplies in Manchuria. General MacArthur is being ordered today to fight with one hand tied behind his back, an impossible position to be in, and American boys are dying as a result of it. This is the result of our State Department's "panty-waist" foreign policy.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following article to the press written by the Honorable Henry C. Luckey. Mr. Luckey will be remembered as a former Member of Congress who represented the First Congressional District of Nebraska so ably in the Seventy-fourth and Seventy-fifth Congresses. The article follows:

TO THE PRESS

Where are we heading? After having fought and won (?) two World Wars in the span of one generation, we are now told by our Government that we are confronted with a situation of unparalleled danger and that no one can guarantee war will not come.

As we scan over daily papers we realize the truth of this statement. We are on the brink of an abyss that may engulf us and destroy our civilization as we now understand it. With the atomic bomb, the airplane, and the atheistic-communistic ideology spreading, we are slithering down the road to Armageddon.

The masses are confused and bewildered and wonder how this all came to be. They ask who are the fuehrers in high places that brought this impasse about? They have a right to ask. They are the ones to pay the cost of war, their boys will have to die on the battlefields, they will have to dig out of the rubble when their cities have been bombed, and they will become the slaves when the war is lost.

The man on the street is beginning to wonder whether or not we were lied into war. He knows little of history—but neither do our statesmen and our diplomats for if they did they would or should have been realists and charted their course according to the lessons taught by history. As it was—prejudice, bias, ignorance, lust for power, cupidity, egotism, imperialistic expansion, secret diplomacy, materialism and moral collapse—all played a part in bringing about this catastrophe.

There were some who, for years, shouted, like a voice crying in the wilderness, "Get the facts, learn the truth, and act accordingly," but to no avail. The present world crisis should arouse all of us from our mental lethargy and start us in search of truth in order that we may avoid in the future the mistakes made in the past.

Those who seek truth and light in this welter of confusion will find the following books helpful:

Soviet Russia and the Far East, by David J. Dallin; Russia's Race for Asia, by George Creel; The Nightmare of American Foreign Policy, by Edgar A. Mowrer.

Those who are interested in learning what part political horseplay contributed to our present debacle will find Norman Beasley's Politics Has No Morals, very helpful.

America's Second Crusade, by William H. Chamberlin, is especially to be recommended. He is an outstanding scholar and writer, the author of a number of books on Russia, in which country he spent many years. His book is not only diplomatic history, it is judgment of that history as well. It should receive the highest circulation and should be reviewed before clubs and organizations throughout the country.

Since it is just off the press, it may not as yet be found in book stores but it can be purchased from the publishers at $3.75—Henry Regnery Co., Chicago 4, Ill. Its careful perusal will throw much light on the maze and confusion in which we find ourselves today. It is a "must" book. Buy it, read it, then donate it to your city library.

Sincerely yours for truth and sanity in these confused times,

HENRY C. LUCKEY,
Member of the Seventy-fourth and Seventy-fifth Sessions of the United States Congress.

Letter to Trygve Lie on World Conditions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 12, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, as part of my remarks, I am including a letter written to Trygve Lie, Secretary General of the United Nations, by the secretary of the League of Arab States, Abdel Rahman Azzam. The letter presents a challenge that the world today has failed or refused. I am sure the west does not want war. As to Russia, if we are to believe the writings of Lenin and Stalin, there is every indication that world revolution calls for the use of force, and that is war. Under such circumstances there may be no common ground, no climate favorable to a friendly discussion between Russia and the United States.

Mr. Speaker, at this point I include the letter referred to:

NEW YORK, N. Y., December 6, 1950.

His Excellency, TRYGVE LIE,
Secretary General, United Nations,
Lake Success, N. Y.

EXCELLENCY: The world is passing through one of the most critical periods in human history, and it is time for every man to do his duty to get it over that dangerous critical period and to contribute his little bit for the survival and peace of the human race. Every obstacle in the way of this survival must be overcome, and that is why I feel it my duty to express my humble opinion to you, Mr. Secretary General, and through you to the United Nations.

I am impelled to do this by my feeling that it is a duty, although I cannot claim that my proposals are necessarily the best for a way out of the present world crisis. As a matter of fact, for a long time I have been concerned over our too hasty way of dealing with world problems under the impulses of the moment and the temporary reactions to the press and the radio and the news and commentaries given by them hour after hour.

We have become gradually absorbed in the temporary outward appearance of things and are not meditating deeply on the real causes and the treatment of the real malady. Therefore, I think, Mr. Secretary General, that if the world is given a chance to breathe easily and to think deeply and to relax and meditate, we may see with more clarity and find that many things to which we attach very great importance have, in our eyes, shrunk to their real proportions.

The Korean problem and what it has brought, and the crisis coming out of it, is only a symptom of a deeper unrest and an overwhelming agitation of the human heart and mind. If we are going to think only of two alternatives, namely, war or appeasement, then we will have either war as a result of an appeasement, the same symptoms of Korea surging up in Indochina, Malaya, the Middle East, north Africa, or the middle of Europe. Therefore, in treating the problem of Korea we have to treat the whole world problem and ultimately to discover the evil and cure it.

I believe that the world for many generations has been passing a social and a conscience crisis, and unless we treat the social conditions of mankind in a way that gives equal chances to races and individuals, and unless we treat the heart and conscience of man to give him spiritual convictions, we will have neither our physical or spiritual existence satisfied; and we will live in emotion and agitation and dissatisfaction in which conditions, reason, and sound judgment will always be overlooked.

So, Mr. Secretary General, if this is true, I think the first steps that should be taken now, on the occasion of the Korean crisis, is that we should not only attempt to make a cease fire on the war front but also a cease fire on the mental front. We should, for example, have at least a month's truce in Korea and 3 months' truce in what they call the cold war everywhere.

At least in the United Nations we should stop having that respectable gathering of the intelligentsia of the world making of its rostrum a mouthpiece for propaganda and for everybody condemning everybody else and selling only his goods. We should stop the United Nations from becoming a market place for bargaining of votes or for gaining temporary victories of one bloc against another bloc. We should have peace first in this world center, and in that period of peace be able to meditate about the real troubles.

Our next step should be to discover where we could all agree and to enlarge on that, and thus establish a common ground from which to develop human cooperation. For example, we may discover that our resolve for the maintenance of peace establishes this common ground that we must have peace and should not think of any solution for our troubles except under the patronage of peace. We may also discover that we must have criteria to judge the veracity or fallaciousness of any problem that presents itself. In these criteria—equality of the human race, of individual human rights, of class equality—we may also discover that the moral principles of justice which have stood the examination of thousands of years are still ultimately the best criteria; and that this life is not only material and that the human race in a capitalist or in a Communist regime cannot live without moral values and spiritual guidance, and that we should, therefore, give the spiritual side of life its everlasting value.

For an approach toward that common ground it may be found necessary that the representatives of the leading powers of the world, particularly the United States of America and the Soviet Union, should be asked by the United Nations to meet and pledge as a result of this meeting to offer a basis of agreement from which to develop the common ground for humanity as a whole. If this requires any assistance from the United Nations, a chosen committee from the United Nations, whether as persons or as states, should be authorized to help bring about that contact between the leading men on a neutral ground in Asia, Africa, or Europe, and to help before and during this contact to pave the way toward a proper approach to the problem and a common basis of agreement concerning it.

There are certainly two definite concepts and ideologies leading the world today. This is not exceptionally new because the world has always had separate religious and ideologies without necessarily clashing swords for the survival of one or the other.

Human intelligence, conscience, and interest, given the time, will decide the issue between ideologies. What is wanted is to avoid war, not by appeasement nor by a preventive war, but by complete and resolved determination to avoid war as a means of settling human differences, and to try with a big resolute heart and tolerant mind to have a United Nations reconstructed on its Charter as a court of justice to whom every member and every nation can bow respectfully to its decisions.

Mr. Secretary-General, I must confess that in mentioning all this to you, I may not have brought anything new to you, but, as I said before, I felt that I must express my feeling, which I am sure is shared by millions of Arabs and Moslem brothers all over the world.

I have the honor to remain,
Yours sincerely,

ABDEL RAHMAN AZZAM,
Secretary-General, League of Arab States.

Reconstruction Finance Corporation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include herein two letters that I have received from Mr. W. E. Harber, Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in reply to the criticism of the proposal of the RFC to transfer and consolidate some of their activities:

RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION,
Washington, December 8, 1950.

Hon. THOMAS J. LANE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. LANE: This is to acknowledge your letter of December 1, 1950, quoting the telegram you received from the Honorable Paul A. Dever, Governor of Massachusetts.

In order to continue the Reconstruction Finance Corporation on a self-sustaining basis, it has become necessary to increase the Corporation's income and reduce administrative expenses to the extent practicable and, at the same time, to continue to render the best possible service to the public.

The Corporation has recently increased its interest rates on business loans from 4 percent to 5 percent per annum in an endeavor to operate the business loan program on a self-sustaining basis. The Corporation is working on a plan which should make it possible for the RFC to reduce administrative expenses by a substantial amount. The proposed plan would decrease the Corporation's present administrative expenses and would result in the operation of the business loan program on a self-sustaining basis.

All the 31 loan agencies of the Corporation will be continued. There will be no curtailment in the existing functions of the Corporation and it is anticipated that services now available to the public will be improved.

The Boston office of the RFC will, along with the other agencies, suffer a cut in its personnel and administrative expenses. However, there is no intention on the part of the Corporation to close the Boston office or to in any way change the functions which are now handled in the Boston office. The principal plan of the Corporation is to consolidate the bookkeeping in 11 regional offices. The loan activities of each agency will be continued as they have been in the past.

Let me assure you that the Corporation will give every consideration to the continuance of the RFC in Boston on a scope which the area merits and which will give Massachusetts and New England parity with other parts of the country.

With kind regards.

Sincerely yours,

W. E. HARBER,
Chairman.

RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION,
Washington, December 13, 1950.

Hon. THOMAS J. LANE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN LANE: On November 28 we publicly announced that a plan was being formulated which should make it possible for RFC to reduce administrative expenses by approximately $5,000,000 and that generally the savings would result from the consolidation of certain of the Corporation's administrative and fiscal activities.

Following this announcement many rumors have been circulated with respect to the effect which the program will have upon our loan agency offices located throughout the country. The RFC board feels that you should be informed of the factual situation.

All of our existing 31 loan agencies will be continued and it is probable that additional offices may be opened.

The board feels that under our present workload administrative expenses with respect to our lending activities can be substantially reduced in each of the foregoing offices and at the same time the service rendered by those offices can be improved.

The plan is to consolidate the bookkeeping and other fiscal activities in 10 or 12 of the loan agencies and a substantial savings can be accomplished by this move. The board wishes to emphasize, however, that the lending and related functions will not be transferred or consolidated but will be retained in each loan agency office.

It is hoped that these comments as to the facts may clarify erroneous impressions, if any, which may have been created.

Sincerely yours,

W. E. HARBER,
Chairman.

Unite on What?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN E. LYLE, JR.
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 14, 1950

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Speaker, I have the consent of the House to insert, along with these remarks, an editorial which appeared today in the Washington Daily News.

It is a timely editorial, and although I do not agree with all of the conclusions of the writer, I do agree, and I am sure all of the Members of this body will agree, with that portion relating to our able former colleague, the present distinguished junior Senator from Texas.

The editorial follows:

UNITE ON WHAT?

Twenty-five hundred persons attended the Democratic National Committee's dinner at the Waldorf-Astoria in New York.

Cabinet members, Democratic Congressmen, governors, mayors, other office holders, and party leaders were among them.

At $100 a plate and up, the diners contributed almost a quarter-million dollars to carry forward the committee's preparations for the 1952 presidential election campaign.

And then they applauded appeals for a suspension of partisan politics and for complete national unity in this time of danger.

"I call upon both the Republican Party and the Democratic Party," said New York's Senator LEHMAN, "to forget about 1952 and think only in terms of the security of our country and the peace of the world."

"When the security of this country is at stake," said National Chairman Boyle, "there is no time for partisan politics. * * * I believe the people of this country will rise in wrath against these selfish, narrow men who put partisan advantage ahead of the safety of their country."

The sentiments are lofty. But the earthy implication is plain—that unity means unquestioned acceptance of the Democratic administration's policies; that critics of those policies are selfishly endangering America.

There is no Democratic monopoly on patriotism or wisdom. And, fortunately, there are Democrats wise and brave enough truly to put partisanship aside and face the facts about the administration's policies.

One of these—LYNDON JOHNSON of Texas—was speaking in the Senate at Washington as the guests assembled for the national committee's dinner in New York. He knew what he was talking about. He heads the Senate committee charged with the duty of keeping watch on the Nation's preparedness effort. And he described that effort as dangerously inadequate.

For six costly months, Senator JOHNSON said, America and the whole free world have been at war with international communism, and survival is at stake. Yet:

"Our Government has been planning and acting from day to day and hour to hour. Faced with the task of girding this Nation for a struggle that may outlive us all, we have committed ourselves only to a policy of not committing ourselves.

"We in Congress have been told—and we have apparently accepted it as wise—that we must be more afraid of doing too much than of doing too little. What is the result? For the common defense we have thrown up a chicken-wire fence, not a wall of armed might.

"We have had 6 months to find out where we are going and when we are starting. But we have not done so. The American people are tired of and they are fed up with double-talk in Washington. They are anxious to unite.

"But they cannot rally around a vacuum. They cannot give unified support to policies that do not exist."

The St. Lawrence Seaway

OF
HON. GEORGE D. AIKEN
OF VERMONT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, December 14 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Seaway to the Midwest," which was published in the November 1950 issue of the Eagles' national magazine.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEAWAY TO THE MIDWEST—THE VITAL INTERESTS OF AN ENTIRE CONTINENT ARE WRAPPED UP IN THE PROJECTED AND MUCH-DISCUSSED ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

(By Walter Monfried)

Of all the great rivers of the earth, the St. Lawrence is the only one which cracks a continent apart, says a famous naturalist, Henry Beston. Go north of the St. Lawrence and soon you enter the wilderness akin to the forbidding Arctic regions. South of the river stretch the green fields and hills of a temperate zone.

But if the St. Lawrence divides our continent, it likewise binds and unifies it. Nowhere else on earth has nature provided so vast and useful a waterway into the heart of a continent as the St. Lawrence-Great Lakes combination. The St. Lawrence, broad and majestic, loaded with the lore of centuries of high adventure, is a solid business asset to the two great nations whose border is formed by it in part. The noble old Eagle city of Quebec can accommodate the biggest ships that sail the ocean. Upstream, bustling Montreal, another Eagle pride, claims to be the largest inland port in the world. Its waters can hold big ships, too—not the biggest, but big enough for big jobs. Montreal is the world's foremost wheat-exporting port.

For hundreds of years, foresighted men of Canada and the United States have longed for a water route that could take ocean-going vessels from the far west lake harbors—Chicago and Duluth, for example—out to the deep St. Lawrence and hence to the Atlantic and all the world. The dauntless explorer Jacques Cartier, who discovered the St. Lawrence for white men in 1536, never had more than a hazy idea of the waterway empire which he claimed for France. He thought he had reached China and so he named a series of rapids Lachine. But the brave Frenchmen who followed in later generations—Champlain, Radisson, Joliet, Marquette among them—saw the advantages more clearly. Three centuries ago they persuaded the French Government to build canals and deepen the stream around Lachine and International rapids. The result was a passageway 2 feet deep. That was enough to float the long canoes around the turbulent river rapids.

After Canada joined the British Commonwealth, the sea-minded Canadians and Englishmen realized the waterway's value more fully. The canals were deepened and widened, and the locks expanded. From the 1850's to the 1870's, the new fast rising cities of the Great Lakes sent to Europe hundreds of vessels loaded with Midwest grain, lumber, leather, and foods. Then that trade fell off as the railroads provided faster service to the east coast.

But the dream of a waterway for ocean craft never died. From the 1830's on, Canadian politicians and publicists agitated for it in pamphlets and speeches. In 1902 American and British leaders were proposing conferences to work it out. In 1913 a long step was taken when the United States Senate unanimously approved the resolution of Senator Townsend, of Michigan, requesting the President to enter into negotiations with Great Britain with the view to securing an international agreement for cooperative improvement of navigation in the boundary waters of the United States and Canada. The movement has grown year by year. Conferences have been held, agreements have been reached, and every President from Woodrow Wilson to Harry Truman has advocated such a project. Gov. Thomas E. Dewey, of New York, is an open supporter, even though the railroad and navigation interests of his own State are opposed. The issue comes up perennially in Congress. The Senate has approved the job by a majority, but the necessary two-thirds approval has been lacking.

It was recognized that 1950, with its elections, could see no furthering of the plan. But the Great Lakes harbor officials and Canadian friends of a deeper waterway have high hopes that 1951 may see definite action. Patriotic organizations of all sections of the United States are lining up behind it. The Fraternal Order of Eagles is one which is advocating the project.

Nature already has given the two nations 95 percent of the 2,400-mile waterway which could accommodate ocean-going vessels. And man already has contributed two vital improvements. The MacArthur locks at Sault Ste. Marie, between Michigan and Ontario, were built in 1942 at a cost of $9,000,000. The Canadians have supplied the invaluable Welland Canal, which can carry heavy ships over the 326-foot drop from Lake Erie to Lake Ontario. The Canadians have worked for over a century to circumvent that enormous drop represented by Niagara Falls. The fourth Welland Canal was undertaken in 1913, and 18 years later it was officially opened after $160,000,000 had been spent. The locks which lift and lower ocean ships are among the biggest anywhere. They are 820 feet long, 80 feet wide and 30 feet deep. A ship can go through the entire series of 8 locks in less than 6 hours, as compared with the 18 hours for the old canal.

The chief bottleneck in the Lakes-to-ocean waterway now occurs in the 113 miles of the St. Lawrence between Montreal and Ogdensburg, N. Y. The series of rapids here is bypassed by canals and relatively small locks, which cannot accommodate the large ocean-going ships. These locks are 260 feet long and 14 feet deep. Not much has been done to modernize them since the 1880's. Ships of about 3,000 tons can now go through. The advocates of the seaway declare that locks of 800 feet length and 27 feet depth are necessary to take care of 10,000-ton vessels.

No one denies that the improvement between Ogdensburg and Montreal would mean a huge and expensive task. It would cost hundreds of millions of dollars for each nation. About 20,000 men would be needed for 4 years of work, it has been estimated. And from the dozens of giant turbines in the completed job, millions of horsepower of electric energy would be available for the farms and home and industries of the Northeastern States and neighboring provinces.

It is a shameless injustice that this project was not carried out years ago, declares Senator GEORGE D. AIKEN, of Vermont, one of the leading supporters of the seaway. He and the other backers say that it would carry more shipping than the Suez or Panama Canals and would bring the benefits of low-cost transportation to more than 50,000,000 Americans of the Middle West—one-third of the Nation. The cities of Chicago, Milwaukee, Duluth, Detroit, Toledo, Cleveland, Buffalo, and others on the Great Lakes would be busy ocean ports. The strong currents of the St. Lawrence could generate several times the electricity of even a giant dam such as the Russian Dnieper. New York State and New England States and Canadian Provinces would each save millions of dollars on electricity bills a year, we are told.

The electric-power interests, the coal and railroad and ocean groups have opposed the project out of mere selfishness, the seaway advocates declare.

In the interest of fair play, let us look at the arguments presented by the Association of American Railroads. This group asserts that the benefits from such a project have been highly exaggerated in view of the immense cost. "The channel would have no real resemblance to the vision of a great natural deep-water channel conjured up by the term 'seaway'," the railroad men say.

"During virtually half the year no ship can enter or leave the St. Lawrence on account of ice," the railroad spokesmen argue. The friends of the seaway answer that the seaway would be operable about 8½ months each year, because vessels could start their sailings from Europe several weeks in advance of the movement of the ice out of the St. Lawrence River. Normally the river is open from April into December. "An 8-month season has not spoiled the development of Great Lakes transportation, which is the cheapest transportation known in the world," Great Lakes harbor leaders claim.

Who would pay for this costly digging job? The railroad men argue that the treasuries and ultimately the taxpayers of the United States and Canada would foot a bill of hundreds of millions or possibly more than a billion. Friends of the seaway reply that the legislation before Congress calls for payment by a reasonable system of ship tonnage tolls to be worked out by the two nations.

In the last few years, the seaway's value to the defense of Canada and the United States is stressed more and more. Generals Marshall and Eisenhower and other military leaders have urged the project. The cities of the Atlantic and Pacific coasts are more vulnerable to attack. American success in any future emergency may depend, more than before, upon better access to the machinery and food produced in the Middle West.

The seaway friends also point out that the Second World War cut heavily into the Nation's natural resources, iron, petroleum, and lumber. In future efforts to rearm, it may be necessary to import such raw materials from friendly foreign nations. The seaway, if in use, could carry huge volumes of the supplies to the Middle West industries.

"Two World Wars have been fought and a great peacetime economy has been built largely on the iron ore reserves of the Mesabi range in northern Minnesota," Norman W. Foy of the Republic Steel Corporation says. "But we cannot fight a third world war and we cannot indefinitely expand our peacetime production with Mesabi ore. There will come a year, not far away, when Mesabi ore output will fall short of meeting the needs of our industries on the Great Lakes."

American steel companies now control rich ore deposits in Venezuela, Liberia (Africa), and Labrador. "The Labrador ores can be used efficiently only if the St. Lawrence seaway is built," he asserts. "Labrador ore brought to the river by rail and thence through the St. Lawrence to inland steel mills would insure—as nearly as anything can be insured in wartime—a steady supply of ore such as we had while fighting World War II." Incidentally, little Venezuela is building a seaway for its ore.

The St. Lawrence seaway issue, obviously, is bigger than any single industry or any single region. Our entire continent and hemisphere are wrapped up in it.

The Case Against Acheson

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 14, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, the mail which I am receiving indicates that the people are not only indignant but infuriated over the communistic game which Secretary Acheson has been playing with the Communists. There is overwhelming evidence to show that our boys have fought, bled, and died as a result of the coddling and appeasement of the Communists by Secretary Acheson.

A very revealing article has just appeared in the Freeman under date of December 11, 1950, which states chronologically some of the charges brought against Secretary Acheson as they have appeared in congressional speeches and in the public prints.

Under leave to extend heretofore granted, I am inserting the article to which I have referred as part of my remarks:

THE CASE AGAINST ACHESON

The diplomatic fiction that the war in Korea was a small local affair has been demolished by open Chinese aggression which threatens disaster to General MacArthur's forces. And Secretary of State Dean Acheson has at last discovered a fact which has been common knowledge outside the never-never land of American diplomacy: that the aggressor behind the Chinese Communist is Soviet Russia.

So now it can be told: We defeated the puppet of a puppet in Korea; we are now fighting the puppet; and in both cases the real enemy has been the puppeteer, who of course is Stalin.

"Pardon my firmness," the Secretary of State was saying in effect on November 29, in a broadcast speech which sounded as if it had been written in a second-hand cliché factory. He spoke at a moment when American boys were dying, when the American Army was facing annihilation, and when General MacArthur urgently needed authorization to aid his imperiled forces by bombing installations and troop concentrations behind the Manchurian border. The general could wait; American diplomats at Lake Success would continue to argue with the Chinese Communists over who slapped whom, while Mr. Acheson warned the fathers and mothers of the dying that Communist China's brazen act holds grave danger for the peace of the world. One might think the Secretary regarded the full-scale war in Korea as just another local skirmish.

Mr. Acheson's speech of November 29, made at a time when swift action to support MacArthur was desperately urgent, was completely silent on this urgency. It sounds like a filibustering speech calculated to divert the attention of the American people and the world from the military paralysis due to UN inaction.

Has there been any basic change in American far-eastern policy, all Mr. Acheson's bold clichés notwithstanding? Or are there still, between his statements of defiance, hints of further appeasement?

As long ago as the autumn of 1944, the man who now admits that Soviet Russia is out to conquer the world had become the head of the pro-Russian group in the State Department. Former Assistant Secretary Adolf A. Berle testified to this fact before the Committee on Un-American Activities on August 30, 1948, as follows:

"As I think many people know, in the fall of 1944 there was a difference of opinion in the State Department. I felt that the Russians were not going to be sympathetic and cooperative. Victory was then assured, though not complete, and the intelligence reports which were in my charge, among other things, indicated a very aggressive policy not at all in line with the kind of cooperation everyone was hoping for, and I was pressing for a pretty clean-cut show-down then when our position was strongest. * * * The opposite group in the State Department was largely * * * Mr. Acheson's group, of course, with Mr. Hiss as his principal aid in the matter. I got trimmed in that fight and, as a result, went to Brazil, and that ended my diplomatic career."

The opposite group went on to get many another good and patriotic American in the Department, while Mr. Acheson's principal aide, Alger Hiss, went on from one important post to another until he became the organizer of the San Francisco Conference to set up the United Nations, and one of President Roosevelt's chief advisers at the fatal Yalta Conference.

They got Under Secretary Joseph Grew, who resigned in the summer of 1945 and was immediately succeeded by Dean Acheson. When Patrick Hurley returned from China in November to demand dismissal of the pro-Communist State Department men in China who were turning over his secret messages to Moscow, it was the Ambassador's resignation that was accepted. The pro-Communists stayed, and Dean Acheson sat down with Gen. George Marshall to write the instructions to bring about a Kuomintang-Communist coalition government in China—instructions which Marshall vainly followed for a year.

By October 7 of 1945 the Daily Worker, whose Washington correspondent on June 7 had called Acheson one of the most forward-looking men in the State Department, chortled in its joy:

"With the assistant to Assistant Secretary of State James C. Dunn, Eugene Dooman, who was chairman of SWINK, the powerful interdepartmental committee representing State, War, and Navy, and former Acting Secretary Joseph Grew out, the forces in the State Department which were relatively anti-imperialist were strengthened."

And the Daily Worker's uptown echo, PM, declared that "What the Government seeks now is to develop a diplomacy based on better appreciation of what the Soviet wants."

That was what the Government developed, and that is what the Government has continued in the Far East down to the present debacle.

When Acheson, after 2 years at his private law practice, returned to the Department as Secretary in January 1949 he was sold to the American people as representing continuity in foreign policy. Precisely because this was true, those who realized that our foreign policy pointed to disaster were dismayed by the appointment. There was also objection from those who felt that it would be unbecoming, to say the least, for a man whose law firm was registered with the Department as representing several foreign governments to be dealing with those governments as Secretary of State. But the main objections were based on Acheson's previous record in the Department.

Since that time Acheson's completion of the China sellout, his publication of the infamous Government white paper whitewashing the Department's Red China record, his public denunciations of Chiang Kai-shek, his appointment of Philip Jessup and Dean Rusk as makers of Far East policy, his proposals—after having virtually turned Asia over to communism—that we pour money and arms into any borderland Korea where Stalin might choose to have his puppets attack, his public and official declaration that he would not turn his back on the convicted perjurer Alger Hiss—all these actions had aroused great public uneasiness even before the Korean adventure, and had prompted two Democratic legislatures (Texas and Mississippi), and various other organizations and individuals to call for the Secretary's dismissal.

Some of the charges brought against him are here briefly summarized from congressional speeches and the public prints.

1. He has been the chief architect of the policy which has brought us, in 5 years, from the unconditional victories of 1945, and sole possession of the atom bomb, to the verge of national ruin.

2. Under his guidance, we acquiesced in the conquest of one-third of the world by Communist imperialism.

3. He and his clique encouraged a weak Communist rebellion in China, armed and directed by Russia, to take over the heartland, or key to all Asia; today, in consequence, Americans are dying for a toehold in Korea, a peninsula attached to the China Mr. Acheson's Department helped to push into Russia's arms.

4. On July 31, 1946, Mr. Acheson wrote to Alfred Kohlberg, of New York, a letter which was published in which he said: "General Marshall * * * is exerting every effort to fulfill the American Government's desires by bringing the two major Chinese political factions peacefully together to form a united and representative government."

5. After the legitimate government of China had been forced to flee to Formosa, Secretary Acheson recommended abandonment of that island. His Department, on December 23, 1949, sent out secret instructions to all diplomatic and consular personnel to promote the view that Formosa was doomed and expendable.

6. Before the House Foreign Affairs Committee, on March 20, 1947, Mr. Acheson said there was no danger of a Communist defeat of Chiang Kai-shek. In his letter to the President of July 30, 1949, prefacing the White Book, he says that "no amount of aid could have saved Chiang." These statements are typical of the quality of Acheson's statesmanship.

7. On August 24, 1949, in answer to Congressman WALTER H. JUDD, of Minnesota, Mr. Acheson denied that Vice President Wallace had made a written report to President Roosevelt on his return from China in 1944. Since then, Mr. Wallace has released portions of two such reports.

8. In issuing the white paper on China, on August 5, 1949, Acheson declared that all important documents were included. Twelve cables called for by Ambassador Patrick J. Hurley when testifying before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in 1945, were omitted and are still secret.

9. He has approved the Chinese Communist demands for hostages to guarantee Americans leaving Red China.

10. He paid Communist China to get Consul General Angus Ward out, and then only after a newspaper campaign had aroused public opinion.

11. Under questioning by a Senate committee before his confirmation as Under Secretary of State in 1945, Acheson stated that Russia should have a share in the administration of Japan.

12. He sponsored the Hiss brothers unreservedly to Assistant Secretary of State Adolf Berle, to whom Whittaker Chambers had mentioned them as Soviet agents. In 1946 he used his influence with the FBI to save Alger Hiss; he publicly and officially refused to turn his back on Alger Hiss after 20 jurors had found him guilty of perjury about espionage.

13. He acted as counsel for Lauchlin Currie, former administrative assistant to Presidents Roosevelt and Truman, when Currie appeared before a congressional committee, charged by both Whittaker Chambers and Elizabeth Bentley with having aided their espionage network.

14. On April 18, 1947, without investigation, he cleared John Carter Vincent, chief of the vitally important Far Eastern Division of the State Department, of charges of procommunism filed by a United States Senator. In his letter he professed complete ignorance of official published Communist programs for world-wide conquest, especially in the Far East.

15. Acheson headed the American delegation in the formation of UNRRA, where he insisted on the veto to please Russia, and according to former Polish Ambassador Jan Ciechanowski, steadily supported all Soviet demands. Thus he rendered the United States impotent to control or investigate UNRRA, although this country supplied the overwhelming bulk of its funds.

16. As head of the State Department unit arranging for the Dumbarton Oaks Conference, Acheson secured the appointment of Alger Hiss as Director of the Division of International Security in charge of American preparations for the UN, as adviser to Secretary Stettinius and President Roosevelt at Yalta, and as first Secretary General of the UN.

17. On July 20, 1946 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 9714), Mr. Acheson stated that there were no Communists in the State Department, and that only one had been fired for that reason. The first statement proved to be untrue.

18. In spite of documented charges of softness toward communism against Ambassador Philip Jessup, Mr. Acheson has made him top American foreign policy adviser both in Europe and Asia.

19. Speaking in welcome to the "Red Dean" of Canterbury at Madison Square Garden, November 14, 1945, Under Secretary of State Acheson said:

"Never in the past has there been any place on the globe where the vital interests of the American and Russian peoples have clashed or even been antagonistic—and there is no objective reason to suppose that there should * * * be such a place. * * * We understand and agree with them that to have friendly governments along her borders is essential both for the security of the Soviet Union and for the peace of the world."

20. Acheson recognized Tito's Communist government of Yugoslavia on December 22, 1945, without demanding the free elections provided for at Yalta.

21. Against the advice of Ambassador Arthur Bliss Lane in 1946, Mr. Acheson approved a loan of $90,000,000 to Communist Poland, then represented by Donald Hiss of the Acheson law firm.

22. The Lilienthal Atomic Energy Committee was appointed in October 1946, on Acheson's recommendation, without the knowledge of his superior, Secretary of State Byrnes, or of Bernard Baruch, who headed our Atomic Commission to the UN.

23. Acheson fronted for the Acheson-Lilienthal atomic energy report, which proposed turning over atomic secrets to Russia on promise of peaceful uses, but without inspection.

24. On May 1, 1946, Acting Secretary of State Acheson announced that invitations to attend the Bikini A-bomb tests on July 1 had been extended to the Soviet Government.

25. On December 16, 1945, Under Secretary Acheson received Juan Negrin, head of the Communist group of Spanish loyalists. He refused to receive Fernando de los Rios, head of the anti-Communist group. Four days later he received Milton Wolff, commander of the subversive Abraham Lincoln Brigade and Congressman VITO MARCANTONIO, and promised them, according to the Daily Worker, to intervene with Franco on behalf of two condemned Communists.

26. Everybody except Mr. Acheson has known all along that the Communist forces in China and North Korea were armed and directed by Russia; that American prisoners are executed by order of Russia, exactly as Polish prisoners were executed in the Katyn Forest. Yet Mr. Acheson permitted Chinese Communist delegates to accuse this country of aggression in Formosa while American soldiers were still waiting for permission to fight the enemy with all means at MacArthur's command.

It must be said that President Truman, in approving and defending the policy and behavior of the ruling State Department clique, has made himself ultimately responsible for them, for the policy, and for the debacle to which it has led. It is also true that his responsibility is shared by a majority in Congress, and by a large majority of the newspapers. Those who have not protested against the errors which have resulted in the enslavement of one-third of the world and the terrorization of the rest of it, must share in the responsibility for those errors.

The President's Message

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Julius Applebaum, president of the Brooklyn Bar Association, which appeared in the October issue of the Brooklyn Barrister:

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE

(By Julius Applebaum)

In writing this Presidential message, the problem is choice rather than lack of subjects.

WAR DUTIES

That people of thought and stability the world over are deeply concerned with the imminence of global war is a sad commentary on civilization. Some contend that it is useless or too late to review the past and determine who and what forces are at fault for the failures or betrayals resulting in the present condition. I do not subscribe to such view. I firmly believe that we cannot save the Nation and the world's future generations from destruction unless we avoid the betrayals and the failures of the past and unless we adopt and adhere to sound and just principles in the future. It is in that respect that the bar owes a sacred duty. Whether its voice in the past was not sufficiently heard or whether its voice was not sufficiently loud and courageous, is still to be determined.

Since peace and order in the world are essentially based on agreement and law, the lawyers are best equipped and primarily responsible for proper guidance. There never was a time when there was greater need for a courageous bar to rise above petty political considerations or affiliations to its full responsibility to the Nation and to the world.

A GREAT STATESMAN'S VIEW

Some years ago, I was at the office of a man whose services to the people of this State and of this Nation are a matter of history. During the last two decades and throughout the world, regret has steadily mounted that this Nation had not made more use of his extraordinary ability as executive and statesman, his fine, native intelligence, his unswerving truthfulness, and his unquestioned honesty. During a respite from our business conference, we chatted on extraneous subjects. He knew of my interest in improving the judicial system and the judiciary. He said to me: "Applebaum, the curse of the judiciary is the practice of frequently picking men for the bench not because they are outstanding, qualified lawyers but because the leaders want an Irish Catholic, a Jew, a Protestant, an Italian, or a Pole to round out the ticket for political expediency." I agreed with him.

The place: Empire State Building.

The man: Alfred E. Smith.

What applies to the judiciary applies with almost equal force to every other office of Government. Good government and the people suffer either when there is discrimination against a qualified man by reason of his race or religion or when the selection of a man is made solely because of his race or religion. The latter selection is no compliment to the man or to his race or religion. Moreover, if votes of citizens of any race or religion can be procured or purchased by naming an unqualified member of their group to appease or to please them they demonstrate that they are not qualified for American citizenship. Such practice should be fought with equal vigor as discrimination. Both are un-American—both destructive of our Government and institutions. Lawyers can and should condemn both practices.

TWO FOUL BLOWS

Throughout its history, our court of appeals has maintained the finest judicial tradition and has been held in the highest esteem throughout the country by bench and bar. One of the foremost qualities has always been the total absence of cliques or blocs among its members, a characteristic that has been destructive of high reputation elsewhere.

Within the past week of this writing, two foul blows were struck at the court of appeals.

First. When the name of one of its distinguished members was suggested for the Democratic gubernatorial nomination, one Louis Hollander, purporting to speak for the CIO Political Action Committee, made the statement that that jurist's record showed antilabor and racial basis. Mr. Hollander's statement was shocking and baseless.

Second. Gov. Thomas E. Dewey's reference to and his own comments on the Hollander attack in his, the Governor's, public announcement stating the reasons why he would be a candidate for reelection, was an act of statesmanship of very low quality.

I say that the attack was upon the court rather than upon the jurist in question, for he, by a life devoted to high ideals and to able and honorable public service, had immunized himself from such petty attack. Prejudice or bias against labor or against any group or against any race or religion is foreign to his character and to the life he has lived.

Spain's Repudiation of Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF RFPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following inspiring address of the Most Reverend Richard J. Cushing, D. D., Archbishop of Boston, to officers and leaders of the Holy Name Society, on Sunday, December 3, 1950:

Each year at this time I meet with you so that we may take stock of the past and make our prayerful plans for the future.

This year we meet under particularly sobering circumstances. When last we assembled I begged you to pray for the church. I pointed out to you some of her enemies' designs upon her welfare here in America. You will remember that I quoted to you the drunken, but very ominous attack made upon the church by a national radio commentator and I pointed out the relationship of his drunken talk to the sober campaign against Catholic schools, Catholic charities, organized Catholic life of every kind as of this time a year ago. I asked you to pray for the church.

Today I ask you to pray for America. We may well doubt whether she has ever been in greater need of prayers at home and of friends abroad than she is this week. The common people of America, by their charitable efforts, their travels, their letters, gifts, and good deeds of every kind, have done everything possible to make friends for us in Europe, Asia, and elsewhere. Organized efforts by the Government have been directed toward the same end, particularly through gigantic relief programs and constructive measures like the Marshall plan.

But some diplomats have diminished the effectiveness of these efforts by the manner in which they have seemed willing to use these means of influencing friends in order also to alienate friends and to create enemies. We must pray that our leaders, finally awakened to the dangers in which our Nation stands, will put an end to this foolhardiness and make the friends we badly need among people who have long desired to be our friends.

I refer particularly to nations like Spain and Portugal. It is an appalling piece of hypocrisy which talks of relief to starving Yugoslavia and yet seeks to starve Spain. It is contemptible politics, contemptible morality, contemptible diplomacy, and, at the moment, contemptible patriotism, to subsidize the Communist regime of Tito and to refuse the hand of friendship to the one nation in Europe which has been resisting communism for 20 solid years, years during which some of our leaders were ready and willing to appease the Reds.

I have never made any public pronouncement of any kind concerning Spain. People who have spoken up in tribute to the Spanish people's heroic overthrow of the Communist conspiracy have been labeled Fascists, reactionaries, and enemies of human freedom. Name calling of that kind is not as common, or at least not as public as it used to be before the Reds embarrassed their sympathizers here in America. The critics of Spain and the friends of communism have grown more cautious for reasons which are shrieked in the headlines this week. We would be fools, however, foolish citizens and foolish Catholics, if we supposed they have changed their minds.

Communists and Communist sympathizers never change their minds. They change their line, they change their tactics, they change their addresses, they change their names, they change their countries and their contacts, but they never change their minds.

They are seeking now in America what they sought in Korea a year ago, in China 2 years ago, in Hungary 3 years ago, in Yugoslavia before that, and what they successfully obtained in all these places, sometimes with our help or connivance. It is the same thing that they sought in Spain 15 years ago and which the Spanish people flatly refused to give them. For that refusal Spain has been paying ever since.

One would not mind if the reprisal against Spain had merely come from those who admit that they sought the destruction of Spain, from acknowledged Communists and Red sympathizers. But the reprisals have been directed against the Spanish people and are directed to this very day by men who claim that they speak for us, for America and for democracy.

The reprisals against the Spanish people have taken many forms—the positive form of constant repetition of lies about Spain by men in high places and low; the systematic spread through the liberal press, some non-Catholic pulpits, and certain lecture halls of the Communist propaganda concerning Spain. The reprisal has also taken the negative form of a cold-blooded, calculated effort to freeze the Spanish people out of organized society; to ignore their contributions to the security of the Western World; to deny their right to be heard and to be helped; to starve them into the repudiation of the Government forced upon them by the same international communism which is now forcing upon us days of frenzied planning and nights of tortured sleep. For it is no longer Spaniards, but Americans who are being blown to bits as part of the plan first made clear in Madrid, Barcelona, and the Austrias 15 years ago.

The gesture to offer token help to Spain recently made by the Congress is a tardy recognition of our debt to Spain, but it is a welcome one. If we have so many millions of dollars and tons of supplies to give to Tito, whose men shot American soldiers, whose "kangaroo" courts have outraged the spiritual brethren of millions of American people, whose orators have slandered American ideals and policies, then surely it is proper that we aid the Spanish people. They first bore the brunt of the savagery we are now beginning to taste in the Far East. They first sounded the alarm we are now attempting to echo. They gave their blood, their valor, and all else they had to fight back an enemy whose existence we denied until he turned on us.

We are told that we must help the Communists of Yugoslavia because they are defying the savage threat of Soviet imperialists. We might, therefore, conclude that we should even more gladly help those non-Communists who have not merely defied but have defeated the savage threat of the same imperialists within the borders of Spain.

We are told that it is in our Nation's interest to keep Soviet power out of one of Europe's most strategic areas. We might, therefore, conclude that we should help even more a nation which has been the object of Soviet designs against all the European peninsula, the first nation in which an armed effort to establish Soviet power was made and successfully frustrated.

We are told that the continued independence of Yugoslavia is of great importance to the security of the United Nations and to its partners in the common defense against the threat of Soviet aggression. We might, therefore, conclude that the same is true of the continued independence of Spain, the first nation the Soviet attempted to subjugate.

We are told that aid to Yugoslavia is a part of our effort to educate those parts of the world still hovering between democracy and communism concerning the evils of the latter and the merits of our system of government. In the case of the Spanish people that work of education is more than half done. They are the one people in Europe who do not need to be told the evils of communism. There is not a single town in all Spain; there is not a single family, not one, in all Spain which has not learned this lesson in the bloody school of Communist violence. There is not a single town in all Spain which hasn't tasted what communism has to offer. There is not a single diocese which does not have its list of martyred priests, nuns, and devoted laity. If our relief programs have for their partial purpose to provide education against communism, than the Spaniards have qualified for their place among our disciples—and their qualifications have been increased, not diminished, by the lies told about them here in America and among the United Nations during the past 15 years.

There must be very few people left who do not now realize who started these lies and who has kept them going and why. We may well thank God, as Catholics and as Americans, that the tide is beginning to turn and that we now may hear the truth about Spain; the truth about what Spain suffered from communism; the truth about what Spain did to prevent the spread of communism; the truth about what Spain can still do to prevent the spread of communism; that truth about Spain's place in Christendom and Spain's place in the Western World.

It may now be possible, at long last, to inquire and publicize the truth about Spain as told by our American Ambassador there during the recent war, Prof. Carleton Hayes. His book Mission to Spain received a systematic soft-pedalling from the fellow travelers and Red sympathizers who were so much more powerful when it was first published than they are now—thanks to the persistent, patient patriotism of men like Tom Murphy and those who have exposed the friends of communism in the Government bureaucracy, in the entertainment world, the publishing field, education and social circles, and political action.

We are told that even though Tito tramples both faith and freedom under foot, still we should give him aid since, as Christians, we are bound to love even our enemies. This kind of talk always reminds us of the warning of the poet that the Devil can cite Scripture for his purpose. It is true that Christians are commanded to love their enemies. But that commandment does not require them to treat their friends with contempt; to starve their neighbors merely because they are not enemies; or to turn friends into enemies so that they may be eligible for our affection and aid.

If moral or humanitarian consideration require that we forgive Tito, then they certainly require that we forgive Spain whatever fancied case against the Spanish people we are told exists. They also require that we welcome Spain, a tried and tested foe of communism, a proven friend of Christendom, into whatever alliances of mutual benefit are being concocted in the present effort to turn back the tide of communism.

Certainly we are bound to make friends with our enemies; but no less certainly we are bound to make friends of our friends; to build on whatever foundations for friendship may exist; to pay due tribute to those who have proved themselves our friends by suffering at the hands of enemies who were practicing to turn on us.

I hope that you men will express your American and Christian satisfaction with the actions of those representatives who have helped make possible aid to Spain. I hope you will make clear to those who seek to prevent aid to Spain that their line is wearing thin, and that those who know where the real evil lies in the world at the moment are weary of that line, weary unto death.

So, too, the mask is off in China, and for that, too, we should be grimly grateful. We shall hear less talk about agrarian reformers in China, now that the agrarian reformers have beat their plowshares into swords with which to slay our sons and brothers. We shall hear less about agrarian reformers, but we must not forget who they were who tried to sell the agrarian reformers to us.

Catholics and Americans, we have earned the right to be particularly indignant about what is happening in China. It is just a little less than 2 years ago that I spoke to a Holy Name Society communion breakfast in St. Bridget's Parish, Sunday morning, January 9, 1949. At that time I ventured to speak about China. The very people who are now telling us what scoundrels the Chinese Communists have proved to be, were then telling us that non-Communist Chinese were scoundrels for not abdicating in favor of the Chinese Reds.

At that time the representatives of free China were being forced out by the Red Fascist Chinese Communists—while we did and said little to prevent the destruction of free China and the rise of Communist China. We used to be told: "Don't get excited about China. Wait and see. Red fascism may overrun China, but it can never beat China down." Well, it did beat China down * * * and we stood by and held its coat while it did the brutal job. We waited * * * and we have seen. We have seen what we now see. Having beat China down, it proposes to beat us down and all the world with us.

At that time I begged your prayers for China. Speaking to the Holy Name Society that morning I said: "There is something very strange about the general moral paralysis and ominous silence in the face of what is happening in China. The apparent moral paralysis is preventing any effective action in behalf of the free Chinese people and their legitimate government. The ominous silence bids fair to prevent public discussion of one of the most cynical, sinister, and dangerous developments in the march of Red imperialism across the prostrate forms of liberty-loving nations. Both the moral paralysis and the disturbing silence about what is happening in China flows from a dangerous form of defeatism, a defeatism on the part of our leadership which will cost China dearly in the next few months and for which America herself will have to pay an appalling price both at home and abroad before the final chapter of Red fascism has been written."

The prophecy has been fulfilled with sickening speed. At that time I asserted that as Catholics and as Americans we should lift our voices and cry out in protest against the general indifference to the fate of China. I said that we should demand clear commitments, honest reports, a policy of realism in the face of what was happening to faith and to freedom in China. Millions of people all over America felt the same way.

They were told that free China would have to come to terms with the Communist rebels. They were told to forget what no one should ever forget, namely, that wherever you find a Communist you find a spy, and wherever you have a spy, you have a traitor. We were told that China should invite known traitors and avowed spies in its government, and do this as the price of retaining the loyalty and support of our part of the world.

At that time an honorable policy toward China would have been relatively easy. A free China was still possible. Three-fourths of China, outside of Manchuria, was still under the control of free China. The government of the free Chinese had been able to hold its own for many years. With our help then, it could have held its own indefinitely.

We were then fed lies about China by the same liberals and other friends of Red fascism who were lying to us about Spain. Propaganda against the leaders of free China received free rein in our forums, press, universities, and other channels of public opinion. They were the lies we were told about Hungary and the lies we were told about any other nations against which the Red Fascists had designs.

When we refused to help free China we forfeited the friendship of God knows how many millions of people whom we helped drive to despair. The price is now being paid in Korea. It is a bitter price, bitter and bloody, but it will be cheap if it rips the mask once and for all from the face of hypocrisy, concerning who are and who are not the friends of our way of life. It may prevent our having to pay a like price in Europe as a result of refusal to retain and increase the friendship of the Spanish people.

When anyone tells you we should not aid Spain, find out where he stood 2 years ago on aid to China. Find out where he—or she, for that matter—stood on Cardinal Mindszenty, Archbishop Stepinac, Poland, Greece. Find out where they stood on Tito.

What is the practical point of all this? Are we warmongers? Are we disloyal to our own leadership? Whoever makes such charges, knows he lies. We do not seek violence and we have never lifted our voices for war. But we do ask for equity, justice, and charity in the distribution of things which make for peace. We never ask for revolution against constituted authority; we are the last ever to ask such things. But we do ask for realism in the policies of constituting authority toward those who are the agents of revolution, the enemies of authority. We people have to pay as we have to pay when wars come. None have more sons than we. None lost so many in proportion. None have more motives, natural or supernatural, for seeking peace.

You will remember with what resentment we Catholics used to read the accusations of the liberal press or hear the charges of Dr. Oxnam and others that we were attempting to foment a holy war against an imaginary enemy in the east; that we were using religion to gain political objectives when we protested with all our power against the violence of the Red regimes; that we were putting property rights above human rights when we called upon our leaders of the world to protest against Communist aggression, brutality, and administration by extermination.

You will remember how that phrase "holy war" was continually thrown in our faces.

You will remember how impotent we were to persuade our neighbors that the anti-Catholic line was also antidemocratic because it was pro-Communist. It was hard to make people believe that then because those who made no secret of their anti-catholicism still pretended to have no real part with communism. They asserted that they were Socialists at most—agrarian reformers, political liberals, social dreamers, kindly men. They were frank to say that they opposed catholicism, but they pretended that they were no less militantly opposed to communism. They used to shout—their speeches of 3 and 4 years ago are still in the files of the public press—that it would be no escape from communism to fall into the hands of catholicism. They even asserted that, in a choice between the two, they would rather have communism.

These people have, I repeat, changed their line a little lately. They have not, I repeat, changed their minds. They are still anti-Catholic and they lose no chance to prove it. They are still pro-Communist, even when they are obliged to wait in silence the day when it will be safe again to say so.

Nor are they entirely silent about it. The other day Bertrand Russell, who was awarded the Nobel prize, if you please, declared that the only thing he hates on earth is the Catholic Church. He then repeated the alleged parallel between communism and catholicism which used to be drawn by Dr. Oxnam. He made it perfectly clear that, as between the two, he preferred Red fascism.

The exasperating part of all this is that such talk is not considered anti-Communist, antidemocratic, or anti-Christian. As a matter of fact, most of those who indulge in it pretend that it is not even anti-Catholic, though it must be said of Mr. Russell that he is not guilty of this particular hypocrisy. He frankly proclaims that the Catholic Church is the only thing on earth that he hates. Do you think Nobel prizes would be awarded to people who said like things about Jews, Protestants, Quakers, Scientists, or other religious, racial, or like groups?

What must be our reaction to all this? The Catholic approach to the problem of organizing a peaceful world is now what it has always been, despite the verbal attacks of the anti-Catholic or the violence of the Communists. It was restated effectively and beautifully by Monsignor Sheen in the first issue of a new publication called World Missions. He pointed out how Catholic missions are in great degree the home of humanity. One of the primary purposes of our foreign missions is to build not one world but rather one humanity, the one humanity which must exist before a united world is possible. One world is a political and economical concept. One humanity is a divine concept, something only God's grace can achieve. Monsignor Sheen put it well when he said, "The Catholic point of view is that humanity is made one, as a body is made one through a soul. When the Holy Spirit descended upon the Apostles, their discordant elements were fused into one body, and even one mind. The confusion of tongues was undone, and the poor divided speech which men had inherited from Babel's bricklayers now became one language and one mind.

"The purpose of the missions is not to unite the world in one political system or to make other countries all believers in a particular form of democracy, but to allow them great political diversity with unity in spirit. When the early Church received the pentecostal outpouring, her members shared their property in common. This was the creation of one economic world, but the spirit was first. The Communists assume that if men share property, that therefore they are one in spirit. The fallacy is to assume that if four men divide an apple, they become brothers. Rather the Catholic position is that if they are first made brothers in Christ, then they will share the apple. The Catholic who regards the Chinese and Japanese, and Indians, and others, as his potential brothers, will translate this act of faith into positive mission aid, that they may become actual brothers in Christ, to the end that there may be one world because there is one humanity."

Catholic foreign missions are the greatest single spiritual ally to the cause of genuine democracy. Those who love the one, love the other. Those who hate the one, hate no less the other. It is no accident that even as we read in the daily press of the young men murdered for democracy, so we read in the letters from the mission fields of the brave boys and beautiful girls martyred for the foreign missions. The other day a Columban father wrote: "We are receiving very bad news from Korea these days. A few weeks ago Father Garrity found the body of Father Tony Collier. He had been shot to death on June 27. We have just now been instructed to say our masses for Monsignor Pat Brannan and Fathers Curran and O'Brien, who we must presume were put to death on September 26, though their bodies have not been recovered. This still leaves Monsignor Tom Quinlan and four other priests still missing."

The letter is typical. A year ago it would have been of interest to only us Catholics. Now all Americans are beginning to get the point.

Wherefore, this afternoon I join in the resolutions your committee presents to this assembly. But I ask that either by formal resolution or by informal conviction you leave here united in: (1) Gratitude that at last token action has been taken to encourage the Spanish people in their repudiation of communism; (2) satisfaction, not complacent, but realistic, that at last the mask is off in China, as it long has been in Spain; (3) recognition that the cause of Catholic missions deserves a first place in the prayers, interests, and loyalties of all Holy Name men.

Men of the Holy Name Society: I repeat, pray for America. Pray for our President. Pray for his advisers, military, diplomatic, and political. He is faced with decisions such as few men in all recorded history have had to make. Pray that he will be God's instrument, our President, and God's man.

The Great Gerrymander of 1952

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, today, from an unimpeachable source, to whom I swore secrecy, I got the real lowdown on the congressional reapportionment plan for 1952 in New York State.

If this is true, and I am given to believe it is, there is a sinister, yet influential cabal in Albany, already at work, bent on carving up our Thirty-seventh Congressional District into little pieces and committing it to the political slaughterhouse.

They vow to make dear old Broome County the insignificant tail of a tremendous new district which will stretch clear across the State almost to Buffalo.

The Broome area, which contains the Triple Cities has become one of the most populous and important sections of upState New York. It is unbelievable that those now conspiring in our State capital would go to such lengths as I will shortly describe to relegate our distinctive community to a second- or third-class category by placing Broome County at the extreme end of an elongated geographical shape and leave us with no voice, no influence and nothing in common with distant and exotic subdivisions they will throw us into.

Broome County is large enough and important enough to compose a single congressional district. Why should we be compelled to bow to the whims, the prejudices, the jealousies of lesser areas 200 miles distant just because caprice and double dealing are now uppermost in the minds of a certain Albany clique?

I for one resent this insult and I am going to do everything within my power to stop it. I hope our State representatives will be able to peer behind the curtains of corruption and smash this plot before it gets anywhere.

These wreckers should leave the Thirty-seventh Congressional District as it is, or nearly so. Broome and Chenango, for instance, have more in common than almost any two counties in the State. I should know, because I have enjoyed the great honor of representing them both for the past six terms in this House.

Their real objective, of course, is to change Broome County from a center of civilization into a political nonentity by putting her into this monstrous jumble of counties they hope to call a district. Actually, their present scheme would make the proposal half as big as the State itself.

While I am not sufficiently fortunate to be informed of the actual counties that will go into this crazy quilt, I do know they want to gerrymander us into an area which will encompass the home of another Member of Congress, and I have already heard him mentioned.

My friends in Broome County will likewise be interested in learning that some other counties of this proposed new pocket borough, of which Broome is the hind end, lie in strange new territory which never has had and never will have anything in common with the valley of fair play.

The wiseacres will, of course, claim that I am being sectional in my complaint that Broome is to be made the tail of the kite instead of the center of the new district. If they do, I will freely admit it.

But any fair-minded person and certainly everybody from Broome County will stoutly maintain that ours is too important, too principal, and too large a section of the State of New York to bow to the petty desires of cabalistic carvers and submit to the humility they are forcing upon us.

In short, I am strongly opposed to the radical departure from decency now prompting the plotters who want to gerrymander Broome County into political oblivion and cut up our present Thirty-seventh Congressional District into unrecognizable strips of no man's land.

Those who believe in our present system of representative government realize that to make our congressional districts any larger than they now are, renders our American system impossible to practice. It is physically out of the question for any one person to adequately represent more than the present number of people in the average bailiwick.

Then, too, continually revising our congressional districts causes general confusion on the part of the people. They are never familiar with their representatives in Congress, in spite of our constitutional admonition which declares that the House, in particular, should be close to the people.

Throwing everybody into new boundaries causes a Member of Congress to become completely dependent upon political bosses instead of the rank and file. He does not have time to get acquainted with the people, before an election, and must look askance to the chosen few of any section if the people themselves do not know him.

New York State is making the mistake of its history, if the legislature consents to follow the course being charted by the gang I have mentioned. Larger congressional districts will put an end to direct representation. We may as well revert to electing Members at large throughout the State, because they will be as far removed from the people under these new proposals.

Newspapers have it that an attempt will be made to delay a decision on the new districts until the fall of 1951. They infer that the plotters do not want to reveal their gutter work until almost on the eve of the 1952 elections.

Oh, I suppose some of the fair-haired will be "tipped off" as to what new territory they will have to campaign in. I am taking no chances, however.

If the legislature refuses to make public the congressional districts by early 1951, I will have to campaign in every up-State county next summer and am making my plans accordingly. I will also have to blanket the entire State of New York with wave on wave of franked speeches in order to have my name familiar to the voters.

Frankly, I am taking no chances, because I know only too well the chicanery, the deceit, the shadow-boxing, and the skulduggery which are profuse behind the dark curtains hiding the pompous motions, the nefarious saws, and the deadly knives of the gerrymanderers.

It will take a lot more energy to campaign over a radius of 200 miles to the north, the southeast, and the west of Broome County, but I am prepared to do it. These "birds" are not going to gerrymander me out of Congress if I can help it.

It will take a lot of paper and envelopes to cover the same territory in which I will have to ring doorbells. But if the meat-ax politicians in Albany refuse to make known our several new congressional districts and who is thrown in with whom, I will have no alternative.

Granted there will be a lot of wasted motions traveling in every direction up-State to campaign, but the pocket-borough craftsmen offer me no choice.

Let us hope that right thinking men will be able to prevail upon the councils of ignominy, and produce, before the normal term of the legislature adjourns next spring, the geographical answers of where our new congressional districts begin and where they leave off.

And once again, let us hope that Broome County will be the center, not the tail end of whatever the masterminds of gerrymander conceive.

Excess-Profits Tax—"Special Privilege" Wins

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 14, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, as part of my remarks I am including an editorial by Mr. David Lawrence which appears in the December 15, 1950, issue of U. S. News and World Report:

"SPECIAL PRIVILEGE" WINS

(By David Lawrence)

Where were the liberals last week when the House of Representatives voted to give special privileges to big business?

Where were the liberals who have told us for years now that fair competition is the cardinal principle of the free-enterprise system?

Where were the liberals who have alined themselves for decades behind the slogan of Thomas Jefferson—"Equal rights for all, special privileges for none?"

Where were the liberals who have prated so eloquently for the last several years about the need for protecting small business in America?

The truth is the so-called liberals abandoned their faith—they allowed themselves to be deceived by the mere title of a piece of legislation without really examining its substance.

Because it was called a tax on excess profits they superficially thought they had done their duty—they had soaked the rich.

But, as it turns out, they have soaked the weaker competitors, the marginal competitors, the middle-sized businesses, the new businesses, and they have reimposed the pro-monopoly rule of tax rates which has twice been enacted in America under the guise of a wartime revenue producer.

For the new tax bill simply means that the more successful competitor will pay out fewer dollars in taxes than the less successful competitor.

It means that the company with the largest amount of accumulated capital will pay less taxes than the company with the smaller amount of capital.

It means that the company which has earned the largest amount of profits for the 4 years from 1946 through 1949 will be given an advantage of a lower tax rate—lower than that which a company that has earned less profits in these 4 years must now pay.

It means that the company which has struggled through the reconversion period after World War II and earned no profits at all or just broken even shall pay high tax rates as a penalty for its misfortune. It means that these struggling companies must be prevented from accumulating out of their earnings any reserves to meet subsequent competition with the larger companies. It compels the banker to turn down the smaller company which will have so little left out of profits annually hereafter that it cannot pay off in 5 years, for instance, the money it may need to borrow for better plant or equipment.

To all this the glib answer will be made by defenders of the bill that there are effective relief provisions available or that growth problems are dealt with equitably in the proposed law, or that credits are to be given to certain businesses earning less than $25,000 a year. It is the group between $25,000 and $100,000 which will be hardest hit. They will pay in many cases a higher rate per thousand than the companies earning $1,000,000 a year.

If the liberals in Congress believe in the efficacy of so-called relief provisions they can easily debunk them by calling for the actual records of what happened after World War I and after World War II in the application of these same provisions.

Can anybody in Congress find that the relief provisions and growth clauses which were in the law during World War II resulted in any real equalization? Can there be any denial that the smaller and weaker competitors paid taxes at a rate higher than the bigger companies in their respective fields?

With some well-intentioned but futile changes, the ambiguous phraseology of the World War II law now is being inserted in the provisions of the new bill.

This means that the well-entrenched and well-heeled can be happy again. The struggling competitor who has been told this is a land or real competition in which the Government presumably interposes no barriers and obstructions to free enterprise will grieve at the hypocrisy of modern politics, but he will be helpless.

Small wonder that the stock market has taken in its stride the passage of the new tax bill. Small wonder that even the Republican leaders of the conservative school in the Senate are talking of hastening the passage of the House bill with some minor changes.

There is only one fair way to tax—across the boards. Every corporation should pay the same rate of taxes on every thousand dollars of profit earned. Plenty of revenue can be collected by a straight increase in corporation tax rates without the tricky devices of average earnings and investment capital bases.

The excess-profits bill is no hardship for the monopolists but it spells the death knell of middle-sized business. Smokescreens have again deceived the liberals in both our political parties. They have passed not an excess-profits bill but an excess-penalty bill.

Let us not hear honeyed words again from President Truman about the little man and his friend the Democratic Party. The administration wrote the new tax bill and put it through the House. Are there any liberals left in the Senate?

A New Aristocracy: The Russian Communists

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I wish to include an article by Roy L. Deal. He is a lawyer of Winston-Salem, N. C., formerly a special agent, Federal Bureau of Investigation, superior court judge, and colonel, JAGD, AUS. He has studied many of the publications on the Bolsheviks since the revolution of 1917. This article is a revision of speeches he has been making since his return from the Army in 1946.

There is no such thing as communism. There are only Communists. To speak of "communism" implies a set of principles or theories or an ideology. These the Communists do not have. There is only a group of some five million men in Russia who call themselves "Communists." They have no ideals or principles; they have no ideology. They are in truth but a self-perpetrating aristocracy of about 3 percent of the Russian people, who have arbitrarily seized power.

The Communist Party in Russia is a closed party. Its discipline is strict and severe. New members are chosen from the youth for their ability, skill, and ruthlessness in advancing the cause of the Communists.

The members of the Communist Party in Russia constitute the most ruthless, powerful, and efficient group of men in the world. They are the only political party, and the other 97 percent of the people of Russia cannot belong to the Communist or to any other party because there is no other. These 5,000,000 Communists permeate all government, and all industry and agriculture, holding the key positions. How the Communist aristocracy in Russia is organized within itself is a deep secret. How and when they decide to purge members who do not come up to their standards of efficiency and discipline is also a secret. But their method of internal organization must be powerful.

These 5,000,000 brilliant men, efficiently organized for ruthless action, without conscience, without principle, have as objectives the perpetration of their group in Russia and the encroachment of their group over the whole world.

They are accomplishing this skillfully. They have four chief weapons of attack: one, the communistic or socialistic principles of Karl Marx which they use as bait; two, the appeal to the selfishness and greed of the less prosperous classes of the world against those who are better off; three, resort to military force through satellites, and their own army only when sure of success.

But the Russian Communists are vulnerable to their own methods of attack in a greater degree than are private businessmen in free countries. The peoples of the world should know that the Communists are the wealthiest and the most powerful hereditary aristocracy the world has ever seen. The peoples of the world should constantly have brought before them pictures and stories of the beautiful resorts of the Communists on the Black Sea, their beautiful estates near their great cities and factories; that the Communist Party member has wealth and privilege infinitely above that of the ordinary worker; and that such aristocracy, having now been in power for 33 years, is becoming hereditary because so large a proportion of the new party members are the children of the original party members.

Call the attention of the people to the fact that the greatest ambition in life of anyone born in Russia would be to obtain a Communist Party card, and that once he has obtained it, he has acquired for himself and his posterity all the special privileges, both economic and political, that greed and avarice could wish to grasp.

Again, imagine the Russian system transplanted to America. If there are 150,000,000 Americans, on the same proportion the membership of the Communist aristocracy in America would be limited to about 4,500,000. How would the average American worker like to have a privileged group of 4,500,000 aristocrats ruling him politically and economically, and possessing and enjoying all of the wealth of the state through control of the state, wth the further likelihood that their children will be given every preference in becoming party members over the children of the mere workers or nonparty members?

The people should know that where the Communists are in power, it is a closed party; only where they are not in power is it an open party, welcoming all to the fold. But once power has been acquired, it immediately becomes quite clear that many who thought they were party members were really not. The recent purges in the Eastern-European countries prove this. If and when the Communists take over in America, what a surprise it is going to be to some of our American Communists to learn that their cards are the wrong color, or have not been properly countersigned, or something.

The Communists are conquering the world largely through the appeal to the greed and envy of the masses. That same weapon should be turned against the Communists because they are an aristocracy which has all privilege, economic and political.

In our fight against the Russian Communists these facts should be driven home at every opportunity. Thousands of illustrations are possible. Names of young Communists who got into the Communist aristocracy by birth, such as the son of Stalin, now a lieutenant general in command of the Russian air forces, should constantly be brought before the people. Pictures of the limousines of the privileged Communists; pictures of their villas and estates; their special food stores; pictures of their parties; pictures of their fine clothes in contrast to the shoddy clothes of the workers—everything to arouse understanding on the part of the workers of their inferior lot and of the special privileges of the Communist aristocracy. In fact, we should quit referring to communism, or even Communists, but we should constantly refer to the Communist aristocracy. Nobody likes an aristocrat, unless he thinks he is one.

And it should be pointed out that we probably would not have an independent Communist aristocracy in America. Look at Yugoslavia. Tito tried to establish his Communist aristocracy independent of the Russians, and he got excommunicated, with the whole Communist world against him. He'll be assassinated some day, as was Trotsky. The Russian Communist aristocracy does not trust the Jew, because he is truly international-minded, and so the Jews now amount to little in the Russian Communist aristocracy. The Negroes would serve no better. I challenge any Negro anywhere in the world to prove that he has a card to membership in the Russian Communist Party.

The Communists have no faith in God or religion; they believe that man is greedy and selfish and full of envy. They know that this greed, selfishness, and envy are magnified a hundred-fold in the group, and so they appeal to groups and minorities to arouse their envy against those who have been more successful in our free enterprise. They conceive that they have established a world aristocracy limited in membership to the Russian Communist aristocrats; that they have put into practical operation the plan of Plato's Republic; that they being the most efficient, ruthless, and able group in Russia, should control not only Russia, but the world. Like Plato, they dismiss democracy with a laugh because "democracy is government by those least qualified."

The Russian Communist aristocracy, by reason of its power, efficiency, and ruthlessness, is the greatest danger the world has ever faced. Can a democracy protect itself against it? Up to now we have signally failed because we have failed to understand and to make the people of the world recognize the Communists for what they are—a powerful, privileged, select, perpetual aristocracy of combined economic and political power. Let's tell the world about it.

The Communists pretend to the world that their bible is Karl Marx's Das Kapital, and that they believe in the principles of socialism. Not so; their bible is Plato's Republic—in a debased form. Read the Republic again with this idea in mind. You will identify the small, coherent, efficient group of guardians as the members of the Communist Party—the superior men who, because of their superior efficiency, should and will rule the state. You will identify the iron curtain of the Communists in that ancient Greek's story of those who, having been permitted from infancy to see only shadows on a blank wall, mistook the shadows for reality, and reality for shadows.

In the hereditary feature now developing in Russia's new aristocracy, the Communists have departed from Plato's plan. His guardians were not to marry or have families, but only mistresses. This, too, the Communists started to follow in Russia in the early days of the revolution. By "arrangements" rather than marriage, unrestricted divorce, and children being wards of the state, they sought to destroy the family. But human nature rebelled, and the family came back, with the inevitable tendency toward passing the party card on to the next generation. All aristocracies in the past have become hereditary and all hereditary aristocracies have become decadent, but that may take many generations.

Our leaders have not been able to cope with the Communists because of their tendency to think of them as a political party, or to think of Russia as a country ruled by a one-man dictator, Stalin. They are neither, and they act like neither a political party nor a dictatorship. They are a ruling class of superior men, disregarding all objectives but their own perpetuation in power. Being a small percentage of the people, they must hold on to and expand their power or die. Therefore, they cannot compromise. Like the Nazis (another group of "superior" men), they must win or die.

In their use of twisted words and distorted ideas, which are their most useful weapon, they have nearly always won against our people. We have permitted them to select the words with which to misstate our ideas, and then we dumbly use their words ourselves. No trial lawyer will permit the opposing attorney to state his case for him; he has sense enough to know that he must state his own case or lose.

Let's examine some of their words and slogans which we, in our sweet innocence, have adopted. "Capitalism" and "capitalists." Why, the very word "capitalist" brings up a vision of a fat Wall Streeter in high hat, money bulging from pockets, with his feet on the necks of the masses. In truth, the Communists and the democracies both practice capitalism, or the accumulation of wealth with which to produce goods. They preach state capitalism, and we, private capitalism. They suppress the fact that under their state capitalism a privileged 3 percent own the state, and thereby the wealth. We do not emphasize enough that under our private capitalism the majority of the people have a share of capital wealth.

The Communists say that they are establishing a classless society—all men belonging to one class, the workers. That's closer to the truth than they usually are. They really have reduced their society to two classes: the 3 percent ruling class, and the 97 percent regimented workers.

But our writers and diplomats continue to refer to Molotov and Vishinsky as "representatives of the Soviet Republic" or "representatives of Russia." To call them "representatives of the Russian ruling class" or "apostles of the superior 3 percent of the Russian people" or just plain "3 percenters" suits me better.

What a grand ring has the slogan "dictatorship of the proletariat." That sounds as if the 97 percent making up the masses ruled the state, but no, the 3 percent rule the 97 percent. This dictatorship is of the proletariat, not by and for it.

"Exploitation of the workers" by capital has a sadistic, ugly ring. But state capitalism (controlled by the privileged 3 percent) can do far more exploiting than can private capitalism in a free society. There are no true labor unions or strikes in Russia.

The superior Communists seem to work on Machiavelli's theory that "it is impossible to underestimate the intelligence of the masses."

The Russian Communists have been appallingly successful in world politics.

Five years ago any American who prophesied that by 1950 we would be at war with our historic friends, the Chinese, would have been called a wild man. Within 5 years from now any surviving American, looking back to 1950, will ask, "How could our leaders have been so insane in 1950 as to fight the Chinese?"

It was clear from the beginning that the Communist invasion of South Korea was a trap planned by our only real enemies, the Russian Communists. They planned from the beginning to throw their dupes, the Chinese, at the right time into the war. This they timed with extreme skill, to make it look like an act of spontaneous defense by the Chinese for fear of invasion by us.

If we fight the millions of trained Chinese soldiers, supplied with arms by the Russians, we will be bled white (as were the Japanese) while our real enemy, the Russian Communists, will grow relatively so strong we will be helpless before them.

If we use the atomic bomb against the Chinese, the rest of the world throughout all history would condemn us.

We should announce that we will not fight our friends, the Chinese people, and that we will even withdraw entirely from Korea to avoid it.

The psychological gain with the Chinese would largely offset the loss of face in retiring from Korea. But, regardless of loss of face, we must get out or lose our Nation.

Ten years ago, any American who prophesied that by now we would have destroyed Germany and Japan and built up the Russian Communists to the greatest world power, would have been called a madman. But we have done just that.

These appalling errors have been made and are being made because our leaders have not understand the nature of the Russian Communists.

Since 1941, we have acted and reacted almost exactly as the able and skillful Russian Communists have expected us to, or have planned for us to.

They planned to get us into war with the Chinese, so here we go.

We must conserve and build up our strength—not dissipate it. When we use the atomic bomb, let it be against our only real enemies, the Russian Communists.

Let us at least understand the facts and bring them clearly and truthfully before the people. Understanding by the public is the breath of life in a democracy.

More on the Lie-and-Smear Medical Campaign of Omaha Doctors

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 14, 1950

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, the following is part 12 in the lie-and-smear campaign series of the Omaha doctors:

[From the Omaha World-Herald of October 28, 1950]

AMA ASSAILED BY O'SULLIVAN—GROUP TRIED TO BLOCK HEALTH LEGISLATION

Representative EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN Friday night charged the American Medical Association had tried to block all major health legislation for more than a decade.

"Since the AMA is spearheading the fight for the Republican Party all over the Nation * * * it looks like the Republicans have gone underground with the Communists," he said.

He insisted that he never had favored socialized medicine. "If the doctors who continue to diagnose the President's health program as socialism have no greater skill in their profession, God help their patients."

He and Walter Raecke, of Central City, Democratic candidate for governor, spoke at the third annual dinner of the Douglas County Democratic Club at the Paxton Hotel.

FOR REACTIONARIES

"The present campaign is a cloak and shield for reactionary Democrats and Republicans," Congressman O'SULLIVAN said.

"With my more than 30 years of service to the downtrodden, I am better suited to serve in Congress than my opponent, who never did a worth-while thing in his life," he added.

[From the Omaha World-Herald of November 5, 1950]

DISTRUST HELD FOR O'SULLIVAN—DOCTOR SAYS CHANGED STAND AFTER ELECTION

Doctors have reason to distrust Democrat EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN, who seeks reelection to the House of Representatives, a physician stated Saturday night.

Dr. F. O. Beck gave the reason at a rally at Mount Olive Baptist Church, 3010 R Street.

Dr. Beck said Mr. O'SULLIVAN told the doctors before the last election that he was opposed to socialized medicine. However, Dr. Beck charged, Mr. O'SULLIVAN reversed his stand after being elected.

TWO OTHERS SPEAK

Two other Omaha doctors spoke at the rally sponsored by the healing arts committee.

Dr. W. L. Rumbolz said socialized medicine would be another step down the road to complete socialism.

He said the medical profession has deteriorated in every nation which placed it under a socialized system.

COULD MAKE MORE

Dr. John O'Hearn declared: "We're fighting for the individual freedom of every human being in the United States. Today we're fighting Mr. O'SULLIVAN."

He said doctors could make more money under the proposed socialized medicine plan, but "yet we don't want this thing."

Approximately 50 persons present were urged to support Mr. O'SULLIVAN's opponent, Republican HOWARD BUFFETT.

MEDICAL PLAN NOT ON BALLOT—BUT DOCTOR URGES VOTE FOR BUFFETT

The way to register your ballot against socialized medicine is to vote for Republican HOWARD H. BUFFETT for Congress, Dr. J. Phil Redgwick said Monday.

"Socialized medicine has become so much a part of the Second Congressional District campaign," the nonpartisan doctors committee chairman said, "that some persons probably will expect to find a socialized medicine proposal on the ballot.

"Of course, it will not be on the ballot. But you will find the name of HOWARD BUFFETT on the ballot. And there is no question of how he stands on this important question."

USES BIG LIE

As for his opponent, Representative EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN, Dr. Redgwick said, "His campaign has been characterized by the Hitler technique—that is to tell the big lie and keep repeating it in the hope the people will believe it if repeated often enough."

In this campaign "the big lie" has involved the socialized medicine issue, Dr. Redgwick stated.

In a recent radio address, the doctor said, and later in a printed pamphlet, Mr. O'SULLIVAN stated, "I am now and have always been against socialized medicine; there is no bill pending in either the Senate or House creating socialism or socialized medicine."

SENT 5,000 LETTERS

"That statement," asserted Dr. Redgwick, "is a deliberate falsehood."

In September 1949, Mr. O'SULLIVAN mailed 5,000 letters to his constituents—doctors, dentists, hospitals, etc.—in franked envelopes at Government expense, Dr. Redgwick said.

"These letters," he continued, "contained a pamphlet prepared by the committee for the Nation's health. This is a well-known left-wing organization," he said.

Dr. Redgwick said the pamphlet contains a picture of Senate file 1679, the socialized medicine bill. "The pamphlet," he continued, "explains in detail the administration's seven-point health program."

ONLY SEVEN SECTIONS

"The seventh point," Dr. Redgwick said, "provides for compulsory health insurance. In September 1949," he continued, "Mr. O'SULLIVAN stated that he is favorable to the administration's health program and a few weeks ago at Nebraska City the Congressman said he is for only seven sections of President Truman's national health bill."

"Now, the day before election," Dr. Redgwick said, "a large ad paid for by Labor's League for Political Education states also that Mr. O'SULLIVAN is against socialized medicine and compulsory health insurance.

"Here again is unmistakable evidence of 'the big lie' technique being used to deliberately deceive and confuse the voters in this important election."

ANY CONTROLS LEAD TO MORE—SHAFTON SEES THREAT IN MEDICAL PROFESSION

If the Government can take control of the medical profession, there is nothing to stand in the way of its controlling any other profession or industry.

Giving a layman's point of view on compulsory health insurance, Attorney Edward Shafton Friday might gave this as one of his reasons for supporting Republican HOWARD BUFFETT for Congress.

Mr. Shafton spoke at the Second Congressional District Healing Arts Committee dinner at the American Legion Club.

"Every time an additional power is given to our Government concerning the conduct of our daily lives, we find ourselves closer to being dominated by that Government."

RIGHTS FOR BENEFITS

"The people in America must remember that every time they receive a benefit from the Government, they in turn give up a right and a privilege," he warned.

Mr. Shafton listed as his personal reasons for opposing socialized medicine:

1. I believe in free enterprise and do not believe the Government belongs in business.

2. It will destroy the keen initiative of the men in the medical profession.

3. The science of medicine will be destroyed.

4. I want to select the doctor, nurse, and hospital of my own choosing.

5. I don't want my case history to become public record.

BUFFETT SPEAKS

Mr. BUFFETT, who spoke briefly, said, "If the planners can overwhelm the medical profession, they figure other groups will be a pushover.

"I think they have met their match in Nebraska."

Other speakers were Dr. Maurice C. Howard, Dealing Arts chairman, and Dr. J. Phil Redgwick, Non-Partisan Doctors Committee chairman.

BAN ON BUFFETT BY UNION MEMBERSHIP

The record of HOWARD H. BUFFETT, Republican candidate for Congress, "is an open book, and any attempt on his part to discuss issues would be a waste of his and our time," President Al Witzling of the Omaha Federation of Labor (A. F. of L.) said Saturday.

Mr. BUFFETT had said in a talk that union leaders had refused him the opportunity to appear before them and discuss the issues.

Said Mr. Witzling:

"Mr. BUFFETT knows as well as we that communications are read at union meetings and acted upon by the membership.

"The labor leaders have no control over the votes of the membership, and the fact that he was not asked to appear before any of the unions shows that it was the decisions of thousands of union members—not just the so-called labor leaders."

Mr. Witzling also said that Mr. BUFFETT's statement that labor leaders tried to defeat him on orders from Washington was silly.

HEALTH LETTERS SHOW SWITCH—NOW RUN 3 TO 1 AGAINST COMPULSORY PLAN

KANSAS CITY, MO.—Congressional mail now is running 3 to 1 against compulsory health insurance, Clem Whitaker, director of the national education campaign of the American Medical Association said Tuesday.

Mr. Whitaker spoke before the the twenty-eighth fall clinic of the Kansas City Southwest Clinical Society.

Two years ago, he said, congressional mail favored compulsory health insurance 2½ to 1.

"The doctors of this country can be very prideful citizens for what they have accomplished in stopping the inroads of state socialism in America," Mr. Whitaker said.

HOSPITAL PROTESTS O'SULLIVAN CHARGE

Frank McDevitt, chairman of the Advisory Board of St. Catherine's Hospital, Thursday contradicted Representative EUGENE O'SULLIVAN's statement on Federal help to hospitals.

Mr. O'SULLIVAN said Wednesday that "Creighton Medical School no longer can pay its own way" and that Federal money helped pay for additions at St. Joseph's, St. Catherine's, and other Omaha hospitals.

Asserted Mr. McDevitt:

"That about St. Catherine's Hospital is absolutely as wrong as it could be. We received absolutely no funds for the addition at St. Catherine's Hospital."

A spokesman for the nonpartisan doctors committee said:

"The addition at St. Joseph's Hospital cost $2,000,000. All the financing was completed and arranged before we had any Federal help. Then we were given $65,000 on a $2,000,000 project."

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES SPARK SOCIALIZED MEDICINE PLOT

Dr. M. C. Howard Saturday outlined "the conspiracy to enact a socialized medicine law."

The Healing Arts Committee chairman said the story is printed in the remarks of Representative Forest A. Harness, of Indiana, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 15, 1948.

Reporting on "our most dangerous lobby," the Congressman said the subcommittee which he headed "has uncovered startling evidence of attempts by Federal officials to make big government bigger and to extend by another vast grant of power the authority of the state over the lives of all of us."

The Congressman said his committee found Government employees back of the campaign to pressure Congress into passing a national compulsory insurance law. He said the campaign was planned inside the Government, on Government time, and "supported by the Government publicity and propaganda machine."

"Confronted with these facts, our committee—Democrats and Republicans—voted unanimously to expose them and to turn the evidence over to the FBI and the Department of Justice for prosecution under the law which forbids Federal employees to use Federal funds to influence legislation."

The committee's investigations, Mr. Harness said, showed "the headquarters for the drive for this scheme is in the Federal Security Agency in Washington.

"The FSA is already a vast social-service establishment with 35,000 employees.

"To increase pressure for the scheme, Federal job holders helped to set up two organizations—the Physicians' Forum and the Committee for the Nation's Health—and have been active in both."

The Physicians' Forum's chairman is Dr. Ernest P. Boas, "who has been identified by the Committee on Un-American Activities as a member of eight Communist-front organizations," Mr. Harness said.

"The heads of both the New York and Washington offices of the Committee for the Nation's Health are formally registered with the Government as paid lobbyists," Congressman Harness said. "Chairman of the committee and one of its principal founders is Michael M. Davis, formerly employed by the Social Security Administration."

Dr. Howard pointed out that the Committee for the Nation's Health supplied the 5,000 pamphlets that Democratic Congressman EUGENE O'SULLIVAN, of Omaha, mailed to his constituents in September 1949 "in franked envelopes at the taxpayers' expense."

Dr. Howard's committee is supporting Republican HOWARD H. BUFFETT for the seat held by Congressman O'SULLIVAN.

Out of Crisis, a Spirit of Unity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 15 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Out of Crisis, a Spirit of Unity," published in the New York Times Magazine of December 10, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUT OF CRISIS, A SPIRIT OF UNITY—AGAIN OUR DEMOCRACY DEMONSTRATES ITS GENIUS FOR BURYING DIFFERENCES IN A COMMON CAUSE

(By Cabell Phillips)

WASHINGTON.—The Eighty-first Congress came back to Washington 2 weeks ago in a pervading feeling of pessimism. On the part of the Democrats there was a feeling of bitter disillusion and hopelessness

Their Senate majority had been whittled almost to the vanishing point, they counted among their casualties at least four of their strongest leaders, and there was widespread feeling that their party had been repudiated. On the part of the Republicans there was jubilation, but their triumph was tinged with vindictiveness. Policies were to be reexamined, whitewashes were to be scraped off, and certain prominent necks were to be guillotined at whatever cost to decorum and our posture before the world. In this climate the spirit of national unity was smothered.

With the change in war news came a dramatic change of mood. Recriminations were hastily deleted from speeches. Republican as well as Democratic leaders were summoned to the White House and emerged with almost humble promises of cooperation with the President. Secretary Acheson was treated with rare deference as he laid the grim facts from the Far East before closed sessions of the foreign affairs committees. Arrogance and disillusion were gone. In their place was anxiety and the realization that our Nation hung on the brink of another Pearl Harbor or Bataan.

Out of that cataclysm national unity was reborn. At least it was for this lame-duck Congress. Perhaps it was, also, among all the people of the country, but one cannot yet be sure. Public opinion moves with ponderous and unpredictable steps.

And therein lie the great questions of this hour of our national destiny. Are we as a people ready to lay aside the hostility and suspicions we carried with us to the polls on November 7? Are we ready to quit trying to place the blame for our predicament and stoning the scapegoats and to turn to the infinitely unpleasanter task of extricating ourselves? Are we willing to submerge our separate remedies and accept the single remedy of our national leadership? Are we at last and at this moment, buffeted and chastened enough to pull on the tough armor of national unity?

National unity seems particularly difficult to come by in democratic societies. Perhaps it is because, in normal times, we lay so little value upon it. Our very structure of government makes almost a virtue of dissent. We have glorified the independence and integrity of the individual man to the point where he instinctively resists herding. We have fought two bloody wars against the fanatical excesses of nationalism and are dedicated now to the doctrine of internationalism. Of patriotism we have a plenty. But national unity is something more than a lump in the throat at the sight of Old Glory waving in the sunshine.

National unity is a composite of both emotional and rational impulses. There are three conditions to its realization.

1. There must be, first, a common desire. It may be a desire induced by need, by avarice, or by some danger, but it must be translatable in terms of the individual citizen—a desire that he experiences personally and intensively.

2. There must be a common faith, faith in both the chosen leaders and the selected means. This faith must be given often at the sacrifice of one's own judgment and interests. It need not mean the abandonment of the right to oppose, but it does deny the right to obstruct. No commander is going to win a war whose officers veto his strategy and pick their own targets while the bullets are flying.

3. And there must be a common courage, a shared determination to pay the price and to endure the suffering that the winning of the objective demands.

How do we as a nation measure up today with respect to these three imperatives of national unity? What elements do we have at hand, and what are we lacking?

For the long run our common desire is for a world at peace. But the short run and urgent goal is for a safe release from the debacle that seems to face us in the Far East.

At no time since our involvement in Korea began have our people been as shocked over what seems to be an almost inevitable disaster. This feeling is personal and intense. Thousands of American families have sons and fathers who are either dead or maimed or who stand in hourly peril. There is added now the dread that the fighting will spread and be prolonged. We, and the rest of the world, are tortured by the thought that a third world war has been triggered.

Our reaction is universal and unalloyed by any divergent loyalties or partisanship. In the past we have had important minorities whose sympathies, for reasons of nationality or ideology, were directed in part at least toward our enemies. It is difficult to believe that in this conflict anything more than an infinitesimal group of native Communists are so treacherously inclined.

So our common desire for peace is induced by that most powerful of all motives, awareness of danger, a grim knowledge that cuts across all boundaries of race, nationality and belief.

Our common faith must, of necessity, be placed in our chosen leaders—the President and his chief civilian and military subordinates.

As individuals we may neither respect nor fully trust either those leaders or their policies. Without question that is the perplexity of a great many Americans today with respect to the Truman administration. But that administration was put in power by the mandate of a Democratic majority.

That mandate placed in their hands the conduct of our military and foreign affairs. We may rightfully question their wisdom and try to influence their decisions. But once those decisions are made, we are all, under the rules we live by, equally obligated by them.

We must accept the premise that our leaders are acting to the best of their abilities and to no other purpose than to protect our national interest. Any other premise in time of crisis would lead to anarchy.

Mr. Truman has demonstrated dramatically that he can command a large share of the people's faith. One such occasion was his stunning election victory in 1948. Another was his courageous and instant response to the first Communist aggression in Korea last summer. In each case there was an outpouring of public confidence in his leadership.

Conversely, there have been plentiful instances of a palpable lack of public confidence. The recent election showed the cumulative effect of many of these disagreements, specifically in the conduct of far eastern affairs, the presence of Dean Acheson in his Cabinet and the alleged softness of his administration toward Communists in Government. And by an odd and ironic twist, there is developing as this is written some clamor against his retention of Gen. Douglas MacArthur in command of the military operations in the Pacific.

But men alone cannot be the sole repositories of our faith. We must believe, too, in the broad moral principles that motivate them and their policies. These may elude us unless we search for them, for the philosophy of our stand in the world was never more complex than it is today.

History has shattered the protective, insular shell within which we grew to maturity. The cozy warmth of our material and political self-sufficiency has been stripped away. We stand naked to the same harsh winds of conflict that lash all the other peoples of an interdependent world. Figuratively, but inevitably, each of us is chilled by the snows of Korea and starved by the famines in India.

Faith is a nebulous and unstable quantity. It comes by invitation, not command; but fear and the need of a common defense are powerful stimuli to its coming. The evidence is that it is reviving for President Truman and his program now.

Certainly the Republican dissenters in Congress, with only a few notable exceptions, have given him their fealty. Senators TAFT and WHERRY, among others, have promised to submerge their disagreements over policy and to abate their accusations for what has happened while granting him all the authority he needs to meet the emergency.

The public must follow this lead if we are to have the faith that will sustain us in the months ahead.

Of common courage in times of stress we always have had an abundance. There is no reason to think it is less plentiful now. This is not only the physical courage to face danger on the battlefield; it is the moral courage to make the hard decisions and to accept the big and little sacrifices in which all emergencies abound. Congress has not shied from its responsibility to enact the hated economic controls nor the huge appropriations and revenue measures which our situation demands. Nor has there been any substantial outcry from the people who must shoulder these burdens.

Courage is stimulated by the magnitude of danger. The prospects a fortnight ago, with the fighting seemingly about over, was that we would slacken the pace of our defenses. The temptation to relax and reexamine would have been overpowering. We might have lacked the common courage then to continue to prepare for a danger we could no longer see, but the comfortable illusion of safety has now been dispelled.

National unity is not, of course, the exclusive property of the democracy. It, or rather its pretext, is sine qua non of the dictatorship as well. But unity in a slave state is only incidentally a matter of loyalty; it is essentially a product of discipline. It is exacted in the way that taxes and military service and production quotas are exacted. To withhold it is to invite swift retribution. Deviationism is synonymous with treason.

But these impulses exist, and having no escape hatch through honest debate and controversy, build up seething pressures beneath the surface. Molten lava needs only a tiny fissure in the earth's crust to burst forth as a volcano. Unlike a democracy where national unity has a tough and resilient vitality, in a totalitarian state it can never stumble and rise and walk again. The dissolution that finally overtook German nazism and Italian fascism was utter and complete.

Winston Churchill has written eloquently of the way the British people, paralyzed by apathy and indecision in the early months of the last war, suddenly closed ranks under the hammer blows of the Nazi air blitz to give one of the most magnificent demonstrations of national unity in all history. There are comparable chapters in our own story—the two World Wars, the early years of the New Deal, when destitution was the common enemy, and again last June, when Communist aggressors burst over the borders of the free world.

We have the capacity for united action and it is inconceivable that we will not use it again. We have a desire for victory and peace and we have the requisite courage. But have we the common faith?

National unity at this hour is not simply a question of whether we follow an elected official named Harry Truman and the policies of his administration. We don't all have to become Fair Dealers overnight in order to achieve a united front. We must distinguish between the individual and what he symbolizes. In the deepest sense our loyalty is bestowed not upon the man who chances to be in office, but upon an abstraction, the Presidency. We could not have endured the crises of 40 national elections if this were not so.

But we have endured those 40 bloodless uprisings as well as dissensions and disasters of a more grievous sort. And always, with but the one exception of the Civil War, we have closed our ranks, buried our differences, and faced the common enemy with a common will.

It is a peculiar genius we have that enables us to squander our greatest moral resources in this fashion and yet somehow to rally it in time to avert the ultimate catastrophe. That is a matter of exquisite timing and reflexes. Let us hope they are as keen as they need to be.

The Farm Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWIN E. WILLIS
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, recently I had the pleasure of visiting a number of farms in my district, and to learn for myself the value of some of the programs for which we in Congress have appropriated funds and written legislation. What I saw on those farms made me proud to feel that I had had some small part in bringing these advantages to my constituents and to farmers in all parts of the country.

The farms I visited were all ones where the farmer had received loans from the Farmers Home Administration so that he could operate his farm, become an owner of his own farm, or to construct new buildings on his land. In every case the borrower was a farmer who, through no special fault of his own, was unable to obtain credit from the usual sources, and would not have been able to operate, buy or build without this assistance from Government.

Yet the outstanding thing I saw on these farms was not only the work of the Farmers Home Administration but the evidences of good cooperation among agricultural and other Government agencies. I saw Government workers teaming together to help farmers, and as a result of this cooperation, the farmers were prospering, were taking an active part in their community affairs, were becoming good customers of the local merchants, and were greatly improving the agriculture of their county.

On the farm of Maxie Pierce in Vermilion County, for example, I found a veteran of World War II who had returned from military service, married a school teacher, and signed a contract to buy the 91-acre Pierce homesite where he had grown up as a boy. But Maxie contracted for a little more than he realized, because he had not had much farm management experience, and his term of military service came during a period when farm technology was making rapid steps. Maxie was rusty on his farming, had not kept up with modern methods while in service. Could the Government help him learn how to farm well enough so he could make the payments on that farm?

It could, and it would.

Maxie first contacted the Vermilion parish service officer, Charles LeBlanc, who explained to Pierce the benefits of on-farm training programs which had been provided for veterans under the GI bill of rights we in Congress helped pass. Then LeBlanc introduced Maxie to Paul A. Bourgeois, the veteran on-farm training instructor, and Pierce was enrolled in a class which would help teach him some of the farm-management methods he had forgotten or never learned because of his military service.

Through Bourgeois, Maxie also met and learned to use the services of Murphy Veillion, Vermilion County agent, who has given Pierce many additional suggestions on ways to farm in the parish, crops which would bring best results, or ways to handle livestock. And from the county agent, Pierce came to know and learn how to use the services of PMA Field Agent Lynn Landrenau and Farmers Home Administration Supervisor Leonard Hollier.

Landrenau and the PMA helped Pierce with problems of pasture improvement by furnishing fertilizer, seed, and lime. FHA Supervisor Hollier and his agency helped Pierce work out a balanced farm and home plan, and provided him with credit and on-farm instruction to do the job the plan outlined. For example, the plan showed that Pierce had the best opportunity to succeed if he increased his livestock and poultry holdings. To do this he needed more pasture. The FHA loan enabled him to buy the necessary livestock and poultry, and to finance such parts of his pasture-improvement program as were not covered by PMA payments.

The farm and home plan prepared by FHA called for some changes to be made in the home end of the farm, too, and Mrs. Pierce entered the picture then. As a 4–H leader at the Mouton Cove school where she taught, Mrs. Pierce was already well acquainted with Miss Constance Escude, the county home demonstration representative. When Supervisor Hollier suggested that Mrs. Pierce and Miss Escude get together to work out home problems, there was no problem in working out this arrangement.

One of the things Mrs. Pierce was most interested in was a new home. Working in her old home—a country cabin—would never be easy or particularly successful. And Miss Escude pointed out that the same agency which had loaned the Pierce family money to buy livestock and poultry would also loan them additional funds to build the new house the family deserved. The Pierces went back to Supervisor Hollier with a question as to whether this could be done or not, and again the answer was yes. Late in 1949 we in Congress had written into the Housing Act of 1949 a provision for loaning farmers money to build, repair, or remodel farm structures, and the FHA administered this program. Hollier did arrange a loan for the Pierce family, and on my visit to this farm I saw both the old house where the Pierces were still living and the new one almost completed, where they will be living before the end of 1950.

In building the new home, the extension county agent showed the Pierce family some housing plans well suited for that part of Louisiana, and the Farmers Home Administration also showed some plans they had developed for the same purpose. The Pierces selected some features from both, and the Rural Electrification Administration helped to work out wiring plans for the selected structure.

Let us see, that makes seven different Government people or agencies who helped Pierce and his wife—the Veterans' Administration, the Office of Education's on-farm training instructor, the county agent, the home demonstration agent, the FMA field agent, the REA specialist, and the Farmers Home supervisor. And because of their cooperation I saw the Pierce family with a new home, modern in every respect, and almost ready for them to move into. I saw a farm being operated efficiently by a farmer who needed training and help to make it operate that well. I saw a home managed as we would want our homes to be managed.

Maxie has already built his cattle herd to 12 head, and in addition has a registered Brahma bull to improve it. He has a fine laying flock of 300 hens. He has good equipment, a well-developed pasture, good crops. In addition to the new house there is a new poultry house Maxie built himself from material sawed off his farm. Not only his home but the poultry house, too, are equipped with running water and electricity. Mrs. Pierce has a sanitary sewage disposal unit, an electric range, an automatic hot-water heater, and a deep freeze among her many new home improvements.

Mr. Speaker, I have dwelt on the case of Maxie Pierce at some length to demonstrate how the farm program works, to tie in the activities of the several agencies involved, and to show the splendid unselfish cooperation and teamwork existing among the local heads of and all workers in these agencies, both in the office and in the field. But, Mr. Speaker, the case of Maxie Pierce is not any more spectacular than all the other families I visited on the ground. Rather, it is merely an illustration of the success of the program. Time will not permit a full discussion of each case, but mention must be made of all of them.

For instance, in Vermilion Parish I also visited the prosperous farm of Bernard LeBlanc, who was the first man to receive a farm housing loan in that parish.

I enjoyed talking with Clyde Boudoin, a successful dairyman, who, with the help of friends in the community, was building a new home on his farm.

Because of his untiring energy Edier Bares has paid up his loan in full. He is now one of the large rice farmers near Abbeville, equipped with the best up-to-date mechanical farm implements, including a deep well running into thousands of dollars to construct and serving not only his own farm but irrigating rice fields surrounding his property.

Without disparagement to the others, I must say that I have never seen a finer and more comfortable and well-appointed farm home than that of Whitney LeBlanc. The whitewashed barns, the strong fences on his farm bespeak the determination, thrift, and industry of Whitney LeBlanc and his helpful wife. It is no wonder that they own one of the finest herds of dairy cattle which has come to my observation.

Mr. Speaker, what I have said about Vermilion Parish holds true for St. Martin Parish. Keen competition for successful administration of the program exists between Leonard Hollier of Vermilion Parish and Owen J. Resweber, County Supervisor of the Farmers Home Administration in St. Martin Parish. I must refrain from judging the results because I come from St. Martin Parish and might be tempted to exaggerate the fine work of Mr. Resweber, in cooperation with the other agencies I have previously mentioned. Then too, prior to being elected to this body I was attorney for the Farmers Home Administration in St. Martin Parish for some 15 years and I naturally have come in closer contact with Mr. Resweber and all of his very competent force, in the office and field.

In company with Mr. Resweber and with Alexis Delahoussaye, Adelma Cormier, and Robert Champagne, members of the local board, I also visited borrowers in St. Martin Parish. Mr. Ephis Chataignier, Mr. Victor Russo, and Mr. Andre Delahoussaye were born and reared on farms. They experienced the drudgery of share-croppers until the Farmers Home Administration made it possible for them to acquire their own farms. To me the thrill and independence of private ownership these three are experiencing was perhaps the most impressive part of my tour.

Yes; we also visited Junius Lee, a Negro tenant and operating loan borrower. Junius Lee's children are afforded all the facilities of the spendid educational system in my parish, where we draw no distinction in opportunity for work, for private ownership, and for education. Let that be a lesson to a certain misinformed few who would change a way of life and grapple with problems they know nothing about.

To me, one of the keys to the success of the families I visited was the Farmers Home Administration, who loaned these families the money to make their improvements possible, and who helped to show them how to do a better farm and home-management job. Many of the services provided by other agencies would be of lesser value to these farmers unless some way was provided for the family to get the money needed to put their plans into effect. Take the on-farm training program, for example. Thousands of veterans are being graduated from this training program each month, ready to begin careers as farmers. Their training has been good, and they assuredly could do the job. But they need money to buy a farm of their own, or to stock and equip one they might rent. Most of these graduates, however, have not been able to save up enough money during their military service or their training periods to make the necessary down payment on a farm or to qualify them for bank credit. The Farmers Home steps into this breach and provides the credit the families need. They do more—they help the borrower past the first "rough spots" of his farming by working out sound farm and home plans for him, and by visiting him on his farm to help with specific problems.

Mr. F. L. Spencer, Louisiana State director of the Farmers Home Administration, gave me some figures which show how much this program has helped Louisiana farmers, and in reading them I am again proud that I had some small part in helping to make it possible. Let me cite them for you.

The Farmers Home Administration in Louisiana makes two kinds of loans which help farmers operate their farms, and three kinds which help buy farms or improve farms they own. Of the operating loans, the usual type are made to farmers to help them obtain the seed, feed, livestock, equipment, or fertilizers needed to adjust their farming programs to a more economical basis. The second type are emergency loans made to persons who have suffered some major farm disaster, and need credit to continue in production during the following year. Most of these operating loans are repayable in up to 5 years, and the borrower is charged 5 percent interest on the unpaid portion. In Louisiana the Farmers Home Administration had loaned $45,367,528. They made 158,626 loans to Louisiana farmers to make adjustments; and had loaned an additional $634,993 as production-disaster loans. Of this amount loaned, by September 30 the agency had already collected $38,073,819, and since they are 5-year loans, much of the balance has not yet come due. Considering that these are loans made to families who are unable to obtain credit from other sources, this repayment record is exceptional.

The FHA is also collecting on old loans made by the Emergency Seed and Feed Loan Division of the Farm Credit Administration for operating purposes, although these emergency loans are no longer made. In Louisiana 232,794 loans of this type were made, $20,657,136 loaned, and $19,487,133 already collected.

Real-estate loans of three different types are made. One of these is a direct, 100-percent loan made by the agency to a farmer to enable him to buy a family-type farm of his own, or to enlarge or develop one he already owns to family-size. It also insures similar loans made by private lenders where the borrower is able to make a 10-percent down payment; and for the past year it has been authorized by Congress to make housing loans such as the Pierce family used to build their new home.

In Louisiana, the agency has loaned $11,246,126 to 2,198 farm families to enable them to buy farms of their own. Of the recent loans made, 100 percent have been to veterans. It has also insured $217,620 in loans to 36 Louisiana farmers, where the loan was made by a private lender. It has made 186 loans during the past year to Louisiana families to build new dwellings and other farm buildings, or to remodel existing buildings, and these loans have amounted to $1,280,780. During the year, 817 Louisiana farmers applied for these housing loans, and many of these applications are now being approved.

The real-estate loans have been well repaid, too. Borrowers have up to 40 years in which to repay their loans, and no part of the program has been in operation more than 12 years. The insured mortgage program did not become effective until 1948 when we in Congress made some changes in the original legislation passed in 1946, and so this program is only about 2 years old in actual practice. Yet $6,264,394—about half of the total loaned—has already been repaid. Almost 1,000 of the borrowers have repaid their loans in full—thirty or more years ahead of schedule. For example, Benny Knight of Lafouche Parish repaid his farm purchase loan in 7 years although he might have taken 40. And over in Lafayette Parish Eddie Menard took over a farm in 1947 on which many people said he would starve, using an FHA loan to finance his purchase, and now he has boosted his net worth by $10,000 in 3 years, and he has repaid 8 years' payments already in the 3 years he has operated it. Mr. and Mrs. Adelma Cormier, of Breaux Bridge, repaid their farm purchase loan in 8 years instead of 40, and today have a widely diversified farm program which includes sugarcane, cotton, cabbage, and shallots as crops, and an excellent soil-conservation program to preserve their land for the future use of Rodney, their 17-year-old son, who as a member of the Future Farmers is making a good record for himself as a prospective successful farmer of the next few years.

His loan repaid, Cormier is now helping other farmers in St. Martin Parish obtain the same advantages he has received. One reason the FHA loans have been so successful in Louisiana is that, before any loan is made, a committee of three local farmers must approve the prospective borrower. For the past 2 years Cormier has been one of these three committeemen for the parish, and he not only helps approve applicants but also visits the farms of borrowers to pass on to them some of the lessons he has learned during his 10 years of farm ownership.

But, Mr. Speaker, just as Louisiana is well above the average of the Nation in collections, so the parishes in the Third District of Louisiana and especially the parishes of Vermilion and St. Martin are above the splendid State-wide record. Let me illustrate:

Following is a table showing the total amount loaned under the production and subsistence loan program and the total amount collected on these loans from July 1, 1946, to December 12, 1950, in St. Martin Parish:

Year	Total loans	Collected
July 1, 1946, to June 30, 1947	$46,738	[1] $52,026.49
July 1, 1947, to June 30, 1948	29,705	[1] 46,557.68
July 1, 1948, to June 30, 1949	43,145	42,540.57
July 1, 1949, to June 30, 1950	52,225	[2] 35,263.96
Total	171,813	176,388.70

[1] The reason the figures representing amount collected during 1946-47 and 1947-48 is larger than the amount loaned is because loans which were made prior to the 1946 fiscal year had installments maturing during the next 4 years.

[2] This figure represents the amount collected on 1949-50 loans as of Dec. 12, 1950.

Approximately 500 farm families received operating loans from July 1, 1946, to June 30, 1950. The record of St. Martin Parish in respect to other types of loans is equally impressive. And here is the record of Vermilion Parish:

Operating loans under Farmers Home Administration from Dec. 31, 1946, through Dec. 10, 1950

Total amount of loans	$222,276.00
Total amount of collections	$218,576.09
Approximate number of families assisted	450

I wish to point out in the above, that of the amount loaned, there is a sizable amount that has not yet matured, as in some cases the payments on farm equipment, dairy cows, and so forth, has been scheduled over a period of 3 or 4 years.

Farm ownership loans

Total amount of loans	$251,512.00
Total amount of collections	$190,373.95
Total number of loans	34
Number loans paid in full	14

Nineteen of the 20 unpaid loans are well ahead of schedule. The other loan is $171.17 behind schedule. This is due to changing crop conditions, and the farm had to be completely reorganized to meet these changing conditions.

Mr. Speaker, we are living in dark and uncertain days. Gentlemen may cry peace, peace, but there is no peace. We are in a shooting war in Korea and the conflagration could suddenly engulf the earth. We will continue to hope and pray that time will soon bleach the darkness and uncertainty into light and peace, but in the meantime we must be prepared for any eventuality. The answer to communism is free and competitive enterprise and private ownership of property by all heads of families. Give me a community with the greatest number of farmers owning their own farms, and I will show you a community with the greatest amount of prosperity, contentment, and civic pride. It is such communities I was privileged to visit recently and that I have the honor to represent in the Congress of the United States.

More Power for America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NORRIS POULSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Charles E. Wilson, president, General Electric Co., entitled "More Power for America," before the National Press Club, Washington, D. C., December 5, 1950:

MORE POWER FOR AMERICA

(By Charles E. Wilson)

There is probably no better way in which I can indicate my regard and my honest respect for the institution of the National Press club, and the hard-working individuals who compose it, than by proceeding immediately to my subject without indulging in any compliments, pleasant though that might be for me. One of the things I bore away with me from my War Production Board days is that talk in Washington is not cheap, as is commonly supposed. It can be very costly. I should like to use as much restraint as possible in spending it here today. Please accept my apology, also, for reading what I have to say, but we shall be dealing largely in facts, figures, and estimates based on careful research, and it will be to your advantage that I do not trust these to my memory.

My subject is electric power. It was said last May that in the United States today the political setting is conducive to rising economic activity, our policy being one of maximum employment at home plus economic rehabilitation and the improvement of security abroad. The role of our Government, in the implementing of this policy, has continued to grow, as you know, and one of the effects has been to increase the pressure on private business. Business has complained and fought back against that pressure, but happily in the process it did not dare to relax and it fought back with its best weapons—intelligent and courageous expansion, continued scientific and economic research, improved communication with its employees and its public, and greater productive efficiency. Courage, in this case, was not mere words, but the investment of billions of dollars for new plants and machines.

With the summer came the shock of Korea and the first clear glimpse of the calculated and malignant forces of aggression. That shock set off—authentically but a little late as usual—our present national security program, and the effects of implications of it are mounting by the hour. This is a curious kind of hot-cold picture, as newsmen well know, with all of the planning by Government and business that we associate with a full-scale war effort, but with no full-scale war. We have the tragedy of 30,000 casualties, and so far not even an official denunciation of the guilty parties, but it is not a full-scale war. But there is war enough to intensify certain important issues—the issues of manpower, materials, and productivity. Perhaps we are being given an extraordinary opportunity, not granted last time, to count our money, our men, our resources, and our facilities.

And so we come to electric power, which is at the same time a vital material or commodity and a dynamic instrument or tool by which it is possible to increase our productivity. It is a two-edged sword, or a double-bladed plowshare, as you please, and while this dual quality adds to its value, it also tends to trip up the statistician and the unfamiliar administrator. Not for one moment do I feel that members of the press also would fall into these traps, but so that we can all start even, let me just run through the bare fundamentals—the blocking and tackling of the subject, so to speak. The basic power unit is the watt; a kilowatt is a thousand watts; and a kilowatt-hour is the using up of a thousand watts of electricity for an hour, which is what you do if you burn 10 100-watt incandescent lamps for an hour, at a cost of a few cents. Electric generating equipment is rated in kilowatts—a 25,000-kilowatt turbine, for example—while electric current is produced and sold in terms of kilowatt-hours.

Certain of our Government bureaus have been among those claiming that as we crank up our defense program and bring it to speed, we are going to have a serious power shortage, unless something drastic is done to prevent it. Spokesmen for the private utilities say this isn't so. In Government parlance, that "something drastic" usually means more public power projects. You might rightly conclude that the gentlemen on both sides of this question are interested parties. Perhaps the electrical manufacturer is also an interested party, but with this difference: he is the fellow who has to make the machines, regardless of who operates them, and he is therefore interested primarily in getting the facts. If his facts and his surveys and his estimates are wrong, he is likely to go out of business. It is the judgment of the manufacturer that I am offering you, therefore. Here is that considered judgment; let me give you the conclusions first, and then go back and pick up the reasons:

We believe the electric utility industry has done an excellent job of forecasting, planning, and preparing to take care of the country's power requirements. The electrical manufacturing industry has also forecast and planned very carefully; it has provided the facilities and it has produced the power supply equipment needed. There is today enough power to meet present needs with a safe reserve margin. There will continue to be enough power to meet anticipated needs if the equipment—now on order and planned—is built and installed as scheduled, despite a shift to a partial war economy. There will be, in our judgment, no power shortage unless one or more of the following things happen:

1. If major war production projects, such as aluminum plants or special new bomb projects, are heedlessly located in sections of the country where power can't be made available to them.

2. If the present manufacturing facilities for utility power supply equipment are diverted to other purposes, thus delaying production schedules of equipment already on order.

3. If the materials necessary to producing this equipment are not made available as a vital part of the over-all defense program.

What is our basis for this thinking? First off, let me say that we must believe this, in the General Electric Co., because all of our production planning and budgeting are based on these figures. We estimate that all defense expenditures will increase from the $12,000,000,000 of 1949 to about forty-six billions in 1952, dropping back to about forty-one billions in 1953. We are assuming full employment, capacity operation of all industry, and continuing industrial expansion through 1953. We have factored in all the plans and commitments for war production that are known, plus a heavy production of civilian goods. We are assuming some lengthening of the workweek. In estimating power requirements we are here considering what practically amounts to a wartime level of industrial activity.

On the basis outlined here we find there is indicated for 1953 a power load, or total demand, of 416,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours. This is 43 percent higher than in 1949. We estimate the peak load, or the largest demand that will ever be made for electricity at a given time, to be 77,400,000 of kilowatts in 1953, or 37 percent higher than in 1949. Incidentally, on a comparable basis, these figures are within 1 percent of the figures recently published by the Edison Electric Institute, although we arrived at them independently. These are the dimensions of the demand that should be made upon us.

With the power-generating equipment that has already been scheduled by the electrical manufacturing industry through the first half of 1953, and assuming that the suppliers of power are permitted to install the additional capacity they have planned for the last half of that year, the Nation will have a margin of reserve generating capacity 20 percent above the estimated load peak in 1953. I think you will find this fact important: in order to wipe out this margin of reserve, we would have to see a growth of the electrical load through 1953 almost double (actually 95 percent more) the increase of 87,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours we have estimated for this 1950–53 period.

Incidentally our estimates of power requirements are based on median hydro conditions—drought would cut the margin of reserve capacity but would not wipe it out. Of course, some people think we have an answer for that at Schenectady, too, as we can always call in our artificial rainmakers. Seriously, if it were not for one or two regions that are low, we would realize our objective of a 25 percent reserve margin in 1953 instead of 20 percent.

Suppose war production should be expanded beyond the levels forecast here—would there be sufficient electric power to support the added manpower available? Let us assume that we retain a reserve of 5 percent of electric utility generating capacity, to take care of breakdowns, and devote all the rest of the estimated 1952 margin to increasing production. This is using the horse to invoke the cart, if you follow me, but in that case industrial production would be at a level which would require 5,700,000, or 38 percent, more manufacturing employees than today's high level, working 42 hours a week. And if they work 45 hours a week, the peak in the last war, we would still need 4,300,000, or 30 percent, more people. The labor force is growing approximately a half million a year. We are already in a situation of almost full employment, and, according to the figures in last week's United States News, adding less than another 3,000,000 will achieve peak defense production planned for the end of 1951. Simultaneously we are driving for a 3,000,000-man fighting force. It would appear, therefore, that manpower—not electric power—would be the bottleneck in such an emergency.

In this connection it is worth noting that although the electric industry must have enough generating equipment available to meet the peak demand, even if it lasts but minutes or hours, this capacity is not needed for a large part of a normal one-shift day. Much of it can be put to work for many more hours. For three shifts the capacity is theoretically tripled, although from a practical production standpoint a third shift never actually delivers its theoretical quota. Also, total power demand does not increase in proportion to the amount of power going into defense production. A substantial part of the added defense demand comes about automatically as a result of the diversion of manpower and materials; either of these is more likely to cause bottlenecks.

There is not time enough here to discuss the relation of power to the production of aluminum or steel. Aluminum, which requires about a million kilowatts of installed capacity to produce a billion pounds a year, is still not in my judgment going to be any threat to our present or potential power-production resources. The steel industry has also done a fine job of providing needed capacity and is on the way to improving that job. I think the important thing to remember—and it seems to be the thing so often overlooked in Government planning—is that there are really no absolute limitations on our ability to produce in peace or war; the limitations are relative ones—the relation of manpower and materials and facilities and electric power to each other.

So far we have talked about the dimensions of the power demand and the ability of the electric companies to meet it. Here are some figures from the manufacturing point of view. Our industry will ship to these companies in the 3 years 1950 through 1952, based on orders already scheduled, 21,300,000 kilowatts of electric generating equipment. In 1953 they will need another 7,000,000 kilowatts, and the industry will supply that.

To cover utility and other needs, including industrial and export, we will have manufacturing capacity of 11,000,000 kilowatts in 1952, and General Electric alone will be able to supply 5,200,000 kilowatts. Our capacity for large steam turbines alone has gone up 60 percent in the last 10 years, thanks to a new $30,000,000 turbine plant, covering 20 acres of land at Schenectady, completed in 1949, and which I thought for a time might be dubbed "Wilson's folly." Today General Electric can produce more electric generating equipment than the entire industry produced before the war, and twice as much as we produced before the war.

Let me give you just one more figure, because it leads into a statement I made in the beginning. In World War II General Electric alone produced 28,000,000 horsepower of ship-propulsion equipment, which is equivalent to 45 percent of the total installed capacity of our electric companies at the beginning of this year. You will recall that, in forecasting that there would be no power shortage, I stressed the fact that one condition would be that present facilities for building generating equipment for utilities must not be diverted to other purposes. The program I have outlined does not provide generating equipment for the Navy and merchant marine, for portable power units, or other special uses. This is an extra job. To make this equipment requires a different kind of plant, and it must be planned well in advance of specific demands for production. If it is not built in advance, it will be ready too late and will cost more. For example, to obtain the same production facilities in a 2½-year period instead of a 4-year period a plant of 2,300,000 square feet would be needed, instead of one of 750,000 square feet. The only way to meet such a demand is to provide entirely new facilities for it, not to divert existing facilities scheduled to meet the demands of the electric companies. General Electric is prepared to establish these facilities—in fact, we presented such a plan last week to the Navy and Maritime Commission.

It is my hope that I have been able to shed some light on this tremendously important subject of electric power, and its role in the unfolding picture of American productivity and American security. It is especially important that you people here understand and share my convictions in this. I have tried to give you some reasons, in these facts and figures, for putting your confidence in the ability and vision of a great American industry. By the very nature of our business, electrical manufacturers and electric utilities have always had to be out ahead in the drive to achieve greater productivity for the United States. We always have been—we were in the last war—and we are today. We intend to stay ahead.

FACTS AND FIGURES RELATIVE TO MR. WILSON'S STATEMENT

Anticipated defense expenditures

[GE estimates, in billions of dollars]

	Total defense expenditures	Combat material (hard goods)
1950	14.2	4.5
1951	33.0	17.5
1952	46.0	25.0
1953	41.0	21.0

Estimated industrial production

[Federal Reserve Board Index, 1935–39=100]

	Index
1949	176
1950	197
1951	220
1952	230
1953	225

Load, peak, reserve

Estimated power load for 1953, 416,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours (43 percent higher than 1949).

Estimated peak load for 1953, 77,400,000 kilowatts (37 percent higher than 1949).

Estimated reserve generating capability over 1953 peak, 20 percent.

Power-load growth

[In billions of kilowatt hours]

	1940	1943	Percent increase	1950	1953	Percent increase
Large light and power sales	59.6	106.7	79	139.0	175.0	26
Small light and power sales	22.4	28.2	26	50.2	62.8	25

Total generation	145.0	221.0	53	329.0	416.0	27

Estimated increase in industrial production from 1950–53 is 17 percent, compared with 92 percent from 1940–43, while the growth in power sales relative to production is expected to be substantially greater than in World War II.

Capacity for manufacture of generating equipment

The industry is turning out generating equipment of all kinds at a rate of 6,855,900 kilowatts per year in 1950, of which 6,074,000 kilowatts is for private utilities.

Capacity for 1952 is 11,000,000 kilowatts (5,200,000 kilowatts is General Electric) with 8,316,000 kilowatts scheduled as of October 1. Open capacity is 700,000 kilowatts for large steam turbines (10,000 kilowatts and up), 840,000 kilowatts for hydroelectric machines, and 1,200,000 kilowatts for small steam turbines (under 10,000 kilowatts).

From Pearl Harbor to Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KATHARINE ST. GEORGE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 15, 1950

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include an article by William Henry Chamberlin, from the Human Events, showing clearly how the policy which caused Pearl Harbor, led to our present defeat in Asia. The article follows:

[From Human Events of December 13, 1950]

FROM PEARL HARBOR TO KOREA

(By William Henry Chamberlin)

The calendar sometimes inflicts strange ironies. December 7, 1941, was the date of the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor. This was not a bolt from the blue or an act of mental aberration. It was the result of a long diplomatic deadlock, during which the United States had been inflexible and uncompromising in its demand that Japan withdraw completely from China.

A virtual commercial blockade of Japan had been enforced since the end of July. The proposal of the moderate Japanese Prime Minister, Prince Konoye, to come to the United States and seek a basis of accommodation in personal talks with Roosevelt had been brushed aside. A proposal for a temporary modus vivendi which Hull had considered during the last days of November was never presented to the Japanese.

There are two highly impressive witnesses for the proposition that the Pacific war, of which the first shots were fired at Pearl Harbor, was a conflict over China. Roosevelt, at a dinner of the Foreign Policy Association in 1944, said:

"We could have compromised with Japan and bargained for a place in a Japanese-dominated Asia by selling out the hearts' blood of the Chinese people. And we rejected that."

His bellicose Secretary of War, the late Henry L. Stimson, confirmed this Roosevelt statement. In his diary for November 25 Stimson reported on an important council held by Roosevelt, composed of Hull, Knox, Marshall, Stark, and himself, at which the question was how we should maneuver them (the Japanese) into firing the first shot without allowing too much danger to ourselves. In his book of memoirs, On Active Service, Stimson flatly asserts:

"If at any time the United States had been willing to concede to Japan a free hand in China there would have been no war in the Pacific."

So the propaganda pattern which was sold to the American people before and after Pearl Harbor presented a highly melodramatic picture of an incredibly wicked Japan and a virtuous, wronged China. America was to be the white knight, the Sir Galahad, who would rescue China from the molestations of Japan. Utterly blot out Japan—so ran the argument at that time, and peace and stability would reign forever in the Orient, and American missionary effort and trade in China would flourish like the green bay tree.

The final coffin nail had surely been driven into this compound of happy illusions on December 7, 1950. For this tragic and ironical anniversary found the greater part of the American combat army trying desperately, in sheer self-defense to shed the hearts' blood of some hundreds of thousands of the Chinese people who had poured in to attack them in Korea.

At the time when the Chinese Reds were launching their Pearl Harbor against the United States and against the United Nations, the Chinese Communist delegate to the United Nations, Wu Hsiu-chuan, was delivering a tirade against this country in the Security Council of the United Nations which exceeded in violence the language used in Japan's declaration of war 9 years earlier. One need only cite such phrases as the following:

"I am here to accuse the United States Government of the unlawful and criminal act of armed aggression against the territory of China, Formosa. * * *

"All these acts of direct aggression against China by the United States aggression forces in Korea are an insolent provocation which the Chinese people absolutely cannot tolerate."

II

The wheel has come full circle. Nine years after the Pearl Harbor attack we are paying a terrific price in the lives of our fighting men and in a sense of national humiliation and confusion for the long succession of blunders committed in the Far East by the Roosevelt and Truman administrations.

Among the more obvious of the blunders were: (1) fighting a war with no more intelligent aim than the destruction of Japan; (2) giving Stalin a strategic and economic stranglehold on China at Yalta; (3) writing off our Nationalist friends and encouraging our enemies in China (despite the doleful results of pursuing the same policy in Eastern Europe), and (4) forcing General MacArthur to fight a war in Korea figuratively with one hand tied behind his back.

Anyone who believes that it is possible to charm or appease the Chinese Communists into being friends of the west should have been finally undeceived by the contents and tone of Wu Hsiu-chuan's speech. Hatred of the west, arrogant truculent assurance of a world-conquering mission dripped from every period. Wu's reference to solidarity with the peoples of Japan, Vietnam (Indochina) and the Philippines showed that Chinese Communist ambitions, like Soviet Communist ambitions, are insatiable and unlimited.

In the light of this speech, and of the accompanying forward surge of the Red Chinese hordes in Korea one may recognize that there was far more truth than American public opinion ever recognized in the Japanese claim to be resisting Chinese communism and Soviet imperialism. A Japanese Army on the Amur, holding the line against the Soviet Union, Japanese strong points on the mainland, serving as a barrier against Chinese communism would look pretty good, from the standpoint of American national security, today.

But the consequence of Mr. Roosevelt's crusading war in the Far East was to destroy the valuable potential element of check and balance which Japan represented as against Russia and China. And there is a wise old Greek saying to the effect that one thing even the gods cannot achieve is to make the past as if it had never been.

III

The alternatives which the Chinese Pearl Harbor places before the United States are extremely difficult. There is the possibility of surrender to the blackmail represented by the injection into the Korean War of hundreds of thousands of Chinese trained troops, humorously described as "volunteers." Mr. Wu has stated his terms for unconditional surrender with brutal frankness: withdrawal from Korea, surrender of Formosa, admission of Communist China to the UN.

Acceptance of these terms would mean the dissolution of Chiang Kai-shek's Army in Formosa and the probable collapse of guerrilla resistance in China itself. Yet it is remarkable how many individuals who professed to be shocked to the depths of their moral sensibilities by suggestions that Hitler and Stalin should have been permitted to fight it out or that the United States would be well advised to go slowly with all-out support for China in 1941 are apparently ready to run up the white flag of surrender to Mao Tse-tung.

The Chinese Communists are openly making war on the United Nations. Yet the Secretary General of the United Nations entertains the Chinese Communist delegates and does his best, without much visible success, to appease them. The Chinese Communists are trying to cut to pieces British troops in Korea. Yet the British Government does not react even to the point of breaking off diplomatic relations.

American troops are fighting a desperately uneven defensive struggle in Korea. But they are compelled to fight with the immense handicap of not being allowed to bomb enemy supply lines in Manchuria. After Pearl Harbor in 1941 there was no international forum in New York where Japanese and other Axis representatives could blackguard the United States as much as they wished. But there have been no restrictions on the activities of Mr. Wu and Mr. Vishinsky. How long the American people will put up with a situation which combines the worst features of both war and appeasement remains to be seen.

IV

This amazing effort to act as if Red China were not making large-scale war on the Western World is accomplished by the argument that Europe claims priority over Asia in defense plans and that we have neither the means nor the desire to commit mass armies to the Chinese mainland. But this overlooks the possibility of resisting Chinese Communist aggression by methods which would not bleed western manpower white nor impose a heavy burden on the American economy.

This is true even if complete evacuation of Korea should become necessary. China can be blockaded. Its centers of military concentration, industry, and communication can be shattered by air attack. Chiang Kai-shek can be encouraged and aided in using Formosa as a base for raids and descents on the China coast. Anti-Communist guerrillas can be helped. Japan can be rearmed. If Chinese "volunteers" can appear in Korea, why not Japanese?

It is obvious that the flood tide of aggressive Asiatic communism can be stemmed only by Asiatics. Our repeated failures to give a fighting chance to our potential friends in Asia, to the South Koreans before last June, to the Japanese, to the Chinese Nationalists, is calculated to raise the old question: Stupidity or treason?

Probably there is nothing in prospect in Asia but defeat, disaster, and disagree until the State Department is put in charge of someone with wits enough to realize that a regime which throws a million men in battle array against you is really waging war, and firmness enough to make a clean sweep of "experts" of the Owen Lattimore type of thinking.

American and UN prestige could survive a forced military withdrawal from Korea. They could not survive the futile humiliation of surrender to military aggression, of appeasement of Stalin's Chinese gauleiters, of what might amount to a super-Munich. Will to resist Communist aggression in Europe or anywhere else would rapidly evaporate under the influence of such a surrender.

National Mobilization

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. IRVING M. IVES
OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 15 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the text of the address delivered last night by Gov. Thomas E. Dewey, of New York, at the dinner of the New York County Lawyers Association, at the Waldorf Astoria Hotel in New York City.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of December 15, 1950]

TEXT OF GOVERNOR DEWEY'S CALL FOR NATIONAL MOBILIZATION

We meet at a tragic moment in the history of mankind. American troops defending freedom have suffered a terrible catastrophe. Our prestige is at a low ebb and world communism has gained a great triumph.

We stand almost naked before the world. Right now, aside from four partly trained National Guard divisions, there are only 10 divisions of the United States Army. Two are in Germany. Seven are facing dreadful odds in Korea, and in all continental United States there is just 1 division ready for combat—not enough to defend a single American city.

The only apparent reason Soviet Russia has not already launched total war is fear of atomic bombing. We do not know how much longer she will be afraid of that. Our country—the free world—the very idea of human freedom are in deadly, immediate danger.

For 4 years I have been saying to all who would listen to me that this crisis was rushing toward us at headlong speed. I have been saying—and have been sneered at for saying it—that national unity was urgently necessary because we faced great perils.

LEADERSHIP FOR SURVIVAL

Three years ago in this very room before another great audience of an equally nonpartisan nature, I forecast in detail what has since happened in China and what is happening today in Korea.

I now say again, tonight, that unless our Nation develops a quality of leadership and a capacity for effective action which have thus far not appeared, I do not believe we will survive.

Surely it must be plain—at last—even to those who will not see—that world communism under the leadership of Soviet Russia is waging ruthless war against the whole free world. Surely it must be clear—at last—that only far more decisive action by the United States will make it possible to stem the Soviet tide.

Surely the dreadful danger must now be clear to those nations who are wobbling in their will to resist Soviet aggression or are running for the illusory cover of neutrality. There can be no neutrality in this world—for long. We shall all be brave and strong and remain free or we shall be timid and weak and become slaves.

I am not concerned tonight with how we Americans got into this desperate peril. I am not concerned tonight with why some other free nations are losing their will to resist. I am desperately concerned with where we go from here.

I. ABANDON OUR ILLUSIONS

First of all, let us finally and forever abandon all those comfortable illusions which have allowed our country to sink to this perilous point. Our Government and our people have been living in a dream world based on self-deception. That deception was not even "Made in Russia" because Stalin has never concealed his purpose of conquering the world any more than Hitler did. He has written in time and time again just as Hitler did. But everybody refused to believe it.

The cold fact is that the Russian war machine has never been demobilized. Nearly one-half of Russia's total economic productivity has been devoted to military purposes. Without shooting a gun or losing a man since the end of the war, but through propaganda, bribery, falsehood, coercion, satellite troops, and treason, Russia now rules 800,000,000 people, or one-third of world.

Let us get rid once and for all of the idea that Russia wants less than the whole world.

How to meet the challenge

Let us also get rid of the stupid idea that we can sit down and do business with Stalin while we are weak and he is strong. Nation after nation tried it with Hitler and was swallowed up before the war. Nation after nation has tried it with Stalin and they, too, have been swallowed up. It is time we listened to the mute testimony of the leaders of those nations from their tortured graves.

Let us get rid of the idea we can stop Russia by appropriating billions of dollars, setting up new Government boards and then continuing wage rounds as usual, price increases as usual, and politics as usual. Only all-out effort, all-out sacrifice, and all-out use of the brains and skills of this country, backed by an abiding faith in the justice of our cause, will give us a chance of survival.

If, at last, we Americans will get out of our dream world, bury every one of our false illusions forever and gird up our loins to meet this terrible challenge, then we will have taken the first step toward survival.

II. THE ARMED FORCES

Second, our Armed Forces should at the earliest possible moment be brought to overwhelming strength. The day for temporizing, shilly-shallying, and compromise is long since gone. Only four divisions of our National Guard have even been called into service. There are 25 divisions of the National Guard and 2 armored divisions which could have been called to the colors months ago.

I know perfectly well, and this is no secret from the Russians, that our National Guard has barely enough arms for training purposes to say nothing of any arms to fight with. I know perfectly well that these divisions are at half strength at most, but until something is done they will remain without arms and at half strength.

They should be called to national service tomorrow morning.

This is just a beginning. Universal military service of at least 2 years should be required of every young man to give us at least the foundation for the Armed Forces we need. It should be enacted now—this month—not next month.

An Army of 100 divisions

By the swift acceleration of the draft, the United States Army should be brought to a strength of not less than 100 divisions and our divisions are nearly twice as large as Russian divisions.

At the earliest possible moment, the Air Force should be brought to at least 80 groups.

The United States Navy should be taken out of moth balls and recommissioned without delay.

In a world of brute force, there is freedom only for the brave. If we are not prepared to fight for our freedom, then we shall surely lose it. If we are prepared to fight, we still could win. If we are strong enough and have strong friends, we may hope that communism will stop and count the cost of further aggression. We may even hope to bring Russia to her senses and so bring peace to the world.

III. PRODUCTION

Third, even if we mobilize all possible fighting manpower we shall still be outnumbered by the hordes of Russia, to say nothing of Red China and the other satellites. But fortunately manpower alone is not the decisive factor in modern war.

In modern warfare victories are not won, merely in the fighting lines but also on the production line. We can beat Russia 5 to 1 in production, but we can't save our freedom with automobiles or washing machines. Nothing less than immediate economic mobilization of our country will meet the threat that faces us.

American boys must never again be sent to fight tanks with rifles. It is a national calamity that even now, 6 months after Korea, we still do not have a military requirements program and those responsible must in due course be called to a stern accounting. Meanwhile, an avalanche of contracts for production should be let immediately and if we do not have the blueprints a lot of people ought to be fired tomorrow morning.

As a beginning, to provide the arms for defense this country and the free world need, we should set an immediate goal of 25 percent of our productive capacity for defense production.

Centering of responsibility

This whole program should be placed forthwith in the hands of one single authority with wide powers to organize the whole productive resources of this Nation. This authority can only be administered by one single boss. We have had our fill of hydra-headed monsters, of interagency quarreling, of procurement boards that didn't procure, of committees and commissions.

To avoid the dreadful waste of manpower and the stalemate of interagency quarreling, the Economic Mobilizer should have not only full supervision of production but of economic controls and of civilian manpower.

For the job of Economic Mobilizer we need to draft the ablest business executive in our country. He should be given a free hand to pick his assistants, full power and the unlimited backing of the President.

This man should be responsible only to the President and should report only to a single, joint committee of the House and Senate. He should not spend half his time, as is so often the case today, reporting to committee after committee of both Houses.

This mobilization of our productive forces is the heart of our struggle for survival. In the face of the crisis that confronts us, it is only the American genius for production that will give us the margin of strength to prevail against our enemies.

IV. THE ECONOMIC SITUATION

4. We must not deceive ourselves—this defense program will cut harshly into the living standard of every American. Today we have virtually no unemployment in the country and our industrial plants are running at full capacity. We must take steel—a lot of it—aluminum and copper and other vital raw materials that are now being used to make automobiles, radios, television sets, and washing machines. We must use those materials to make guns, ships, airplanes, tanks, and atomic weapons.

That means that there will be less goods for civilian consumption—a lot less. There will be fewer automobiles or no automobiles, few radios and television sets or none, fewer washing machines, less of nearly everything.

But at the same time the Government will be spending billions of dollars to pay for arms and to pay the wages of workers who make those arms. That means one thing—inflation.

What has happened in just the 6 months since Korea? Key raw material prices have jumped 35 percent; the average of all wholesale prices is up by 10 percent and the cost of living has climbed to an all-time peak.

Inflation could wreck the defense program. In 1945 a 30-caliber carbine cost $35.50; now it costs $64. A 60-millimeter mortar 5 years ago cost $300. Today the price tag is $554, a jump of 85 percent.

Inflation is eating away the defense program of our Government just as it eats away the buying power of your family's income.

I cannot emphasize too strongly this point: price ceiling and wage freezes will mean nothing unless we have the courage and the good sense to attack the cause of inflation and not merely the results.

Pay-as-you-go financing

The only effective way to deal with inflation is to finance our rearmament program on a pay-as-you-go basis. We cannot save our freedom and also keep our personal comforts and luxuries. Let us remember that even then we will have more than any other people in the world.

Government services must also be sharply cut down. Every dollar of nonessential Government spending—Federal, State, and local—must be cut to the bone. We must take a hard look at all subsidy programs, at every kind of Government expenditure designed to raise prices or calculated to increase costs. Many things that would be desirable in other times must be put aside in this emergency.

Industry and labor must avoid increasing costs. This is no time for profiteering or for featherbedding. Corporation profits must be taxed heavily. An excess-profits tax should siphon off any profits in excess of normal, arising out of the defense effort. Individual income taxes must be raised up and down the line, and in this connection we have to remember that the larger incomes already bear taxes running up to 91 percent. Disagreeable as it may be, the spending power of America which has to be siphoned off is not in the hands of a few rich people but in the hands of all of us.

Excise taxes on luxuries and every kind of tax which tends to discourage spending and encourage savings should be a part of our program. We must crack down on credit expansion all along the line. If Government is compelled to borrow to finance part of this program, those borrowings should be financed out of the people's savings.

But we cannot and must not borrow the savings of our people as we did in the last World War and then pay them back in 57-cent dollars. Inflation must be stopped now and stopped hard.

V. MANPOWER

Fifth, in all this effort we must rally the total resources of our Nation and the greatest of these resources are the men and women of America.

We should establish at once general registration for national service, including all Americans, both men and women, above the age of 17. The crisis that we face is total. If war should come it will come to young and old. It will come to our towns, our villages, and our cities as well as to our armies. We must be prepared for total defense now, not when it would be too late. The Nation must be able to call upon every American.

VI. OUR WORLD OBJECTIVES

If we do all the things I have outlined, we will still need strong, powerful friends elsewhere in the world. Today most of the free nations want to be our friend. But they are afraid we do not mean business or don't know how to provide leadership. Nothing will make them rearm and nothing will give them the will to fight if they do rearm, without a new degree of strength and leadership from this country in world affairs.

So, sixth, our Government should state its aims and objectives specifically for all the world to see and know. The time is long past for pretty generalities. Our Government must decide the areas in the world we intend to help defend and say so.

Let me be specific. We have shilly-shallied on Formosa four times in the last 11 months. I recognize that we have difficult problems with our friends concerning Formosa and that there is a deep division of opinion in the United Nations. But let's realize that if both Korea and Formosa should be lost then Japan is probably lost, too.

For 30 years the prime objective of Russian foreign policy has been to get the industrial might of Germany and Japan added to Russia's masses so then she could be sure to conquer the world.

Add to this the fact that Indochina, Burma, and Thailand are the rice bowl of the Orient. If the present Soviet conquests continue in these areas, Japan will wither on the vine from starvation and so will Indonesia. If the Communists go on down through Malaya, there go our rubber and our tin.

The time for wobbling on our major foreign policy objectives is long since past. Unless we are going to shrink within our own borders and wait to be conquered by a Communist world, we must boldly make decisions that will keep friends for our cause both in Europe and in Asia.

Right now I want to suggest that we get rid of some more of our illusions. We are in a desperate struggle to decide whether the whole world is going to be taken over by savages. In that kind of a struggle I propose that we should stop being fussy about who will help prevent it.

Accepting those on our side

I want to know who has divisions and who's willing to fight on our side.

Turkey has the biggest army in Europe and they will fight. We know that in case of war the British Commonwealth will fight and they have the third greatest air force in the world as well as a lot of divisions and a great Navy. These and other nations are now fighting by our side in Korea while France is waging a hard fight in Indochina. Many other nations in Europe, the Near East, in Asia, and in the Americas stand ready to fight for freedom and we should encourage them to the limit.

Now I propose that we stop bickering among ourselves and make friends with everybody who has the will to fight and the combat divisions to put in the field. If they will fight on the side of the angels I am willing to welcome them as allies whether I agree with their domestic policies or not. I want to keep human freedom alive on this earth.

To be specific: Tito has 30 divisions and we think he will fight on our side. We know Franco will fight and he has 22 divisions.

Now let me get a little tougher. We think we know that the Germans and Japanese would fight under some kind of arrangement, whether under American leadership, or otherwise, we should enlist them in the world struggle against their ancient enemy.

I made what I thought was my final appeal to keep the Chinese free and on our side a year and a half ago. But I'm going to try once more. Even today, there are still Chinese, millions of them, not only dozens of divisions on Formosa but hundreds of thousands of guerrillas on the mainland who will fight communism. I say, let's make sure they are able to fight and harass and sabotage and do the things to our enemies that are being done to us.

VII. ECONOMIC AND MILITARY AID

So, seventh, that brings me to the Marshall plan aid for Europe. The present phase of our struggle with world communism has flared in Asia. But we must keep in clear sight the fact that Europe is still a greater prize the Communists are after. We have used our economic resources through the Marshall plan to help Europe get on its feet. Now we face an urgent situation that requires Europe to rearm at once.

Since before there was a Marshall plan I have been demanding that it be used to bring about a United States of Europe, unifying her 270,000,000 people in the greatest force for peace on earth. I say again for what is probably the last time it will be useful: We should continue Marshall plan aid but only upon condition that (1), we actually get a united defense of Europe and its full rearmament; (2) that we get the European economic barriers torn down; and (3) that Europe move to political unity so her great strength can be mobilized on the side of freedom.

Moreover, our military aid should be extended only to those countries who demonstrate their willingness to fight on our side.

VIII. THE OFFENSIVE

8. Let me remind you once again that we must abandon our defensive mood. Defense never prevails against powerful attack. We must stop letting Russia have a monopoly on initiative. With a limited perimeter she can, through satellites, continue to attack the world at one point after another and bleed us white, without shedding a drop of Russian blood. Then she can conquer a prostrate free world with her 200 divisions.

We should launch the kind of moral and political campaign which can take advantage of the fatal weaknesses of dictators who attempt to rule 800,000,000 people with an iron hand.

America will never wage a preventive war. But we cannot sit idly by and allow the free world to be bled to death by the oriental torture of a thousand cuts.

To save our country we must start turning this thing around. From the outside every despotism looks hard and formidable. Inside they are rotten. Let's get busy and exploit the rottenness of Soviet Russia. Let's make our propaganda offensive mean something.

Maximum of retaliation

Where Russia sends 1 movie showing they are saving the world, let us send 10 good ones.

Where they send a million dollars on sabotage, let's spend $2,000,000 on sabotage.

Where they have the best spy system in the world, let us, for heaven's sake, get twice as good a spy system instead of practically none at all.

All this calls for the kind of brains and the kind of tough support for good brains in action, the kind of quality and integrity that only devoted freemen can give to the cause.

I am sure that with real leadership the American people will respond—every one of them—to the sacrifices that are necessary if we are going to survive.

The hour is very late—I do not know how late. Whether we still have a day or a year or 2 years, not a second should be lost. Our Government, our people, the United Nations, and the spokesmen of the free world must rally now.

If we respond with all our strength, with all our hearts, and courage, I do not know what it will cost in toil and tears and treasure. But I do know we will save our souls, and with God's help we will save our country and the cause of human liberty.

Editorial Tribute to Hon. Hubert H. Humphrey, of Minnesota

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL H. DOUGLAS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, December 15 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, the December 1950 DFL News carried a fine editorial on one of our esteemed colleagues, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY]. I share the admiration of this periodical for the Senator from Minnesota, whom I consider one of the most valuable Members of this body. Time and time again he has demonstrated his keen insight and brilliant mind in the study of complex legislative issues. For this reason, I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOOKS, EDITORIALS, COLUMNS, AND MARINES

With our preoccupation with State and local politics, and as familiar as we are with our fireball Senator, HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, we may sometimes lose sight of his real genius.

Fortunately, however, those concerned with the national scene have not only noticed Senator HUMPHREY, but they have come to respect him, and, in some cases, fear him. In all cases they know him.

In recent days his name has popped up four places: A national best-selling book about politics, an editorial in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, a syndicated columnist, and the Marine Corps League, who commended the Senator with a medal.

The Marine Corps League had this to say about HUMPHREY:

"For meritorious service in the field of legislation, on rehabilitation of Marine Corps personnel and Marine Corps veterans. For the protection of the marines engaged in Korea, by the introduction of a bill to insure the combatants rights, as a member of the Armed Forces engaged in action other than those stipulated by a declaration of war. By his earnest interest in the protection of the rights of the families of the members of the Marine Corps Reserve recalled to active duty. For his cosponsorship of a bill to fix the personnel strength of the United States Marine Corps and to make the Commandant of the Marine Corps a permanent member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff."

The syndicated columnist was Holmes Alexander, from Washington. Here is what he said, speaking of big events in Congress:

"The airtight logic and fearless delivery of Senator HUMPHREY, Democrat, of Minnesota, against the McCarran bill. Speaking for nearly 2 hours and answering questions for another hour, HUMPHREY was superb. He never defended communism. He never questioned the Government's right to self-protection against subversives. But he came out against legislative man traps and snoop-group smear-fests.

"His speech contained more genuine Americanism than was heard elsewhere throughout the long and bitter debate.

"There is little doubt that HUMPHREY would have carried the day against the McCarran ('I've got him on my list') bill in almost any other political climate. But with a war on and an election pending too many on-the-fence Senators were moved by the thought that if the McCarran bill didn't catch commies, it would at least catch votes back home. HUMPHREY did not win his fight but he did show himself a man for a' that."

The St. Louis Post-Dispatch, one of the more honored newspapers in America, saw fit to list the 10 greatest men in the United States Senate. Among the 10 great was the Senator from Minnesota, HUBERT H. HUMPHREY.

In their many-barbed book Truman Merry-Go-Round, Robert S. Allen and William V. Shannon cited HUMPHREY as working against boodle grab bills. They said he ripped the pretense from Senator BYRD's "One thin tenuous claim to self-justification" as chairman of the Joint Committee on Reduction of Federal Expenditures.

They concluded that "HUMPHREY is an excellent influence in the Senate, where the liberal forces have so long lacked a brilliant spokesman with general popular backing."

So it seems that, on a national level, our Senator is attracting attention. And that's fine. Just as we knew it would be. But it wouldn't hurt anything if we whooped it up a little more for him on the local scene.

The Crusade for Home Ownership

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALBERT M. COLE
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 14, 1950

Mr. COLE of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Henry A. Bubb, delivered at the fifty-eighth annual convention of the United States Savings and Loan League, Washington, D. C., Wednesday, November 29, 1950:

THE CRUSADE FOR HOME OWNERSHIP
(By Henry A. Bubb)

In Chicago a year ago, you people paid me one of the highest tributes that has ever been mine, when you elected me to the presidency of the United States Savings and Loan League. Tonight I come before you, first, to give an accounting, as it were, of my stewardship of this high position and, secondly, to leave with you some thoughts I have as to the future of ourselves and this great business.

It is hard for me to express to you adequately the experience that has been mine during 1950. I said a moment ago that this was a great business; it is impossible to have a clear impression of just how great it is or what an outstanding job it renders to the people of the United States until you have traveled, as I have, the length and breadth of this country and seen with your own eyes the contributions this business is making everywhere. When you get the broad view, one that is uninterrupted by regional or State boundaries, then you begin to realize that we are all part of an enterprise that is dynamic in its nature, its character, and its usefulness.

As we near the end of another year, it must be apparent to you, as it is to me, that the problems and troubles we face in the coming year are certainly more forbidding than those of a year ago. At this fifty-eighth annual convention—the largest, finest, and best attended convention we have ever had—we are, however, given the chance to pause and catch our breath before going on to meet new and fresh challenges, whatever and wherever they may be. To my mind, it is not without some significance that this opportunity to rededicate ourselves to the principles of thrift and home ownership should take place in the historic setting of our Nation's Capital in the very shadow of Washington's Monument. The savings and loan business, after all, has as its foundation the same philosophy that guided our founding fathers when they were devising what was then a radical notion, a government that would be of, for, and by the people.

This past year, from the point of view of our business, has been one of the most eventful we have ever witnessed. In practically every month, there have been important matters of legislation affecting us before the National Congress. In retrospect, I think, as I said in a letter to George Bliss, the able chairman of our legislative committee, that 1950 has been one of the most successful and noteworthy years in legislative endeavor on behalf of the United States Savings and Loan League. It would be less than fair not to give credit and thanks at this point, to the efforts of our fine legislative committee and its very able and hard-working chairman, to our expert and highly intelligent staffs in Chicago and Washington, to our State league people, and, finally, to the many individuals within the business who gave unselfishly of their time and effort in order to further our legislative program.

COMING OF AGE

After a year as your national president and after having visited nearly every section of the country, one of my major convictions is that, at last, this business is coming of age. It is coming of age in a way and manner befitting one of the great financial businesses of our time. In many places, savings and loan executives have become the key men in civic undertakings. A prime example of this is your next president, Walter J. L. Ray, who has an outstanding record of civic endeavor in Detroit. In many other places, our people are known as the best sources of public information on thrift and housing. Most of us are making an attempt to get away from the humdrum of everyday routine, to give ourselves time for more significant enterprises. In short, we are beginning to develop a type of community leadership from within our business that is in line with our size and strength.

Our business has thrived on performing a valuable service that is available to everyone. Probably more than any other type of financial business, our roots are right in the heart of the communities in which we live, and this loyalty to our friends and neighbors has enabled us to become the custodians of the savings of more than 10,000,000 people, and the vehicle by which many millions of American families have been able to buy and own homes. I am sure that you are as proud of this magnificent record as I am.

AWARENESS OF SOCIALISTIC TREND

In recent years, and particularly 1950, we have begun to develop a much more militant attitude against the plans, programs, and philosophies which affect us adversely. One of my most gratifying experiences as president of your United States Savings and Loan League was the exceptional response to our tough aggressive little socialism pamphlet which we put out last spring. More than two and a half million copies were distributed and so far as your officers were able to determine, the reaction was almost unanimously favorable.

To my mind, the attitude of a growing willingness to fight back against socialism in our business was long overdue. For nearly two decades, most of us have had the notion that we shouldn't mix politics with business. What has happened, of course, is that the politics were mixed in anyway, not to the advantage of the businessman, incidentally, and it has been only recently that we have discovered that we were played for a prize chump. Unfortunately, not all businessmen are yet willing to fight back. But I say to you that we in the savings and loan business—a business of the people—are able and willing to stand up and fight for the things we believe, and certainly we intend to do so in the months and years ahead.

Three weeks ago yesterday, the American people went to the polls and chose our National Congress for the next 2 years. From the returns, it would appear that the make-up of Congress until 1952 will be somewhat more conservative or, if you choose, somewhat less radical than it has been since 1948. Today if you ask any political analyst, he will have about a dozen reasons in less than a dozen seconds as to why the election went the way it did. If you will excuse a somewhat personal expression, it is my belief that a majority of the American people are sick of Reds in Government, of inflation, of public housing, of the Brannan plan, of the waste of taxpayers' money for socialistic panaceas, and that the people now realize it is not worth a war in order to promote "continued world prosperity." They have also found out that when you vote for a class-hatred candidate who favors robbing Peter to pay Paul, you'd better watch out what kind of a guy you pick up with.

For the first time in as long as I can remember, a considerable number of the members of one of our great parties were willing to stand up and define the issues in everyday language, say why socialism is wrong, and stick by their guns. I am glad to say that these included a handful of conservative Congressmen in the outlying districts in the great Democratic stronghold of Chicago, who campaigned vigorously against public housing—and won. These also included conservatives from Kansas, from down-State Illinois, from Ohio, from Colorado, and the other States, who brought the issues of socialized medicine and the Brannan plan out into the open—and won. If there is any lesson to be learned from the recent campaign, and certainly from the "me too" farce of 1948, it is that you can only win respect and votes by fighting for your convictions and principles. These are the only things that really matter; if you don't have them, you don't have anything. It probably goes without saying, that you may not always be able to win on principle all the time, but I'd sooner lose than sell out my ideals, and so would you, and so would every thinking American who is not a coward and who understands what his American birthright of freedom really means.

At the moment, because of the overshadowing uncertainties of our international crisis, it is difficult to ascertain the precise meaning of the recent elections to our business. While it is safe to assume that Congress may not be quite so eager to socialize our business, I urge you not to hold out the same hope for the Government housing crowd in Washington. They are trying as best they know how to put us out of business, and I do not think for a minute that one election set-back will alter their plans. They never give up; in fact, the result of the 1950 election probably will give them incentive to rush along their socialistic program as fast as possible before more people get wise to them.

We will make, I fear, a grave and tragic mistake if we sit back and say: "Well, everything is all right for at least 2 years." You can be assured that the energetic disciples of socialism will be on the job day and night, preaching to everyone they can reach. It is, in my judgment, sheer nonsense to think that because a few more conservatives have been named to Congress the sweep toward socialism has been stopped. The timetable has been disrupted, of course, but perhaps only temporarily. Unless the tide of reaction is reinforced, unless it continues to gain momentum, I see little reason for long-pull optimism. We cannot afford to relax; we cannot afford to lose the initiative. Freedom is an elusive thing; while it can be lost overnight, it requires a constant vigilance to make sure it is preserved.

The preservation of freedom for the individual—freedom to make his own way, freedom to work as hard or as little as he will—is the great challenge of the twentieth century man. Felix Morley said recently that it was the love of liberty more than a century ago that ignited a drive in Western Europe for a new liberalism—a philosophy of opportunity and freedom for the individual. Since that time we have seen this original conception of liberalism steadily degenerate until it has come to mean, to many persons, a disguise for tyranny. To forestall any further infringements upon the rights of the individual is the most compelling task we face. Let us realize, however, that this type of endeavor is a long-term project; the mission cannot be accomplished overnight and may not even be accomplished in our lifetime. But it is a task—a responsibility—that cannot be evaded or delegated, unless you will be faithless to yourself, your children, your country, and your God.

OUR PRINCIPLES CHALLENGED

In the long crusade that lies ahead of us, for that is what it really is, there is, to my knowledge, no force better equipped to lead this drive for a revival of principle than our great business. The reasons for this come, as I said earlier, from our association in the tremendous private-home-ownership movement in this country. I think our institutions can appropriately, in all modesty, claim a major share of the credit for the dramatic surge upward in home ownership during the past decade. We now have more than 22,000,000 home-owning families in the cities and towns of America, nearly twice as many as we had in 1940. Thanks to this growth in home ownership there is now, for the first time, a clear majority of home owners over tenants. The political and economic consequences of this development are enormous. It means, first, that a substantial majority of American families have a big stake in the future of America—their homes—and that they will insist on an orderly development of their lives and those of their children. It means, secondly, that home ownership has come within reach of men in all walks of life, union men and nonunion, white-collar workers and industrial personnel. Finally, it means that the home-ownership movement in the years just ahead can be nurtured into the most effective and potent force for basic political conservatism that exists in the country. Truly, the 1950's can become the decade of the home owner when his voice is the dominant voice in the shaping of our national economy and Government.

There is no element in American life other than our business which can perform the vital task of stimulating the continued growth of private home ownership. Fate is entrusting to us this assignment, which has no equal in importance or significance on the present American domestic scene. We have a rendezvous with destiny, and my appeal to you now is to gird yourselves for the most challenging, most compelling, and most fascinating job of our time.

GROWTH ESSENTIAL TO SUCCESS

To do this job—to meet our obligations—I would urge you to participate in a 10-year crusade for home ownership during the 1950's. Whatever has been done before will appear slight by comparison before the wonderful progress that can lie ahead if we will but seize the opportunity which presents itself. To do his part in this great an dramatic undertaking, the best thing a savings association and cooperative bank man can do is to double or treble the size of his business as rapidly and soundly as possible. As a first step, my recommendation to you here tonight is that each of you go back and present to your directors an ambitious program of expansion covering the next 5 years. There is no reason why our savings associations should not eventually finance up to 70 percent of the construction loans that are available in your community. There is no reason also why our institutions should not be able eventually to attract at least 50 percent of all the new savings that are available in your community. Certainly you should be constantly impressing your directors and your people with the fact that continued expansion is the national policy of your business in order that our country can successfully destroy the assault forces of socialism and that the carrying out of this policy is the direct responsibility of everyone associated in the business.

If we pursue this deliberate plan of expansion with all the ability and energy at our command, it will mean by 1960 a doubling in size of our total resources from the present $15,000,000,000 to more than $30,000,000,000. It will result in an increase in the percentage of home ownership among our urban families from the present 58 percent to more than 75 percent. That is the avowed goal of our business. With 75 percent home ownership neither the Communists nor the Socialists will ever win here. Finally, this expansion will make possible a doubling in the number of the 2,000,000 World War II veterans who have already bought homes under the GI home-loan program. These veterans are the flower of our Nation's manhood, and an ever-growing number of them should be in the vanguard of private home ownership.

If these objectives seem at first glance to be somewhat impractical, let me remind you that the odds were very small in 1940 that we could have doubled home ownership in the ensuing decade, even without a 4-year war tossed in. But the fact is—and let us never forget it—that the shining ambition of every decent American family is to own a home of their own, and so long as we foster and encourage that ambition to the best of our abilities, then we are living up to the responsibilities that are ours, and we are doing the job that has been assigned us in this great crusade of liberty.

Let us always remember, too, that the people who save money are those who do not ask for aid from the Federal Government, and the more of them we have on our side, the better our chance of survival. Let us remember that to the people who have worked hard and saved long to buy a home the policy of Government ownership of homes is just as repugnant and distasteful as it is to us, and the more of them we have on our side, the better off we are. Let us remember, finally, to make a consistent effort to enroll young people in our Nation-wide family of savers and homeowners, keeping in mind always that in their hearts and minds and actions lies the hope for tomorrow.

OUR POLITICAL OBLIGATION

As your president during the past year, my principal aim has been to instill in our people an acute awareness of the need for taking a more active part in politics. Since the election dozens of letters have come to my office telling of the efforts of savings-association men to elect candidates—either Republicans or Democrats—who were opposed to public housing and other aspects of the welfare state. It is a measure of great satisfaction to me, as it should also be to you, that more and more people in our business are awakening to the dangers that confront us. In many areas, where the key issue was socialism versus a return to fundamental principles, I am confident that our people played an important role in repudiating the champions of collectivism.

The success of our political efforts thus far is small to what it can be if we persist and persevere in these activities in the days ahead. During the next 2 years, we will have the chance to consolidate our forces against socialism and then expand our gains at the presidential election in 1952. As I have said, we can make what is possibly the greatest contribution to the cause of individual justice and freedom by keeping the trend of home ownership surging forward. History will testify as to how we meet this challenge, as individuals and as a business, and as to our determination to make sure that the chalice of opportunity—our most precious heritage—is held aloft to be passed on to our children and grandchildren.

Our job ahead is not easy. On the contrary, at times it will be taxing and exhausting. But it can, I think, be kept stimulating and adventurous if we approach our work with the fervor of missionaries. In a sense, we are missionaries. We need to be fired by faith in the righteousness of our cause. We need a zeal that is spiritual in its origin. For, in the final analysis, this is a religious struggle, in which our objective is to insure that the individual, created in the image and likeness of God, shall not be submerged into a godless state. Let us apply ourselves to this mission in the years ahead, in the wisdom and knowledge that only in the pursuit of principle is the freedom worth having.

As I have said to many of you before, this freedom is a priceless thing. It is the thing that has made this country different from all the other nations of the world. It is the thing that has made it possible for people of all classes and incomes to own their homes. And it is in the light of this freedom that we will go forward to make sure it is preserved for the generations to follow.

Address by Hon. Wayne N. Aspinall, of Colorado, at National Reclamation Convention, Spokane, Wash., November 16, 1950

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK
OF ARIZONA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, our colleague, Congressman ASPINALL, of Colorado, gave a very informative address before the National Reclamation Association at Spokane, Wash., last month. Under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I herewith include the text of the address.

The gentleman from Colorado comes from the district formerly represented for so long by the Honorable Ed Taylor, who in the later years of his life was chairman of the Appropriations Committee of this House. Both of these men, representing the western part of the State of Colorado where so large a proportion of the precipitation occurs, have naturally taken a vital interest in the matter of water utilization including irrigation. For this reason the address of Congressman ASPINALL, which follows, is of special interest:

Mr. Toastmaster, members and guests of the National Reclamation Association in annual convention assembled.

It is a distinct and much appreciated honor for anyone to be requested to address such a gathering as this. But it is even more so when the one so honored is but a freshman Congressman. I am glad to advise the officers and members of this association that, to me, this appearance is one of the highlights of my first term in the National House of Representatives. It has been a pleasure to work with the representatives of your association, especially on congressional committee work, and I can assure you that I look forward to a continuing personal enjoyment in our work together.

In the spring of 1904, as a 7-year-old boy, I moved from the verdant covered hills of Ohio to the semiarid lands of Colorado. I experienced my first eastern Colorado dust-storm before I was 8 years of age. I can remember, as if it were only yesterday, seeing the sand and top soil start covering up the tumbleweed and wire fence, and then, continue the drifting until the three-wire fence was entirely covered. As a schoolboy I saw one of the first reclamation projects ever authorized come into fruition—namely the Uncompahgre project of Western Colorado. During my college days, the Grand Valley reclamation project was completed. Since that time my family and I have been entirely dependent in our agricultural pursuits upon the waters delivered through the facilities of such project.

This last winter, when the longest tunnel of the Grand Valley project collapsed—after but a little over 30 years of operation—it was only natural that in my office all other work and activities were sidetracked to help secure the necessary authorizations and procedures for the rebuilding of the tunnel. It was most gratifying that this rehabilitation project gained national interest because of the united efforts of all concerned and the speed of the work which made possible the saving of crops on 30,000 acres of land.

I recite this personal history for the sole purpose of advising each of you that I personally understand some of the values of the work in which we are engaged.

On the marble-bordered walls of the beautiful rotunda of the stately and gold-gilded capitol building of the State of Colorado, there appears the following saga to water:

"Here is a land where life is written in water.
The West is where the water was and is
Father and son of old mother and daughter.
Following rivers up immensities of range and desert thirsting the sundown ever,
Crossing a hill to climb a hill still drier,
A different name from last night's camping fire
Look to the green within the mountain cup;
Look to the prairie parched for water lack;
Look to the sun that pulls the ocean up;
Look to the cloud that gives the oceans back;
Look to your heart and may your wisdom grow
To power of lightning and to peace of snow."

I understand that I do not need to argue the cause of national reclamation in this group. Yet, I am sure that it is the first duty of those of us who are pleased to call ourselves friends of reclamation, that we understand fully; not only the successes and benefits which have come to us heretofore, the great possibilities of continued successes and benefits, but also that we now recognize what appears to be the opposition and road blocks which may be thrown into our paths in the future.

We have come a long way since the 17th day of June 1902.

Few of us remember that the work in the interests of reclamation was originally assigned to the United States Geological Survey, later it was given over to the Reclamation Service, which Service is now called the Bureau of Reclamation.

Originally the cost of construction work was to be repaid in 10 equal annual instalments, the payment of such instalments to begin with the completion of the project. No interest was to be paid on the money. In other words, receipts from the sale of public property in the Western States were to be used for the building and development of the agricultural resources of the Western States. In 1914, the period of repayment was extended to 20 years. In 1924, a plan was adopted wherein no limit was set on the time of repayment, but the criterion of repayment was changed to the ability of the land to pay. Originally the payment was to be 5 percent of the gross annual crop return averaged over a period of 10 years. In 1926, the act was amended to provide for repayment in not to exceed 40 years. Since that time, with the approval of other acts of Congress, as well as by action of the executive department, the time of repayment has been extended in many instances to a hundred years or more.

It is only natural that the opponents of reclamation have come to look with more and more distrust upon what appears to be the ever-changing policies toward the repayment of moneys used in the construction of reclamation projects. This opposition can easily be determined and the necessary steps taken to combat it. On the other hand, where opposition arises within the ranks of the friends of reclamation itself, then we have a much more difficult situation with which to cope.

Originally the reclamation program was concerned with the use of water for irrigation only. Of late years, the multiple-use program has brought into the picture the development of power, the furnishing of municipal water, the questions of navigation, public recreation, etc., all of which problems, of course, are to be found within the contents of what has been known in this present session of Congress as H. R. 1770, the technical provisions of which it is not my wish to discuss in this talk.

I do not have the time or the desire to argue the matter of these advanced uses of reclamation. I accept what appears to be the prevailing thought and law in this respect as such is laid down in the recent case of the United States against Gerlach Livestock Co., in which it was held inter alia, as follows: "* * * Thus the power of Congress to promote the general welfare through large-scale projects for reclamation, irrigation, or other internal improvement is now as clear and ample as its power to accomplish the same results indirectly through resort to strained interpretation of the power over navigation." In other words, it can be said that Federal reclamation, as we now have it today, is in the interest of the general welfare of the United States. It is not merely in the nature of, or limited to, a plan for extending financial aid to private beneficiaries under a reclamation project. This line of thinking and the development made possible under it, of course, not only provides for additional benefits, but it also provides for further differences between the proponents and opponents of reclamation, and, even more dangerous, for differences between the advocates of a strong reclamation program.

Recently I have endeavored to secure information which might bring to our minds the fact of the enormous growth of this reclamation child which was born in 1902. Much of this information, which we should have for the early years, is lacking. It is interesting to note that in 1902 an appropriation of $165,000 was made; in 1907, or the fifth year, appropriations totaling $54,780,000 were made; in 1942, or the fortieth year, appropriations totaling $102,201,600 were made; and, in 1950, or the forty-eighth year, Congress appropriated for such purposes a total of $361,522,734. Such figures tend to show the rapid growth of this favored governmental institution of the West. Yet, when we are advised that the all-time total appropriations for Federal reclamation is only $2,418,683,963, and that the estimated total cost of the present Korean incident alone is $10,000,000,000, then we can easily see how little in fact has been done in the building for an integrated peacetime economy in the great West as compared with the expense of what is known as a minor incident in foreign matters. Information which would give to us an over-all total in dollars for combined authorizations for reclamation is not possible, largely because of the fact that the Bureau has in recent times departed from the procedure of asking for fixed authorization amounts and would rather secure permission to build a project without stating its fixed cost. I know that I am safe in saying that this procedure is frowned upon by the Members of Congress, and especially by the committee having jurisdiction. It is recognized that with the fluctuations in cost of material and labor, that it is impossible to prepare an estimate for the cost of the project which migh be good for an indefinite time in the future. On the other hand, surely it should be possible to give to Congress a definite idea as to the costs of a project and provide for the use of a formula which would make allowances for the possible decrease or increase of costs in labor and material. Such procedure would not only help to lessen the criticism of some of our eastern critics of reclamation, but it would also tend to do away with the necessity of reauthorizing or amending old authorizations.

This brings up the question of "sick projects.' Although we have authorized but two projects of any consequence during the present session of Congress, yet we have reauthorized many of the old projects that have proved to be unfeasible under the original authorizations. When it is necessary to reauthorize a project or to amend an old authorization, and to write off a part of the original amount charged to the users, we simply give additional material for the fire which our opponents keep trying to build under us.

The record of accomplishments of the last 2 years in reclamation matters is not such as to bring to us too much optimism in determining what may happen during the next decade or so. The record of the Eighty-first Congress shows that we have, in addition to legislating for some sick projects, authorized:

1. The construction of the Weber basin project in Utah in the amount of $69,500,000. However, the Presidential approval of such authorization is so qualified that it is very doubtful that this authorization will be of much value to those sponsoring the project;

2. The construction of certain canals in the California Central Valley project;

3. The construction of the Palisades Dam and power project on the Snake River in Idaho;

4. The rehabilitation of the private irrigation district at Vermejo, N. Mex. These authorizations in themselves are, I believe, well under $150,000,000. The present Congress also gave its consent to four river compact agreements. This last mentioned procedure costs the Federal Government nothing in construction and but very little in administrative expense.

All of us are aware of those who oppose a militant and comprehensive reclamation program. However, in order to bring them to our thinking at this time, I shall briefly enumerate the following groups:

1. There is the group which is resident of those communities where a great deal, if not most, of the construction work has already been accomplished and at least a great deal of the water, subject to beneficial use, is being used. In order to be perfectly fair, one should admit that in many instances those of this group have been able to secure construction and use of their projects without too much help from the Federal Government, although in most instances Federal aid has at least built the foundation for the facilities which they have.

2. There is the group which desires the construction of large projects and does not favor the building of smaller units. This group is particularly difficult to cope with, inasmuch as the officials of the Bureau itself seem to be consistently favoring large jobs over small ones.

3. There is the group composed of those people who for some reason or other, mostly known to themselves, attempt to thwart the program of reclamation as we understand it in favor of valley authorities. Personally, I do not feel that there is an all-out-and-out conflict between valley authorities and compact agreements. But here again in the supporters of valley authorities we find those who favor large undertakings rather than smaller individual projects.

4. At the present time we are hearing a great deal from a group which may be labeled the "nature-lover contingency." This group is composed mostly of easterners who, living in an almost entirely developed East, now appear to desire to have the West left as a wilderness for a playground for a large segment of our population. This is a most difficult group to oppose, inasmuch as most of us love the beautiful things of nature and are not especially desirous of the destruction of natural wonders or man-made works of the past.

5. There is the group which thinks in terms of public power and its possibilities first and irrigation and reclamation second. I know that each one of us appreciates the additional problems that have been brought to our attention because of the development of the multiple-use project. It is very easy for members of this group to so operate that they divide us in our mutual ambitions to have an integrated program.

6. There is the group which lives east of the 17 Western States and the members of which continually suggest that already there is an overproduction of agricultural products and that the financial security of the agricultural East and Middle West is in danger. Although it is admitted that the population of the United States has increased 50 percent in the last 35 years and that the center of our population continues to move westward, yet these opponents of reclamation consistently contend that if there is to be any future development of the agricultural possibilities of the West, it should be left until the time when there is a need for a further production of agricultural products.

7. Then there is the group that favors the carrying out of most of the work by the Army engineers. In this respect, it is interesting to note that since the development of the flood-control programs and reclamation development programs in the 17 Western States, a little less than $2,500,000,000 has been spent for reclamation, of which amount a trifle less than one and a third billions has been repayable. In the 34 nonreclamation States a little over $4,500,000,000 has been spent in a program of reclamation (flood control) and only a trifle over one-half of a billion has been repayable. It is to be hoped that these two great agencies of the Government, i. e., the Army engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation, may become more and more cooperative.

There should be a definite line of demarcation between policy making and administration. Our form of government is so arranged that Congress itself has the policy-making authority and should accept such responsibility always. The Department of Interior and the Bureau and their personnel are administrators and should never trespass upon the powers of the legislative body, even by the dragging of their feet, to gain ends which would not come to them through the regular differentiation of powers. This, of course, is likewise true of the relationship of the Bureau of the Budget and Congress. The question of final feasibility of a project is a matter of policy to be determined by Congress after study by competent engineers. As to whether or not a project, after having been determined to be feasible by the Bureau of Reclamation and congressional action, fits into the national economy should very definitely be a matter for the budget to decide. However, the procedure which sometimes appears to be followed by the Bureau of the Budget and which hampers and embarrasses reclamation programs, and all too often permits the bartering of influences and pressure on related projects, is, in my opinion, not good for the national economy, let alone the reclamation program. Also, we have interdepartmental jurisdictional squabbles and jealousies. These not only cause unnecessary delay but, at the same time, they tend to create a distrust in the minds of the general public.

All that I have said and implied leads up to but one thing, and that is that the program of national reclamation has now arrived in perilous times, not only because of existing international situations but also because of opposing thought and programs at home. Friends of reclamation should and must present a united front when dealing with their opposition.

Your association has gained throughout its years of experience a trusted position with most of the proponents of a strong reclamation program. Your record with Congress has been largely one of help and strength. In a land where the majority are expected to determine the policy, it surely is not asking too much of any organization when it presents its program to a national legislative body, that the program formally decided upon by majority action of such group will be sponsored wholeheartedly by the whole group. Not desiring to be critical of any personalities, I do wish to leave this thought with you, that you cannot expect too favorable legislative action by a committee unless you present a 100-percent position before such committee at the time it considers legislation in which you are interested.

Matters of reclamation and reclamation policy are most technical. The ordinary layman understands but a small part of the problem: the securing of money, the engineering (and here, may I say, not too much of it), the construction of dams, canals, and power plants and the releasing of waters to the canals and power to the transmission lines. Other than this, he does not know and he does not care to know what else may be necessary. The fine technical matters and policies are left to the expert to study and determine. There are not too many such experts in the legislative committees, let alone in the legislative bodies as a whole.

I would suggest further that in your work before the State and National legislatures, that you and your representatives pay particular attention to so-called legislative etiquette. As a rule, one gains favorable consideration in any matter only after arousing the interest of the one who is uninformed, or poorly informed. I think that it is equally safe to say that most people are charitable and if approached correctly will give freely of their time and capabilities of consideration. In legislative circles we find just human beings the same as we do in other places, and if the etiquette of the situation calls for certain people to be considered, then naturally that is the better policy to follow.

There are today two great jurisdictional experiments being studied and tried to a limited extent in the reclamation areas of the West. I refer, of course, to the so-called valley authorities and compact agreements. I think it behooves the members of your organization to watch these developments very closely for the possible determination of whether one is superior to the other as a general policy, or as a special geographical policy, or whether it is possible for both to exist effectively within the same over-all program.

Man has worried for ages over the question of water, its possession and its use. With the development and growth of nations these problems have, as a rule, become more vexatious and difficult of solution. Now today, in this country of ours, with the advent of the airplane and its conquest of the skies, there are those who believe that most of the vexing problems confronting those of us who give allegiance and service to reclamation programs can be solved by a short journey into the ether with the scattering of a few chemicals among the clouds. Some will suggest that this new curative program foretells the solution of our problems. Personally, I am not so confident of the thinking of these modern rainmakers. On the other hand, it behooves each and every one of us to be able to adapt ourselves to new and changing situations and conditions.

In closing I wish to repeat the last two lines of the saga which I first gave you:

"Look to your heart and may your wisdom grow
To power of lightning and to peace of snow."

Democracy Can Be Strengthened in Middle East by Help to Israel

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following resolution approved by the executive board of the Independent Order Brith Abraham, 37 Seventh Street, New York, of which Mr. Louis Weissman is grand master and Mr. Adolph Stern is grand secretary. The Independent Order Brith Abraham is one of the largest of American Jewish benevolent organizations:

Resolution urging grants-in-aid for Israel

Whereas the President of the United States, the State Department, and Congress are working diligently to keep the peace of the world; and

Whereas peace can best be maintained by strengthening the economy of smaller and weaker nations which are struggling to maintain the democratic precepts of life; and

Whereas the State of Israel has demonstrated a devotion to the principles of democracy and has proven to be the bulwark and barometer of democracy in the Near East since its inception; and

Whereas the State of Israel has brought to fulfillment in our own time the highest hopes of redeeming large masses of Jews from suffering and homelessness and placing them on the road of human dignity; and

Whereas the State of Israel's future program calls for the redemption of hundreds of thousands of Jews from lands where their political and economic status is precarious and their right to live freely as democratic Jews is restricted and denied: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Independent Order Brith Abraham, one of the largest American Jewish fraternal orders in the country, call upon the American Government for grants-in-aid to the State of Israel for the best interests of the United States and as a partner in the struggle for democracy. Such grants-in-aid will help Israel alleviate itself of its desperate financial situation and help the new-born state continue its noble work in relief, rescue, resettlement, and rehabilitation of the thousands of refugees who are daily migrating into Israel. We are confident of Israel's capacity to achieve economic and self-sufficiency if she obtains grants-in-aid to carry through her constructive, humane, and democratic program for peace and security.

LOUIS A. WEISSMAN,
Grand Master.
ADOLPH STERN,
Grand Secretary.

Mr. Speaker

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY
OF VERMONT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, as and of some 17 years and plus experience as a Member of Congress with you, under five or six Speakers, the memory of man "to the contrary notwithstand," I would like now, nonpartisanly, to say to you that none of those under whom I have ever served so well justified the confidence and esteem for fairness, integrity of ruling, knowledge of parliamentary law, according to precedents, power to control, persuasively, what otherwise might have been mob, as have you.

Unless, of course, it might have been JOE MARTIN, for whom both you and I have the highest regard and greatest respect, Sam, I tried to be nonpartisan, but I slipped.

So, Mr. Speaker, may you live so long as you wish, and have all you wish so long as you live—if there may be anything to add to the great record you already have made. So long.

What Are We Waiting For?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER THORNBERRY
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. THORNBERRY. Mr. Speaker, in the Senate of the United States on December 12 the junior Senator from Texas, LYNDON B. JOHNSON, delivered an inspired address on the national preparedness program entitled "What Are We Waiting For?"

In his forthright and hard-hitting remarks, Senator JOHNSON said that the national policy of wait and see must end, and end now. This speech, refreshing in its frankness and inspiring in the bold program outlined by Senator JOHNSON, has received much favorable comment in the press of the Nation.

I commend to Members of the House two articles from the Washington Star of December 14 dealing with Senator JOHNSON's remarks. One is an editorial by the Star entitled "Call to Arms," and the other is a column by the noted analyst, Gould Lincoln, headed, "'Wait and see' policy due for change shortly." The Washington Star's comment that Senator JOHNSON's remarks make sense is one that will be seconded by the people of the Nation. The above-mentioned articles are as follows:

[From the Washington (D. C.) Star of December 14, 1950]

A CALL TO ARMS

An urgent alarm, coupled with a call to arms, has been sounded by the newly formed committee on the present danger.

This committee, composed of 25 civilians who have played leading roles in public and private life, minces no words in describing the menace to this country. It says that our very survival is threatened, that the aggressive designs of the Soviet Union are unmistakably plain, that our allies are weak and that we are far from sufficiently mobilized to meet the danger.

It insists that our only chance of averting a war of world dimensions, or of assuring victory if that kind of war should come despite our efforts, lies in taking these steps:

1. Raising a total United States armed force of "at least" 3,500,000 men.

2. Two years of military service, including military training, for all young men upon reaching the age of 18 or upon graduating from high school. This would be a supplement to the Selective Service Act.

3. Expansion of the program for equipment and supplies far beyond the goals already announced.

4. Submission to economic controls more exacting than those now in effect.

5. Sharp reduction in Government spending for nondefense purposes.

In short, the committee calls for the conversion of the United States into a kind of armed camp—an armed camp in which we could expect to live for an undetermined number of years to come. The committee does not mean by this that we can withdraw from the world and hide behind our own borders. Quite the contrary. But it does mean that the "good old days" are over in this country if we wish to stay alive.

Some of the specific proposals of this group are open to question. The call for an armed force of at least 3,500,000 men may be too low. And it certainly is not clear how we could proceed with a universal military service program at a time when we are hard pressed for the means to build, through Selective Service, the 3,000,000-man armed force for which the President called in September.

The committee has promised detailed recommendations in this respect, however, and they should be awaited. Its main purpose at this time has been to bring to the American people an adequate picture of their danger and to impress the people with the urgency of taking suitable steps to meet it. On this score the committee has done a good job. The Star is by no means certain, however, that it might not have done better.

The members of this committee say that they do not "accept the idea that war with the Soviet Union is inevitable—unless the Soviet so wills it." There is here, at least, a note of reservation. The statement is by no means as unqualified as that of Averell Harriman, who, in addressing the American Farm Bureau Federation on Tuesday, declared: "In spite of everything that has happened, we must not accept the inevitability of another world war."

The Star would like to know why, in spite of all the evidence to the contrary, so many people refuse to accept the inevitability of war. It is true, of course, that another world war is not literally inevitable. Presumably nothing is. But in the face of the mounting evidence, why do we keep harping on that theme?

Only about 6 months ago the President was saying that we were closer to peace than at any time in 5 years. When are we going to wake up and look the facts in the face? When are we going to tell the people that the odds favor war, and not peace? Surely this unwarranted emphasis on peace has had a lot to do with our snail-like pace toward preparation for war. And the more we encourage a hope for peace that is not justified by the facts the harder it is going to be to persuade the people to make the sacrifices that they are told must be made if we wish to survive.

The Star agrees with Senator JOHNSON, chairman of the Senate Military Preparedness Subcommittee, that there has been altogether too much "adolescent nonsense and double-talk" about this matter. He says that we are already at war with the Communist world—that "we are not getting ready for war—we are in it."

This is an attitude that makes sense. And we would get along faster with the grim business in hand if we would stop talking about arming to preserve peace and begin to think in terms of arming to fight the war that has already begun for us on one front, and which we should expect to have to fight to a finish on a world-wide scale before we are through.

[From the Washington (D. C.) Star of December 14, 1950]

"WAIT-AND-SEE" POLICY DUE FOR CHANGE SHORTLY—KOREA SETBACK AND LIVING COSTS FORCE ADMINISTRATION HAND

(By Gould Lincoln)

Maybe we are going to change. Maybe we are going to do something about all-out mobilization, both military and economic. If so, two happenings are responsible—rather than any far-seeing ability among the powers in Washington. The first is the overwhelming attack by forces of Red China in North Korea. The second is the rapid rise in prices and the cost of living in the United States. Before the congressional elections, military mobilization was soft-pedaled—and the administration dodged the imposition of economic controls, although Congress had given the President authority.

For months there have been appeals to the National Government for greater effort to put this country in a state of preparedness to meet military attack and to prevent disastrous inflation. Senator LYNDON JOHNSON, of Texas, Democratic member of the Armed Services Committee, has prodded constantly, and so has Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR., of Massachusetts, Republican member of the Foreign Relations Committee. Now, it appears, their hopes for all-out mobilization are to be gratified.

SIX COSTLY MONTHS

Speaking in the Senate on Tuesday, Senator JOHNSON said that the wait-and-see policy of the administration had delayed adequate preparation for six costly months, although this country and the free world have been at war all that time against the Communist aggressors.

"Faced with the task of girding this Nation for a struggle that may outlive us all," said Senator JOHNSON, "we have committed ourselves only to a policy of not committing ourselves. For the common defense, we have thrown up a chicken-wire fence, not a wall of armed might."

Senator JOHNSON'S complaint was that there has been no one to tell the American people where we are going. His considered judgment, he said, was that no problem of preparedness should be of more immediate concern than the present state of public confidence. "The American people have not lost faith in themselves or in their country," he continued, "but the American people are fed up with double talk in Washington." He told his colleagues the American people are anxious to unite, but, he said, "they cannot rally around a vacuum. They cannot give their unified support to policies that do not exist."

The Texas Senator commented on a strange situation for Americans to find themselves in. He said:

"We are in a war, but all our effort is seemingly directed toward staying out of the war we are already in. This is adolescent nonsense."

PEOPLE'S CONFIDENCE HIT

The administration's policies seem almost to have been designed to break down the confidence of the American people. The people have been told for a long time that nothing could be done about Communist China—even though it imprisoned an American consul general and held him for 6 months. They have been told that we cannot fight Communist China after she attacked the United Nations forces in Korea—although there were plenty of ways and means to that end—without an Army invasion of China. That's a new thought for Americans. They have been given the impression that the United States cannot fight a war with Communist Russia, with a chance of success. All this is calculated to give the American people an inferiority complex—which Americans have never suffered before.

The time has come—in fact it came a long time ago—when this country must have a global policy, in which we—not Communist Russia—must decide where we shall fight and where we can fight, as the Texan insisted. And turning to the need for prompt mobilization of the country's economy—as well as of its manpower—Senator JOHNSON called attention to the fact that on November 28 the wholesale price index reached an all-time high—171.7. That represents an increase of 12.3 percent since April. To illustrate the short-sightedness of the administration's "wait-and-see" policy in the economic field, Mr. JOHNSON said that the tax dollars that would have bought 100 miles of field wire before the Korean War would buy only 85 miles in September—and only 78 miles in November. He added that the tax money which would have bought 10,000 barrels of fuel oil before Korea would buy only 6,500 in September—and only 4,700 barrels in November.

He spoke of "tax money" and its purchasing power merely because these are materials which are needed in the defense program. And must be bought by the Government. Private citizens, however, can get no more with their dollars. The time is overripe to do something about this.

ECA Procurement Authorization for Materials in Short Supply in the United States Total $16,825,000 in 11-Day Period—Scarce Aluminum, Copper, Rubber, and Steel Included

---

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 8, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, when we know from reports that ECA material is being transshipped to Russia and Red China, it might be well for the people to ponder over the logic of the shipment of much-needed material for our own industries' use to ECA to distribute in other countries. If these shipments make any sense at this critical time, I cannot see it.

The information assembled by Paul O. Peters, of Washington, D. C., is an exposé of administration short-sightedness and of an indifferent Congress of which the public should be made aware.

Under leave to extend, I am including as part of my remarks the statement prepared by Mr. Peters to which I have referred:

ECA PROCUREMENT AUTHORIZATION FOR MATERIALS IN SHORT SUPPLY IN THE UNITED STATES TOTAL $16,825,000 IN 11-DAY PERIOD—SCARCE ALUMINUM, COPPER, RUBBER, AND STEEL INCLUDED

At the very time when American industrialists and businessmen are scouring the markets for supplies of critically needed aluminum, copper, steel, and synthetic-rubber products, in the 11-day period between November 23 and December 8, 1950, procurement authorizations for Marshall-plan goods issued by ECA totaled $16,825,000. In a previous bulletin it was recited how a total of approximately $895,000,000 had been authorized for such products from the commencement of ECA through October 31, 1950. (See Bull. No. 235.)

The latest reported procurement authorization, the countries which will receive the commodities, the original sources, and the amounts involved are shown by the table following:

Authorization date	Destination	Commodity	Origin	Amount
Nov. 24, 1950	Austria	Copper and copper products	United States	$200,000
Do	do	Ferro-alloys	Japan	150,000

OF

HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I would like to say when I came into these Halls some 18 years ago, in a hurry and in order to be sworn in, I was led up to the dais by one by the name of Bert Snell, God bless him.

Previously, he had arranged with your predecessor, Speaker Rainey, that I should be presented at a given hour as a Representative-elect from Vermont without any certificate of election official. As Bert Snell presented me and I was about to be sworn in, one unknown by the name of JOHN RANKIN, came rushing down the middle aisle saying, "Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object," and then he asked some questions about did anybody know whether or not I had been elected, and so forth. Whereupon, the Speaker said:

Well, I have in front of me a telegram from the Governor of the State of Vermont stating that Mr. PLUMLEY had been elected, and I have another from the secretary of state of Vermont saying that Mr. PLUMLEY has been elected, and I have a congratulatory telegram from his Democratic competitor in the election, and I also have a telegram from the Governor and the secretary of state saying that the official credentials will be immediately forwarded.

Whereupon, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] said he withdrew his objections.

And so, Mr. Speaker, I took the oath of office.

Naturally I thought Vermont should at once have a voice in the proceedings for I came down here because I belonged to the so-called brain trusters, having just resigned as president of Norwich University. But to my very great embarrassment, I found that I had to first convince Bert Snell I had something to say and then he had to convince the Speaker that what I had to say was worth listening to and then eventually someday the Speaker would tell Bert Snell that he would recognize me for 3 minutes and that I could extend my remarks.

Great God of all liberty and lives, what a change in procedure. Despite all the rules and regulations and the recommendations of the committee to change procedure, but whether for better or for worse, it is not for me to say for time alone will determine it and the wisdom of the change in parliamentary procedure and the temptation to recognize those new-born in Congress who never have taken a political bath.

However, Mr. Speaker, in passing I would like to pay tribute and my respects to one with whom many times I have diametrically disagreed and differed.

I doubt if either of us has lost any stature in the mind of the other by reason of our differences for we both come from New England and while we fight over an issue, our friendship never is in the crucible and when the issue is determined, it is over.

The man to whom I refer and to whom I pay my respects and affectionate tribute is one JOE MARTIN. It has been said that "Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown." But Joe has worked up to that point where he would reject wearing a crown although his head has "lied" uneasy.

"Suavitor in modo and fortiter in re"—"Only to those who have mixed with him in a death battle mentally know how tough he is in fiber," how great he is in the mental measurement of any situation, political or national, and how broad is his capacity to almost instantly diagnose any situation which confronts him or the country. Of course, his New England shrewdness helps.

JOE MARTIN'S lot over these last years has not been an easy one. He has borne a terrific burden. Did anybody ever hear him say so? Did anybody hear him complain with respect to the load on his shoulders which has grown heavier and is more heavy now than ever? No sir, Mr. Speaker.

Resolutions of the Department of Montana, American Legion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. WESLEY A. D'EWART

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. D'EWART. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include two resolutions adopted at the midwinter meeting of the Department of Montana, the American Legion. The resolutions indicate the members of the Montana American Legion are aware of the danger facing our country, and prepared to do something about it. The resolutions follow:

RESOLUTION

Be it resolved by the midwinter conference in executive committee meeting of the American Legion, Department of Montana, December 10–11, 1950, That we condemn the failure of the State Department of the United States to deal adequately with the shameful advance of communism throughout the world, believing this failure is due fundamentally to the lack of knowledge, as well as the outright refusal of the Secretary of State, Dean Acheson, to deal adequately with the problem, and therefore request that the President of the United States take notice of our lack of confidence and immediately remove the head of the State Department, Mr. Acheson, and others in the Department responsible for the present situation.

It is further the mandate of this meeting that copies of this resolution be sent to the two Senators and two Congressmen representing Montana, and to the President of the United States.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

RESOLUTION

Whereas there faces the American people today a clear and unmistakable danger of defeat due to unpreparedness; and

Whereas there appears to be a reluctance upon the part of our leaders to recognize this danger and to take all necessary steps to correct the situation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the executive committee of the American Legion, Department of Montana, assembled at its midwinter conference at Helena, Mont., December 10 and 11, 1950, That the department commander immediately request the President of the United States take the necessary action to place the whole economy on a full-mobilization status, including not only elements of the Armed Forces and their Reserve components, but also a full mobilization of industry, manpower, and natural resources to the end that our Nation shall be able to back up our ideals with sufficient force to preserve them; and be it further

Resolved, That our congressional delegation actively support the necessary legislation to attain such full mobilization and preparedness, including enactment of universal military training legislation.

Joseph P. Kennedy Says: Get Out of Korea, Leave Europe To Europeans, Arm the Western Hemisphere

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE J. BROWN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following condensed version of a speech by Hon. Joseph P. Kennedy, delivered recently before the University of Virginia Law School Forum:

JOSEPH P. KENNEDY SAYS: GET OUT OF KOREA, LEAVE EUROPE TO EUROPEANS, ARM THE WESTERN HEMISPHERE

(What should our foreign policy be? In a speech on Tuesday before the University of Virginia Law School Forum, Joseph P. Kennedy, former United States Ambassador to Great Britain, gave his views. Here is a condensed version of his speech.)

Lincoln in his famous Springfield speech said: "If we could first know where we are, and whither we are tending, we could better judge what to do, and how to do it."

Where are we now? Beginning with intervention in the Italian elections and financial and political aid to Greece and Turkey, we have expanded our political and financial programs on an almost unbelievably wide scale. Billions have been spent in the Marshall plan, further billions in the occupation of Berlin, Western Germany, and Japan. Military aid has been poured into Greece, Turkey, Iran, the nations of the North Atlantic Pact, French Indochina, and now in Korea we are fighting the fourth greatest war in our history.

WHAT KIND OF FRIENDS

What have we in return for this effort? Friends? We have far fewer friends than we had in 1945. In Europe they are still asking for our dollars but what kind of friendship have we bought there? Is Western Europe determined to preserve for itself those ideals of democracy that we have been preaching? Put to the test now as to whether she will arm herself effectively, even with our aid, to deal with the Russian threat, is she showing the kind of determination and the kind of will that amounts to anything?

Plans for economic unification have fallen apart in the light of nationalistic difference. French military power is only a shadow of its former self, and a strong minority of Communist sympathizers keeps France in endless political turmoil. The military strength of Britain is one-fourth of what it was in 1946 and she shows every inclination to avoid the heavy burdens that would be involved in rebuilding it. West Germany, to date, has revealed no disposition to develop effective military strength. Italy is hopelessly ineffective and Greece can hardly police her own small territory. Where is there in all Europe any buffer against a massed Russian onslaught? Worse than this, where is any determination to create such a buffer?

In the Middle East we have oil but no friends. Iran, Pakistan, even Egypt, seek neither our protection nor our influence. In Asia, China, whose friendship with us seemed deep-seated and enduring, is now massed against us with men, powerful armies and new vengeful hatreds. Indonesia, Malay, Indochina, are in revolt or heavy with discontent at the influences we represent. India is showing signs of succumbing to influences other than ours, more indigenous and more palatable to her desires. In Korea we are spending thousands of American lives to accomplish some unknown objective. Assume we stop the Reds somewhere across the belt of that peninsula, are we to continue fighting there indefinitely?

RUSSIA'S STRENGTH

On the other side of the iron curtain are massed manpower and military strength of a type that the world has never seen. Divisions which total in the many hundreds and which we know are well equipped and have the capacity to fight, can be thrown into battle anywhere on that great land mass that stretches from the Atlantic to the Pacific. They are backed by planes of high quality and great quantity. Russia's navy includes a powerful fleet of submarines, and in all probability she too has the atomic bomb.

To engage these vast armies on the European or the Asian continent is foolhardy, but that is the direction toward which our policy has been tending.

That policy is suicidal. It has made us no foul weather friends. It has kept our armament scattered over the globe. It has picked one battlefield and threatens to pick others impossibly removed from our sources of supply. It has not contained communism. By our methods of opposition it has solidified communism, where otherwise communism might have bred within itself internal dissensions. Our policy today is politically and morally a bankrupt policy.

I can see no alternative other than having the courage to wash up this policy and start with the fundamentals I urged more than 5 years ago. It is absurd to believe that the United Nations can lead us out of this situation. The veto power alone makes it a hopeless instrumentality for world peace. The unwillingness of half the world to want world peace makes impossible effective organization to impose any such peace. In short, our chief source of reliance must be ourselves and we cannot sacrifice ourselves to save those who do not seem to wish to save themselves.

GET OUT OF KOREA

A first step in the pursuit of this policy is to get out of Korea—indeed, to get out of every point in Asia which we do not plan realistically to hold in our own defense. Such a policy means that in the Pacific we will pick our own battlegrounds if we are forced to fight and not have them determined by political and ideological considerations that have no relationship to our own defense.

The next step in pursuit of this policy is to apply the same principle to Europe. Today it is idle to talk of being able to hold the line of the Elbe or the line of the Rhine. Why should we waste valuable resources in making such an attempt? If the weakened European nations wish to hold that line and demonstrate a determination to do so, it may be that we can afford them some help. But to pour arms and men into a quixotic military adventure makes no sense whatever. What have we gained by staying in Berlin? Everyone knows we can be pushed out the moment the Russians choose to push us out. Isn't it better to get out now and use the resources, that would otherwise be sacrificed, at a point that counts?

The billions that we have squandered on these enterprises could have been far more effectively used in this hemisphere and on the seas that surround it. Had we the defenses in Iceland today that one-hundredth of the money spent in Berlin could have built, we would have purchased safety with our money rather than added danger. We need defenses in this hemisphere, in Canada, in the Caribbean and in Latin America. After all, these are our neighbors whose security is inevitably tied up with our own. We have no reason to believe that cooperation on their part will not be forthcoming and we can, and should insist upon it.

MAKE COMMUNISM COSTLY

People will say, however, that this policy will not contain communism. Will our present policy do so? Can we possibly contain Communist Russia, if she chooses to march, by a farflung battle line in the middle of Europe? The truth is that our only real hope is to keep Russia, if she chooses to march, on the other side of the Atlantic and make communism much too costly for her to try to cross the seas.

It may be that Europe for a decade or a generation will turn communistic. But in doing so, it may break of itself as a unified force. Communism still has to prove itself to its peoples as a government that will achieve for them a better way of living. The more people that it will have to govern, the more necessary it becomes for those who govern to justify themselves to those being governed. The more peoples that are under its yoke, the greater are the possibilities of revolt. Moreover, it seems certain that communism spread over Europe will not rest content with being governed by a handful of men in the Kremlin. French or Italian Communists will soon develop splinter organizations that will destroy the singleness that today characterizes Russian communism. Tito in Yugoslavia is already demonstrating this fact. Mao in China is not likely to take his orders too long from Stalin, especially when the only non-Asiatics left upon Asiatic soil to fight are the Russians.

This policy will, of course, be criticized as appeasement. No word is more mistakenly used. Is it appeasement to withdraw from unwise commitments, to arm yourself to the teeth and to make clear just exactly how and for what you will fight? If it is wise in our interest not to make commitments that endanger our security, and this is appeasement, then I am for appeasement. I can recall only too well the precious time bought by Chamberlain at Munich. I applauded that purchase then; I would applaud it today. Today, however, while we have avoided a Munich, we are coming perilously close to another Dunkerque. Personally, I should choose to escape the latter.

WE PAY THE COST

Finally people will say this policy is turning our back on the United Nations. To do this there are two answers. Firstly, we cannot bear substantially the whole burden of the United Nations. In Korea, we have nine times as many troops in the field as all the United Nations put together. We have suffered ninety times the number of casualties that all the other United Nations have suffered, excluding only the South Koreans. And note the billions that we have advanced these nations as against the help they are giving us in Korea.

Secondly, we must recognize that the United Nations is not at present a vehicle to enforce peace. If half of the world does not wish it to operate in this fashion, as is true of Russia and China, it is idle to pretend that it can operate in that fashion. The United Nations still has a purpose for voluntary organization and as a forum in which to air international issues. Looking at the United Nations in that role, the admission of Red China or any nation presents wholly different issues than are presented if we look upon the United Nations as a type of governing body, with governing powers. But half of this world will never submit to dictation by the other half. The two can only agree to live next to each other because for one to absorb the other becomes too costly.

A REALISTIC APPROACH

An attitude of realism such as this is, I submit, in accord with our historic traditions. We have never wanted a part of our peoples' scrapes. Today we have them and just why, nobody quite seems to know. What business is it of ours to support French colonial policy in Indochina or to achieve Mr. Syngman Rhee's concepts of democracy in Korea? Shall we now send the marines into the mountains of Tibet to keep the Dalai Lama on his throne? We can do well to mind our business and interfere only where somebody threatens our business and our homes.

An Atlas, whose back is bowed and whose hands are busy holding up the world, has no arms to lift to deal with his own defense. Increase his burdens and you will crush him, or attack him from behind and he cannot turn. This is our present posture. It strangles our might. The suggestions I make would unleash our strength. They would, I am sure, give considerable pause to the strategists and planners of the Kremlin. They would—and I count this most—conserve American lives for American ends, not waste them in the freezing hills of Korea or on the battle-scarred plains of Western Germany.

1951 Resolutions of Poweshiek County (Iowa) Farm Bureau

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL M. LeCOMPTE
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I ask permission to include a set of forward-looking resolutions recently adopted by the Poweshiek County (Iowa) Farm Bureau, and I especially call attention to items 2, 3, 16, and 17:

1951 RESOLUTIONS, POWESHIEK COUNTY FARM BUREAU

1. We affirm our allegiance to the United States, the Department of Agriculture, the Extension Service, and the Iowa and American Farm Bureau Federations. We will cooperate with them to the fullest extent.

2. We pledge full support of the United Nations organization and the program upon which they have launched.

3. We favor a permanent bipartisan farm program that gives equal consideration to producers and consumers. We recommend that this program be administered by locally elected farmer-committeemen up to and including the State levels and decisions concerning this program be made locally.

4. The need of more soil-conservation practices in Poweshiek County is becoming increasingly evident each day. Recognizing the extreme value of soil-conversation work, we urge that the appropriation for technical assistance from the State Soil Conservation Service be increased.

5. We favor the principles involved in the present county assessor law, but are dissatisfied with the present application. We recommend that the county board of review appoint a local three-man board in each township to assist and advise the board of review in arriving at an equitable evaluation.

6. We favor the 100-percent collection of the State income tax because it is a fair and equitable tax on all, and the revenue thus obtained to be used as a replacement for property tax as far as possible.

7. We favor increasing State aid to schools with the objective of equalizing educational opportunity and we urge an equalization of the tax burden.

8. Because of local tax inequalities, we still believe that all income-producing property held by nonprofit organizations should be taxed as other property. We suggest that the county treasurer publish a list of tax-exempt property.

9. We urge that the check-off plan for creating funds to promote the sale of dairy products be increased through the entire month of June.

10. We want a spur road system which will put every farm family on an all-weather road.

11. We favor an amendment to the present school reorganization law which would allow petition by local districts for reorganization.

12. We recognize the valuable training being given our rural youth through 4–H club work and vocational agriculture and homemaking schools. We feel that every rural boy and girl should have an opportunity for the training afforded by these programs.

13. Realizing that agriculture and labor have many common problems, we urge that Farm Bureau and labor cooperate to secure a better understanding.

14. We favor an enactment of legislation which would simplify the transfer of property and make ownership more certain.

15. We recommend that no change be made in the method by which we select representatives and senators to the State legislature.

16. We definitely are not in favor of a social-security program to cover any of the people in agriculture.

17. We believe we should strive for efficiency in existing Government agriculture agencies, and that the program of these agencies should be coordinated to eliminate overlapping.

18. We commend the Farm Service officers and manager and the general and special insurance agents for their work and the efficient operation of their groups.

19. The various cooperative associations in the county have made a successful and valuable contribution to agriculture. We pledge continued support and assistance to these organizations.

20. We recognize the value of the publicity and support which the papers of the county have given during the past year and express our appreciation to them for their fine cooperation.

21. We reaffirm all resolutions of former years not contradicting the foregoing resolutions.

How Can We Prevent Strategic Materials From Going to the Soviet Bloc?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL HINSHAW
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following transcript of a radio-television broadcast made by Hon. J. VAUGHAN GARY, of Virginia, and myself under the auspices of the American Forum of the Air, over the networks of the National Broadcasting Co., on Sunday, December 3, 1950:

HOW CAN WE PREVENT STRATEGIC MATERIALS FROM GOING TO THE SOVIET BLOC?

(By Hon. CARL HINSHAW and Hon. J. VAUGHAN GARY)

ANNOUNCER. How can we prevent strategic materials from going to the Soviet bloc?

The National Broadcasting Co. presents the American Forum of the Air, founded 22 years ago by Theodore Granik and dedicated to the full and public discussion of all sides of all issues, coming to you from the Continental Room of the Wardman Park Hotel in Washington, D. C.

Mr. Granik is on a brief vacation. He has invited Ernest K. Lindley, Washington editor, Newsweek magazine, to be his guest moderator.

Now, Mr. Lindley.

Moderator LINDLEY. The current December issue of Reader's Digest, one of America's leading magazines, has stirred its millions of readers with an exciting article entitled "When Are We Going To Stop Helping Russia Arm?" written by O. K. Armstrong and Frederic Sondern, Jr.

I would like to quote from that article.

"During 1950 the merchants and industries of Western Europe will have contributed, legally, almost a billion dollars' worth of machinery and materials to the war potential of the Soviet Union and its satellites.

"Factories in the United Kingdom, France, Belgium, Switzerland, and even Western Germany—many of which have been rebuilt or retooled with the help of ECA dollars—continue to provide ball bearings, lathes, drill presses, special steels with which the plants of Magnitogorsk and Kuibyshev turned out guns, tanks, and warplanes.

"To this flood of material going to Russia legally, there will have been added much more which is smuggled across borders. Some of it comes from the United States. * * *

"It would seem that the new Congress and the public should have a careful look at the extent of our military aid to Russia."

So the American Forum of the Air, in cooperation with Reader's Digest, presents a discussion of this vitally important subject by two distinguished Members of Congress, Congressman CARL HINSHAW, Republican, of California, and Congressman J. VAUGHAN GARY, Democrat, of Virginia.

Gentlemen, as you know, both Houses of Congress, through committees, have been investigating this question of export controls; from the facts turned up by those investigations, plus your own knowledge, would you say that our Government should tighten its controls over the export of strategic material to the Soviet Union, China, and other Soviet or Communist-dominated countries?

What do you say, Representative HINSHAW?

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Congressman HINSHAW. Mr. Lindley, I think that before we get too deeply into this subject, we ought to understand some basic facts.

In the first place, export controls can be exercised for two general purposes, the first of course being that of preventing the draining away from our own country, for example, of those materials which may be in short supply, and are needed by our own country.

The second general reason is that an implementation of foreign policy may be for the purpose either of granting certain countries preference, let's say, or for preventing certain countries or blocs of countries, from receiving those materials which they may use in the way of making war.

Now, the first general purpose, that of making sure that our own materials are not drained away, is one that we can exercise as a sovereign Nation, without any complaint from anyone. The second one is an act of cold war, and we have been engaged in that act of cold war against the Soviet bloc for approximately 2 years. It has been intensified, of late, and particularly since the time that Korea started.

Now, I think that we ought to understand what we are doing and what we are talking about. We are talking about something that is in the realm of war, and it is a very, very important thing.

I think that as time goes on—and according to the morning papers, certainly—we are finding it necessary to tighten these controls to the point that it amounts almost to an embargo. That indeed is an act of war, and I think it should be well understood by anyone.

Moderator LINDLEY. I believe this newest tightening applies particularly to Communist China, Hong Kong and the other ports of entry into China, does it not?

Congressman HINSHAW. Yes; it does, as I understand the morning papers, but that is a part of the Soviet bloc, and it is the same thing, whether it is going to them or to the entire bloc, all-inclusive.

Moderator LINDLEY. Representative GARY, would you accept Mr. HINSHAW's definition of the purposes of export control?

Congressman GARY. Yes; but I think we have got to go one step further. I think we have got to consider the classifications of the controlled materials. This question of strategic materials, as he has stated, is a tremendously important and far-reaching question. It is an exceedingly broad one.

Now, for example, you have got first the control of materials produced in the United States. That is relatively simple. We have been controlling that for some time under the Export Control Act, and under that act we absolutely control the shipment of strategic materials to all countries.

Moderator LINDLEY. Just what do you mean by strategic materials?

Congressman GARY. There is where we get into another classification.

First, for example, we will take the highest classification. It is that of arms, munitions, implements of war, and atomic energy materials. Now, that is no problem at all. There are no arms, munitions, implements of war, and atomic energy materials at the present time going into the Soviet Union from any of the other countries. They have been well controlled—and I don't think there have been any evasions, any illegal shipments to amount to anything, in that field.

Next, you have your highly strategic materials, such as machinery and precision tools.

Now, our Government has stopped the shipment of those into the Soviet Union under the Export Control Act.

Third, you have what are known as the less strategic materials. Now, they are materials which do not aid directly in the war potential, and yet they do have some strategic value. There has been a lot of laughter about the question of duck feathers. But, after all, that is no joke. Duck feathers may be used for warm clothing for aviators and to that extent they are strategic, and yet they are used for many other purposes.

Now, with respect to the less strategic materials, our policy has been not to attempt to embargo them, to stop them altogether, but to limit the quantities, in the first place, because some materials, if they are shipped in small quantities, make very little difference. On the other hand, if you ship in large quantities, they may become a war potential. So we have tried to limit the quantity in the first place, and then, in the second place, we have tried to see that when those goods are shipped to the Soviet Union from our own country or from any other country, we get in exchange materials which we need in this country.

Moderator LINDLEY. Let me ask there: Is this worth while? Are we getting anything in return, or is this just a one-sided thing, insofar as we are shipping some strategic materials, perhaps the less important ones, to the Soviet bloc, and permitting our allies to do so? Is it a one-sided thing? Are we just losing on that, or are we getting something in return?

Congressman HINSHAW. We have been getting some things in return. We have been getting a great many bales of high-priced furs from Russia for example, such as mink and sable and that sort of thing. I suppose that has great strategic value to the United States, but I can't see just how.

Moderator LINDLEY. I suppose they are equivalent to duck feathers, except that they are more expensive.

Congressman HINSHAW. I never heard of our warming our aviators with mink and sable.

Moderator LINDLEY. What about our allies, though?

Congressman GARY. There is the problem. The problem is, as I have said, that while we absolutely control the shipment of strategic materials from this country, and we can stop all strategic materials from going, but suppose we do stop these strategic materials from going from the United States, and at the same time the other nations, the other free nations, are shipping materials into the Soviet Union? Now, obviously you haven't accomplished a thing.

So what we have been trying to do is to agree with the other countries on a definite program, so that we would stop the war potential materials from going in, and that has been pretty will agreed to.

Congressman HINSHAW. May I suggest, Mr. GARY, that we have been not trying to agree with the other countries; we have been trying to get them to agree with us. After all we feel that way about it, but they do not seem to feel that way about it because, as you know, most of those countries, in Europe, certainly have trade agreements with Russia, and if they violate those trade agreements they feel that they are being subjected to unnecessary pressure. Therefore we, in spite of what we might be able to do, have not been able to get them to agree to go along with us on any common list of strategic materials, because much of those common lists are contained in their trade agreements. You have got to get them to——

Moderator LINDLEY. You would agree then that this Reader's Digest article is essentially correct in saying that large amounts of materials that are of high strategic importance, including ball bearings, lathes, drill presses, special steels, and so forth, have been going to the Soviet bloc from Western Europe?

Congressman GARY. Well, it is greatly exaggerated, because the total shipments of all goods into the Soviet Union last year, the total exports, were only eight hundred and sixty-one and a half million dollars, which is less than the billion referred to, and all of that is not strategic materials.

Moderator LINDLEY. I think this is the figure for the entire Soviet bloc.

Congressman GARY. Well, yes.

Moderator LINDLEY. For Eastern Europe?

Congressman GARY. Yes, Eastern Europe. The entire European bloc.

Moderator LINDLEY. But are you satisfied with that situation?

Congressman GARY. No, no; by no means.

Moderator LINDLEY. What shall we do, then?

Congressman GARY. By no means. But let me answer this, in return:

You were asking a few moments ago as to what materials we were getting from Russia and her satellites. Now, we have been getting such materials as iron, manganese ore, steel ingots, copper, nickel, bauxite, and other materials, machine tools, tank cars, locomotives, electric equipment, lumber, asphalt, crude oil, diamonds, gasoline, and many other items.

Congressman HINSHAW. You mean to say we have been getting that stuff from Russia?

Congressman GARY. I mean that the United States and the other countries, free countries, have been getting that material.

Congressman HINSHAW. Well, that is mostly the free countries that you are talking about. The United States hasn't received all that stuff.

Congressman GARY. The United States has very little trade. Within the first 6 months of this year, the United States has only shipped strategic materials into the Soviet Union to the extent of a million and a quarter.

Congressman HINSHAW. Yes; but let's consider that these Western European countries all have trade agreements with Russia, which we let them go ahead and make willy nilly, and they are in constant trade with Russia, whereas we have practically shut off our trade in the last few years. Now, if they are going to do the trading, and they are also receiving ECA money and materials from the United States, that is hardly fair to us, is it?

Congressman GARY. Well, the Congress took occasion to correct that situation at the last session, as you know, Mr. HINSHAW.

Congressman HINSHAW. Almost, but not quite.

Moderator LINDLEY. What to do? Can you explain that?

Congressman GARY. Yes; I have the amendment here.

Moderator LINDLEY. Please don't read the whole amendment.

Congressman GARY. No; I am not going to read the whole amendment. But it is the amendment known as the Cannon amendment, which was written into the Appropriation bill last year, in which we made a provision that if any country to whom we are giving aid deals with the Soviet Union in a manner that will injure our defense or be detrimental to our national defense, then the National Security Council, which is composed of the President, the Vice President, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Defense, which is the organization in this country set up to handle our war activities—if that council says that the trade is dangerous to the United States, then they can stop the aid to that country.

Moderator LINDLEY. Have they done so in any case?

Congressman GARY. This act was passed just before Congress adjourned—I think in October.

Moderator LINDLEY. Do you think there are any cases in which that action should be taken now?

Congressman GARY. I think that they have been negotiating to such an extent in Europe that I think they are reaching agreements which are very, very satisfactory.

Congressman HINSHAW. Let us take a look at that 1 minute, because the minute you try to put that sort of pressure on those countries they are going to have to abrogate their trade treaties with Russia, and if you force that position, then of course you are going to force war, actual war in Europe, just a little bit closer than it already is.

I understand that what we need at this point is time. We have lost a good deal of time because we have miscalculated on whether or not the Soviet Government could produce an atomic bomb in so many years. We miscalculated by 2 years, and consequently we need time at this point.

Moderator LINDLEY. Would you say also, Mr. HINSHAW, that if our European friends in Western Europe are cut off from Soviet or Communist sources, we in turn would have to supply additional aid through the Marshall plan or the defense funds to Western Europe? Are they getting things out of the Soviet zone that we would have to supply if they didn't get them there?

Congressman HINSHAW. They are getting some, Mr. Lindley, but I think they are more interested in selling materials and goods of various kinds to the Soviet Union than they are in receiving very much from them, except in a few categories.

Moderator LINDLEY. The trouble isn't worth anything to them.

Congressman HINSHAW. No; it is a matter of trade. They have to set up some kind of trade and that trade means they have to take something for what they give. But they are also trying to rebuild the European economy, and that European economy is something that requires trade between the various countries, in order to maintain itself.

Moderator LINDLEY. Mr. Hinshaw, from your viewpoint as to the American Government, have its various agencies been sufficiently zealous in watching this problem and in trying to stop this flow of strategic materials to the Soviet bloc?

Congressman HINSHAW. I think they have, within the appropriations that have been made available to them. I know from the testimony given before my own committee, that the appropriations for the Export Control Division have been cut from $5,000,000 to $2,000,000 in the last few years, and out of that $2,000,000, $800,000 of it has to go to the Customs Bureau for their part of the business, leaving $1,200,000 with which they can exercise the controls. That is far from adequate if they are going to really exercise export controls. They are going to have to be put back on a full-fledged basis, and I understand that since September, some time, perhaps in October, they have been restaffing the Export Control Division of the Department of Commerce.

In view of the circumstances that have been going on for the last 2 or 3 years, it seems to me that we should have been longer-sighted and maintained their efficiency by giving them the number of people—and intelligent people—that are required, to do this very difficult job.

Moderator LINDLEY. Would you agree with that answer, Congressman GARY?

Congressman GARY. I agree with that, but I want to say this in addition:

We were discussing just a few moments ago the shipments of these goods from other countries in Europe. Now, it has never been the policy, as I stated at the beginning, to stop all trade with Russia. We have tried to stop the highly strategic materials. That has been about 90 percent accomplished. In other words, these other countries have stopped shipping approximately 90 percent of the items that appear on our list.

The other 10 percent are items which are in disagreement. We think they are strategic and the other countries do not. We have been trying to convince them of the strategic value of those materials. And I understand that those negotiations have been, particularly within the last month or two, very satisfactory.

Moderator LINDLEY. Now, gentlemen, let us take a question from the audience.

I believe I see Congressman ROGERS of Florida. Do you have a question, sir?

Congressman ROGERS. I would like to address a question to my colleague and comember of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, and I might say he is an able member, and we so regard him, Mr. HINSHAW.

Do you know of any instances where strategic war materials in short supply have been shipped to Russia or the satellites, and if so, can it be justified under any circumstances and on any grounds?

Congressman HINSHAW. I don't know of any incident where these materials have been shipped directly under export permit from the United States; but I do know of instances where we have shipped to other countries, such as Great Britain, or some other country in Europe, and that these materials have been transshipped in that country directly to the Soviet Union.

There are other instances in which they have made trips around the world with the material, in order to avoid the various controls that have been exercised in various countries.

Congressman GARY. As a matter of fact, the in-transit shipments have been a tremendous problem, that is true. And, as a matter of fact, there has been very little effort to control in-transit shipments up until recently.

Congressman HINSHAW. That is the most difficult thing, to control them all, because once it has been put into the bottom of some ship going out of one of our harbors here, that ship may carry a foreign flag and we have no way, except through espionage, to find out what happens to it.

Congressman GARY. Exactly. But in-transit shipments are covered in this order issued today by Secretary Sawyer, of the Department of Commerce, with reference to China.

Congressman HINSHAW. That is true, but it is going to take a tremendous corps of investigators to look into the hold of every ship that comes into the country.

Congressman GARY. It will probably take more money than you advocated a few minutes ago.

Moderator LINDLEY. Let us hear what question Congressman REDDEN from North Carolina has.

Congressman REDDEN. I should like to address the question to my colleague, Congressman GARY.

It is perfectly apparent that trade could be resumed among all of the nations if we had peace in the world. My question is:

If the Korean incident can be settled by seating Communist China in the United Nations and removing our naval blockade of Formosa, do you favor that?

Moderator LINDLEY. That question is perhaps a little on a tangent to our subject, but it is such an important one that if you gentlemen would like to answer it, I think the audience would be very much interested.

Congressman GARY. I don't see that seating China in the United Nations has anything in the world to do with this trade situation.

At the present time, while we may not like to admit it, and while no war has been declared at the present time, we are actually at war with Communist China, and I would certainly not favor, under those circumstances, seating them in the Security Council of the United Nations.

Moderator LINDLEY. Do you have a brief answer, Mr. HINSHAW?

Congressman HINSHAW. My friend, the gentleman from Virginia and also the gentleman from North Carolina who has asked that question, understands full well that in aiming at export control in any degree whatsoever where that export control is aimed at a given country or bloc of countries, that in itself is cold war. And we must recognize that fact and not be misled or set to looking in some other direction because Communist China in and of itself is only a part of a Soviet bloc, and if you affect apparently one part of the Soviet bloc you affect the whole thing. I do not think it makes a bit of difference whether Red China is seated in the Security Council or not, because Soviet Russia has been seated in the Security Council for a long time, and still, for the past 2½ to 3 years they have been exercising stringent controls against the export of strategic materials to that country. Therefore, I do not see that this Formosa thing or Korean thing or China thing has anything to do with it whatsoever.

Moderator LINDLEY. I see another gentleman with a question.

Question. I have this question which I should like to direct to Congressman GARY:

Do you think it would be advisable to impose sanctions upon friendly foreign governments who might refuse to enter into agreements with the United States prohibiting exports of strategic materials to the Soviet Union, and would you advocate the withholding of ECA aid to such country that so refused?

Congressman GARY. I think I stated that the Congress has passed a law, or has placed an amendment in the appropriation bill which will do just that.

Now, it will not stop the aid for one shipment of goods by a friendly country into the Soviet Union, but if they persist in a treaty which we deal inimical to the interests of the United States, then we will withhold funds, and I think we should withhold funds.

Moderator LINDLEY. Do you want to answer that too, Mr. HINSHAW?

Congressman HINSHAW. I point out that by so doing we must consider the fact that we are going to limit the number of allies we might ultimately have. Certainly the countries that are closest to the Soviet Union and its satellites are in a very dangerous position, and I am glad I don't live in any of them.

Congressman GARY. Well now, let me say this: No one has been more friendly toward the foreign aid program than I have, but I think the time has come when we want to know whether these people are allies. And if they are going to deal in trade with the enemy in a way that is inimical to our interests I don't think they are very friendly allies, and I think the time has come when we should take steps.

Moderator LINDLEY. At least they are not very effective allies.

Congressman GARY. They are not the kind of friends I want.

Congressman HINSHAW. Let me say this, Mr. Lindley: One ought to visit these countries and be close to the people, Switzerland and Finland and some other countries like that, and see how they feel about the situation. Those people are sitting right on a keg of dynamite, and they want to know when it is going to happen and what we are going to do about it when it does happen. They are under the gun.

Moderator LINDLEY. They are in effect saying: "If you want us to stop this trade, are you going to protect us?"

Congressman HINSHAW. That is right.

Congressman GARY. But CARL, bear in mind, I don't think that is necessary at the present time, because, as I stated a few moments ago, the recent negotiations with those countries, or conferences with them, have been very satisfactory, and they are coming along and coming around to our point of view, so I think the question is largely academic.

Congressman HINSHAW. Those that do, you want to credit with having an awful lot of guts.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Moderator LINDLEY. The next question?

QUESTION. My question is directed to Representative HINSHAW:

Is not the American citizen who attempts to ship scrap iron and rubber and so forth to Russia or its satellites more to blame than the American Government?

Congressman HINSHAW. Well, that is a question of the foreign policy of the United States and the implementation of that foreign policy. There are persons in the United States who have no regard whatsoever for the interests of the United States, and protecting those interests when it comes to the exportation of goods, because they are interested in making a profit.

Those people, I think, should be condemned. There are others shipping goods from the United States because they know perfectly well if they aren't shipped from the United States they can be gotten from some place else, and they think that we are entitled to that trade.

Moderator LINDLEY. We have time for one more brief question and answer.

Question. My question is addressed to Congressman HINSHAW:

Can the United States, within the United Nations, more adequately deal on an international scale with the export of materials used in any form for war?

Congressman HINSHAW. Within the United Nations, the gentleman says.

Of course, the United Nations has been subject to the veto which has been exercised by Russia some forty-odd times.

Now it is proposed to let Communist China in and let them exercise the second of five votes in the form of a veto. I don't think that is a very good piece of business.

Moderator LINDLEY. Gentlemen, I know we have many more questions, but we just have time for brief summaries by our speakers.

First, your summary, Representative HINSHAW.

Congressman HINSHAW. Mr. Lindley and ladies and gentlemen, I think that if we are going to exercise effectively this export control over certain strategic materials, whatever definitions may be applied, that it is going to require the complete cooperation, certainly, of all of the Atlantic Pact nations. Otherwise I do not see how an effective control can be exercised. We can salve our own conscience by refusing to permit strategic materials to go from our own country. That doesn't prevent the Soviet bloc from receiving those materials from some other country. If you are going to make it a complete thing, then you are going to require complete cooperation from all of the friendly nations of our own country.

Moderator LINDLEY. Thank you, Representative HINSHAW, of California.

And now, your summary, Representative GARY.

Congressman GARY. Mr. Lindley, I think it is very evident from the discussion that we have had here that this is a very difficult problem, and I trust that some of the people listening to this program have gotten the impression that the United States has not done such a bad job in handling it. Frankly, I think the departments have done a very excellent job.

Now, some things have happened which we would rather had not happened, but thus far, taking it step by step, realizing the seriousness of the imposition of controls, we have imposed controls when they are needed. And right now, when the Korean war broke out, we imposed controls, absolute controls then, insofar as Northern Korea is concerned. In this morning's paper controls against China were announced.

So I think we have the framework for handling this situation, and I believe we can leave it to our department heads to administer it.

Moderator LINDLEY. Thank you, gentlemen.

Montana State University's New President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MIKE MANSFIELD
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, we of Montana are very happy that Dr. Carl McFarland, one of America's outstanding lawyers and one of Montana's most famous sons, has accepted the offer of the Montana Board of Education to become president of Montana State University.

As a distinguished alumnus of Montana he is well aware of the opportunities and the problems which confront him as he assumes his new duties. As one who has known him for some time and who admires his character and integrity, I can say that Montana is fortunate indeed in bringing him back home.

Mr. Speaker, my congratulations to Montana for its choice, and my thanks in behalf of Montana to Carl McFarland for his acceptance of the presidency of Montana State University.

Under leave to do so, I am inserting at this point in my remarks a news story from the Missoulian, of Missoula, Mont., on Dr. McFarland's appointment:

MCFARLAND ACCEPTS UNIVERSITY POSITION

HELENA, December 9.—Dr. Carl McFarland, Washington, D. C., attorney and former Assistant United States Attorney General, will be the next president of Montana State University at Missoula. His acceptance of the post was announced Saturday by Gov. John W. Bonner.

Bonner said McFarland telephoned acceptance of the State education board's offer.

McFarland, 46, will return to his alma mater when he succeeds Dr. James A. McCain, who resigned to become president of Kansas State College last July.

When McFarland will take over his new $10,000-a-year job will be reported by letter, Bonner said.

UNANIMOUS AGREEMENT

Bonner announced Monday the education board had agreed unanimously to offer the presidency to McFarland, and the faculty at Missoula approved.

The governor told the Associated Press Saturday: "I am exceedingly happy that Dr. McFarland accepted. He will be the first university alumnus to be made president of the university.

"It certainly speaks well for Montana when distinguished persons like Dr. McFarland are beginning to head important Montana institutions. I hope this trend continues.

"This represents a new era in Montana in that her men and women and boys and girls are beginning to stay in the State or return to it."

McFarland's appointment leaves open three greater university system positions which were vacated this year.

The chancelorship has been vacant since Dr. George A. Selke resigned to take a Federal education position.

President F. A. Thomson of the Montana School of Mines, Butte, resigned on orders from his physician to live at a lower elevation.

The State education board fired President G. H. Vande Bogart of Northern Montana College, Havre.

FACULTY PLEASED

"The faculty and staff of Montana State University are very pleased that Dr. Carl McFarland will become president of the university," Dr. R. H. Jesse, acting president, said Saturday. "The faculty expressed to the Governor and to the State board of education its desire to have him as its leader and its great confidence in his qualifications and abilities.

"Following Dr. McFarland's 4-day visit to the campus during homecoming in mid-November, this desire and confidence was reiterated and reemphasized. An eminent lawyer, an able student of history and political science, a scholarly writer, a successful teacher of law, and an enthusiastic alumnus, the new president is preeminently fitted to carry forward the great achievements and the high traditions of the State university."

GRADUATED IN 1928

Dr. McFarland attended the university from 1924 to 1930 while he was completing work for three academic degrees. He was graduated with a bachelor of arts degree in 1928; in 1929 he received a master of arts degree in political science, and in 1930 his bachelor of laws degree. In 1932 he received the degree of doctor of juridical science at Harvard University. He is a graduate of Great Falls High School.

Mrs. McFarland, the former Patricia Regan, of Missoula, also is a graduate of Montana State University. She received a bachelor of arts degree in journalism in 1932.

After finishing his work in the Montana State University School of Law in 1930, McFarland, who 7 years later was to become Assistant Attorney General of the United States, served for a year as law clerk to the justices of the Montana Supreme Court. From Helena he went to Harvard University to study for his doctorate.

Returning to Montana in the fall of 1932, he became a member of the law firm of Toomey & McFarland in Helena, now Toomey, McFarland & Wagner. In the spring of 1933 the Montana Supreme Court made him its commissioner for codification of the Montana statutes but in September of that year granted him leave to go to Washington, D. C., for a tour of duty in the Department of Justice.

There he shortly became head of one of the sections preparing cases for presentation to the Supreme Court of the United States and later first assistant in the Antitrust Division.

In 1937 the late President Roosevelt appointed Mr. McFarland Assistant Attorney General in charge of the largest division of the Department of Justice, handling all matters relating to lands, oil, and interior affairs. He resigned early in 1939 to enter the practice of law in Washington in partnership with former Attorney General Homer Cummings.

BOOKS, LECTURES, TEACHING

In 1934 Harvard University published Mr. McFarland's book on Judicial Control of Administrative Agencies, growing out of his doctoral dissertation written at Harvard in 1931-32. Recommendations made in that book relating to the Federal Trade Commission have since been adopted by Federal statute. In the same year the American Bar Association gave him its first Ross award for his writings on constitutional law.

Three years later, in joint authorship with the then Attorney General Cummings, he published Federal Justice—Chapters in the History of Justice and the Federal Executive. It was the first and remains the only full-scale history of any of the Federal departments of Government and, as such, is now a standard work of reference in university and Government circles respecting the history and organization of the United States Department of Justice.

Mr. McFarland was invited to lecture at the University of Michigan and at Cornell in 1942. In 1946, in recognition of his distinguished services, New York University dedicated to him its annual volume surveying American law for the year 1945. He lectured at New York University in 1947 and 1948, in the latter year on the occasion of the centenary of David Dudley Field, famous New York lawyer who wrote the codes of law originally adopted in Montana. For the last 2 years he has been a regular lecturer at the University of Virginia.

In 1946, at the request of the Milk Industry Foundation, he wrote a volume entitled "Milk Marketing Under Federal Control." In 1947, in collaboration with Dean Arthur T. Vanderbilt, who now is chief justice of New Jersey, he produced a volume entitled "Cases and Materials of Administrative Law," now widely used in law schools. He also is the author of numerous articles in professional and educational journals.

PROFESSIONAL WORK

Since 1940 Mr. McFarland has been chairman of various committees of the American Bar Association. In 1946 he became the representative of the legal profession on the planning committee of the Library of Congress. In recent years he has been one of the five lawyers representing the professions in the National Conference of Lawyers and Certified Public Accountants. He also has been a member of the house of delegates, which is the governing body of the American Bar Association.

He was the principal draftsman of the Administrative Procedure Act, which became law in 1946 without a dissenting vote in either House or Congress.

In 1946 the association awarded him its thirteenth gold medallion "for conspicuous service in the cause of American jurisprudence" and he is today the only practicing lawyer to hold that honor. The other dozen recipients were teachers, editors, and jurists, including such men as Elihu Root, Oliver Wendell Holmes, and Charles Evans Hughes.

Since 1946 Mr. McFarland has headed the law firm of McFarland & Sellers in Washington. The five partners include two Montanans. The other is Grant W. Kelicher, of Butte. The firm is general counsel for organizations of such industries as livestock, milk, cotton, and automotive supplies. In litigation it also represents such organizations and corporations as the Brotherhood of Railway Engineers, the Brotherhood of Railway Firemen, the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, the National Association of Manufacturers, and the Union Carbide & Carbon Corp.

During the present year Mr. McFarland concluded litigation on behalf of the Indians of Colorado in which he secured the entry of the largest money judgments ever awarded in the Court of Claims against the United States, aggregating in excess of $30,000,000.

HONORARY DEGREE

On the recommendation of the faculty of Montana State University, the State board of education authorized the faculty to confer upon Dr. McFarland the honorary degree of doctor of laws, which was done at the spring commencement in Missoula in 1949. At that time Mr. McFarland gave the commencement address, for which he took as his topic the University Abroad, describing what Montana State University graduates of the depression years were doing in various parts of the United States.

Strikes, Costs, and National Security

REMARKS
OF
HON. ED GOSSETT
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, most of us are amazed and indignant because of the railroad strikes now going on. Apparently, certain segments of organized labor will defy this Government regardless of the consequences to this country. In time of national emergency, no group within our country should be allowed to imperil the Nation's welfare. Strikes in time of national emergency should be made unlawful.

Adding insult to injury, segments of railroad labor are, at this very time, undertaking to high pressure a railroad-labor bill through this Congress, a bill giving them additional powers to those already possessed. Railroad labor representatives are walking congressional corridors endeavoring to high pressure Members of Congress into passing their bill while some members of their organization threaten the Nation's economy and security.

Let me remind this Congress that strikes, slow-downs, the 40-hour week, the hoarding of labor by industry, abuses of cost-plus contracting by industry, and similar un-American activities, added a hundred billion dollars onto the cost of World War II. That means a hundred billion dollars onto the terrific debt we are now compelled to carry. Nothing could be more preposterous and unreasonable than to require American boys to die for this country, and yet to permit these same abuses to go on.

Mr. Speaker, have we become so morally and spiritually bankrupt as to place profits and politics above patriotism? Are votes and the questionable support of pressure groups to be considered as of primary importance in this time of crisis?

Mr. Speaker, I understand that a majority of the Republican members of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee are determined to bring to the floor of this Congress the above-mentioned railroad union shop bill. For their benefit, and for the RECORD, I wish to insert just here a copy of an editorial appearing in this morning's Washington Post:

WILDCAT SWITCHMEN

Whatever merit there may be in the wage demands of the railroad switchmen, they are taking a poor way to enforce them in their wildcat strike in Washington and two other metropolitan terminals. The strikes already are impeding war shipments. The impounding of mail and inconveniencing of passengers just before Christmas—and at a time when a national emergency impends—is hardly calculated to warm public sympathy.

Actually, it may well be that the imminence of the national emergency proclamation is what precipitated the strikes—strikes which have all the earmarks of being organized in John L. Lewis fashion, despite statements of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainment to the contrary. The rail union is fearful that wage controls will be clamped on before its now ancient wage dispute is settled. It is worth noting, of course, that an emergency board appointed by the President some time ago recommended an increase which the trainmen and other unions declined to accept.

As a matter of fact, the strikes demonstrate one of the drawbacks to Government operation of the railroads. The Government seized the lines in August after a similar strike, and the Army is exercising nominal control through railroad managements. The unions complain that under this system managements continue to receive normal returns from railroad operation, whereas union members are forced to remain on their old wages, and there is no compulsion on managements to settle. Hence the union feeling of "What have we to lose by striking?"

The answer, of course, is that they are losing any public sympathy that is left. The rail unions themselves are clearly out of order in refusing to abide by the emergency board recommendations after managements had agreed to them. There is a theoretical case for impounding profits as well as fixing wages when Government seizure is in effect; it might make managements more anxious to settle before seizure, though it would be another step toward Government control of the railroads that ultimately would be as repugnant to the unions as to management. But the unions can hardly expect to obtain such a change in the law, or even create a climate for voluntary pay concessions, when they are brazenly flouting the machinery of the Railway Labor Act.

The fundamental fact is that the present strikes, wildcat or not, are strikes against the Government. The Government already has obtained a court order here and in Chicago for the men to go back to work. It remains to ask for an injunction in St. Louis also, and for contempt proceedings to be instituted if the strikes are not promptly called off. This is a time when there is no conceivable justification for an arbitrary stoppage of the Nation's transportation system.

Bill of Rights Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, this is a historic day in the annals of our Nation. Exactly 159 years ago—on December 15, 1791—the first 10 amendments to the Constitution of the United States were ratified. These 10 amendments are known as the Bill of Rights, and December 15 of each year is, consequently, known as Bill of Rights Day. This year, perhaps more so than in any other recent year, we should take note of this anniversary by rereading and studying these amendments in order to fully grasp their meaning in our day and how best we can apply them to our daily life.

Unfortunately, we have reached a stage where the freedom of expressing unpopular views, the freedom to disagree and to criticize constructively—freedoms which have made America strong and American democracy the hope of all honest, decent, and liberty-loving people throughout the world—are today threatened by international tension and are under direct attack by the evil forces of communism from without and by disruptive elements in our own midst who are unwittingly playing into the hands of the Communists.

The evolution of our civil liberties over these many decades since the adoption of the Bill of Rights 159 years ago and the practical application of these rights to our daily life throughout this long period have always been a source of pride to the people of this Nation. At the same time, we are the envy of most other nations not so much for the things we have preached as for the way in which we practiced these teachings.

I am afraid that lately we depend too much on preaching and talking about our democratic concepts, while forgetting to live up to them. In the times of tension and hysteria in which we live we think too often of the momentary benefit and overlook the future of our country and our people. We must not lose faith nor courage nor confidence in our future. We must aspire to come out of the present crisis morally and spiritually strengthened. That can be accomplished by adhering to our principles of true democracy. Among these principles the Bill of Rights should be foremost in our hearts and minds.

Spend It To Defend America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. T. MILLET HAND
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. HAND. Mr. Speaker, a proper discharge of my responsibilities to my country requires me to support this enormous appropriation.

I confess I do so with reluctance.

I hesitate, not because of the vast amount of money involved. I am satisfied that our people will make all sacrifices needed for the real defense of our country. No, Mr. Speaker, my objection springs from my fear that we will continue to provide men, armaments, and billions to pursue foreign policies in Asia and elsewhere in the world which I believe have led us into our fearful dilemma, and will lead us into tragedy if we persist.

This morning, the Republican conference urged the resignation of Mr. Acheson, the Secretary of State, because the country has lost all confidence in him, his department, and his policies. But his removal, when it comes, is no cure-all. Acheson will be replaced by another, be he Democrat or Republican, who inevitably will carry out the orders of the President.

What is needed to avoid catastrophe is a complete reconsideration of our whole foreign policy, particularly in Asia. I have always opposed it. I oppose it more bitterly than ever. I shall devote myself to the task, however difficult, of helping to change it.

Led Into War!

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. RICH
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 14, 1950

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Altoona Tribune of December 1, 1950:

LED INTO WAR!

Clearly indicative of the major interest of the people of Altoona, phone calls the last 2 or 3 nights have been pouring into the Tribune news room, all asking about the war situation.

To newspaper people, nothing shows so clearly the trend of public interest as the calls which come into us.

Sunday and Monday night, the calls were about the blackout. "When shall we have power?" "What's the weather forecast?"

But, now, the calls run like this, and these are typical, actual inquiries received in the newsroom: "Has war been declared?" "Is it true that Russia has declared war on us?" "When are they going to drop the bomb? I heard on the radio they were talking about dropping it within the next day or two." "Is it true MacArthur has surrendered to the Chinese?"

Thus, we have a picture of the growing tension of our people as 100,000 American boys fight it out against odds in Korea and while our blundering statesmen in Washington scratch their heads and wonder what next to do.

Beyond any question at all, the American people will unite solidly behind their lawful leaders when the time of emergency comes. But, as it approaches, we maintain our right to call for new leadership, new and able men to lead us in the critical and terrible period perhaps which lies ahead.

America is losing confidence in its leaders. Nothing could be plainer. The people, in their own way, are repudiating them. When election time comes again, we can elect a new President, and we hope a more able one.

But, in the interim, Mr. Acheson, the Secretary of State and all his advisers, and all Mr. Truman's advisers on foreign affairs, should be fired.

It is a terrible thing for a people to be led from one war directly into another through inept leadership and then be forced to put up with such incapable men during the greatest trials a nation can endure—the trial by war.

A veteran Washington correspondent sends us a confidential letter every now and then. In it, he says, "There has not been since the early twenties such ineptitude, such lack of foresight and imagination, and such downright boneheadedness as exists in Washington at times.

"For even though two members of the Harding Cabinet were scandalous performers, men like Hughes, Hoover, and Mellon offset them. The fact is that we have not had such a brilliant set of Presidential advisers in the intervening 25 years."

As for Mr. Acheson, "he gave the Russian and Chinese Reds the green light in the Far East when he told us at the Press Club in a carefully written speech that the fate of Korea was of no consequence to us. He framed the policy which led to withdrawal of support from Chiang Kai-shek and, up to now, the failure to reinforce him in Formosa. He invited the Reds to attack on June 25."

And, on General Bradley, Chief of Staff, the correspondent writes: "Bradley failed to tell Truman that we did not have the stuff to hold and to retain Korea if the Chinese Reds engaged in all-out resistance. He approved the Korean intervention, even though it left us defenseless at home. To make it worse, he told the world in a public speech that, save for the atom bomb, we were militarily helpless. What an invitation to Russia to attack Europe, Indochina, or the Middle East, while we are tied up in Asia."

On Secretary of the Treasury Snyder: "He fights the Federal Reserve on lowering of interest rates, thus firing inflation, only to change his mind in 2 months."

Secretary of Agriculture Brannan proposed a politico-economic plan that caught Truman's fancy because it seemed to mean both farm and city votes, but almost every Democratic candidate had to disown it for its economic unsoundness.

And now, we are engaged in battling China, pitfall of nations, death trap for millions. In the last week, American casualties have totaled more than another thousand men.

The plain facts are that we have not had men brilliant enough to outsmart the Russians in this bitter postwar dueling.

Our leaders have not been a match for the shrewd and evil men of the Kremlin.

If they have been no match in peace, why should we think they would be a match in war?

As war approaches America must have new and better leadership.

Surplus Populations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS E. WALTER
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Rt. Rev. Msgr. Edward E. Swanstrom, executive director, War Relief Services, NCWC, New York City, at the United States Displaced Persons Commission regional resettlement conference dinner meeting, November 20, 1950, 6:30, Hotel Pfister, Milwaukee, Wis.:

It is a fact of history that civilizations are menaced by that group of people which does not share in the spiritual or material benefits of the civilization in which they live. Time and time again, the dispossessed classes have been used eventually as part of the destroying process which toppled regimes, empires, and whole civilizations. Often the government or civilization which replaces that which was destroyed turns out to be little or no improvement. Often the result of revolution is a shorter or longer period of despotism.

The essential fact is, however, that any larger mass of dispossessed peoples is a constant threat to the equilibrium of a country or a continent.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Following upon the cataclysm of World War II, large groups of innocent men, women, and children in Europe were deprived of home and homeland, and of any hope for a normal future. It is not our purpose here to go into the reasons for the fact that so many people were left dispossessed and without rights after a war fought for such high aims. It is our purpose rather to start from the facts as they are, and work out some plan of rectification that will preserve such social, political, and economic equilibrium as is left to us.

There is one new feature in the newly dispossessed that no other dispossessed classes (commonly known as the proletariat) possessed. The new dispossessed include large numbers of skilled workers, small farmers, and proprietors of the middle classes who suddenly found themselves stripped not only of possessions but of their role in society. In addition, professional people—doctors, teachers, scientists, agronomists—are counted in the number of the newly dispossessed.

This meeting has been called together primarily to discuss the present problems and the future plans for one group among the newly dispossessed, the displaced persons. It is due to the cooperative efforts of far-seeing people, such as are gathered here for this meeting of the Displaced Persons Commission, that a work of rescue without parallel has already been accomplished for DP's. Since the passage of the first Displaced Persons Act, which went into effect on July 1, 1948, more than 190,000 displaced persons have been resettled all over the United States.

I know, and you know, that in the first months of resettlement many unexpected problems have arisen in connection with individual DP's. We know that the injustice of their plight rankles in many of them, and we know that a camp existence of several years' duration has a demoralizing effect. We must always remember that the bread of exile is very bitter bread and that the first 6 months of a DP's resettlement present emotional hazards into which we settled people can have little real insight.

It is our experience that after the first 6 months or so, when the DP has recovered from his first few months of being drunk with the new freedoms and new opportunities of America, there is a rapid readaptation to the American scene. For every one DP who excites some unfavorable comment by leaving a placement suddenly there are 10 DP families who settle down to making a real contribution to American life.

The immediate concern of all organizations concerned with DP's is the admission to this country of about 200,000 additional persons. These include 116,000 IRO displaced persons still eligible under the DP Act, as amended, 18,000 former Polish soldiers from England, 10,000 Greeks, 4,000 refugees from Samar, 2,000 refugees from Venezia Giulia, 5,000 DP orphans, 500 recently arrived political refugees, and about 45,000 ethnic Germans known as expellees. The new DP Act also allows for the admission of 5,000 European orphans under 10 years of age as nonquota immigrants.

The finding of home and job opportunities for displaced persons who must be admitted to the United States between now and July 1, 1951, is a tremendous challenge both to voluntary and governmental groups in our country. Should the finding of sufficient home and job opportunities between now and the expiration of the act be accomplished (and I must admit here and now that I have serious doubts on the feasibility of this because of the time element involved), we still have to meet courageously and charitably the problem of the hard core of displaced persons for whom no resettlement opportunities exist anywhere in the world.

Religious voluntary agencies are working very closely with IRO in finding permanent homes for the aged, the physically handicapped, and the chronically ill. It is far harder to find satisfactory solutions for such groups as the uneconomic units (widows or widowers with children), and for the specialists who are banned from immigration seemingly because of their gifts and training. The hard core group numbers only about 100,000, and we are hopeful that a combination of intelligence and compassion can be brought to bear on this group so that none will be left without a satisfactory solution for his future life.

In order to take full advantage of the present legislation for IRO DP's assurances will be needed for about 50,000 additional persons before the expiration of the act. This assumption is based on the fact that the active assurances presently in process will make possible the entry of about 60,000 persons.

May I ask everyone here to consider what action he can take individually, or can propose to the group which he represents, to try to reach the necessary number of assurances. Whether we belong to labor groups, to employment services, to agricultural agencies, to local government, or to voluntary organizations, we should here and now resolve to take specific steps so that job assurances for 50,000 people can be ready for processing by next spring.

The people who remain in the DP camps are ordinary people like ourselves—except that they have had the misfortune to be rendered destitute and incapable of resolving their own future without our help. I know this help will be forthcoming from such people as yourselves, because your very presence here shows your deep and active concern for the welfare of displaced persons.

As I said earlier, the work of rescue accomplished with regard to the displaced persons is a triumph of free democratic action motivated by the highest of religious and humanitarian principles. There is still some real work to be done to complete this triumph. You and I would not like to see so glorious a work fail and peter out because of lack of a final big push. The time for that push in the United States is now.

The only reason that hundreds of thousands of displaced persons have not been left in Europe to form a homeless and rightless proletariat is because of the magnificent cooperative effort of the free governments and the free voluntary agencies of our free West.

There still remain, however, other groups, even larger in number than the displaced persons, whom our planful help has not reached. Though this meeting was called precisely to discuss displaced persons, I appreciate very deeply the opportunity it presents to talk to this special picked, dedicated, group of people about the larger problems of resettlement and emigration which present themselves to us at this time.

The largest group of dispossessed people in Europe at the present time are men, women, and children of German ethnic origin, who, in the early days of our present peace, were driven from their homes in such areas as the Sudetenland of Czechoslovakia, Danzig, and Silesia, as well as Hungary, Rumania, and Yugoslavia. Close to 12,000,000 of these expelled people now find themselves in a truncated Germany.

The Western Federal Republic of Bonn has to cope with 8,000,000 of this total number of expellees. Their presence places an almost impossible burden on the public relief system of the Western Federal Republic. Forty percent of all public relief goes to support the orphans, the broken families, and the aged among the expellees. Though the expellees form about 16 percent of the population of the Bonn Republic, they make up close to 50 percent of the unemployed.

One of the most acute problems is that of the expelled farmers, many of whom have been settled in urban areas where they are unable to find productive work because of their lack of training and skill. Even after the completion of the land reform in Germany there would not be enough acreage in the country to give them a start in agriculture. A total of 44,744 ethnic Germans are included in the present United States displaced-persons legislation. You will see immediately what a small fraction of the total expellees this number represents. However, even syphoning off so small a group would serve as a help in the total problem, and, more importantly still, as a sign of hope to the remainder of the expellees that their problems were at least being recognized on an international scale. I feel that the area in which we meet would be a most propitious one for the resettlement of these ethnic Germans, and I would ask you to search about among the farming communities for the requisite home and job assurances.

The expellees are already referring to themselves as "the fifth estate." The fourth estate as you know from history referred to those workers on whose backs fell the heavy burdens of taxation that eventually helped drive them to revolt. The fifth estate then would seem to signify a subproletariat whose lot is more bitter still in that they do not feel themselves to be sharing productively or otherwise in the civilization of which they formed the lowest rung.

Perhaps the most pressing problem among this subproletariat called the expellees are the half a million young people between the ages of 15 and 25 who are without jobs or job training. These young people, old enough to understand the indignity of their lot in the barracks and hovels of strange towns and villages, but too young to appreciate the cataclysm that has come to all Europe, can look forward only to nothingness. There are no places in the schools for them to learn a trade; few jobs are opening up for them in an economy that has not even jobs enough for adult breadwinners.

These young people look backward to the day-by-day destruction and systematic cruelty of the war years, and to the inhumanity and chaos of the eras of peace. It would not be surprising if out of this immense mass of youth without hope there should emerge a cold, dangerous nihilism. Since they have seen the depths, they might come to fear nothing, to reverence nothing, not even life itself.

The future of the West will have to count with these young people, either for good or for ill. Up to now the world has shown them by all methods possible that it does not want them, nor does it want their intelligence or their skills. They have been driven from their homes and driven out of participation in the business of living.

We who are deeply concerned with true peace and equilibrium in the West will have to turn our minds to economic solutions within Germany that will absorb in a productive way these forgotten young people. We must concern ourselves, too, with international plans for a syphoning off through immigration individual expellees so that those who remain behind will be able to make a livelihood.

In addition to the displaced persons and the expellees, there are the refugees who have so recently escaped from tyranny in the East that they are not included in any immigration schemes. These refugees escaped at the risk of their lives. They expected a warm reception and true refuge in the West. Thousands of these refugees are herded into the camps that have been set up all along the iron curtain from Trieste through Uelzen.

These individual refugees are becoming disaffected and are tempted to despair. They represent the most democratic, the most freedom loving, the most daring and courageous of the peoples behind the iron curtain. It is our duty to show them that they belong with us, that they are part of our free West by sharing with them the freedom of our Western World—in particular the freedom of movement which we call immigration.

I will mention in passing one other group of people whose problems are amenable to solution by immigration, namely, the surplus population of the Italian Peninsula. The Italians may be surplus to the Italian Peninsula, but they are not surplus to the world. There is plenty of room for these industrious people (who have already shown their gifts as colonizers) in the undeveloped areas of the world. There are some pessimists that tell us that there are too many people in the world. We cannot agree with this thesis. From the earliest years of history men have moved about the world in a continual search for a proper place between mass numbers and the world's resources. This adjustment has created new tools, new foods, and new technologies.

Only when man's institutions have prevented a free flow of people and goods have artificial human surpluses been created. I have mentioned to you today several examples of these human surpluses in Europe, the displaced persons, the expellees, the iron-curtain refugees, the surplus population of the Italian Peninsula. I could mention other surpluses in the Far East, but that is beyond the scope of our discussion today.

If the free flow of peoples is impeded at this time, we will allow tension to develop among the dispossessed that may have dire consequences for the stability of the entire free world. Let each one of us who have been privileged to attend this splendid meeting take away a resolution to help in the establishment of true peace by contributing in some measure to the resettlement of families who, in their present environment, cannot assume the functions of a productive life.

As leaders of government, of farm organizations, of labor organizations—not to mention public and voluntary agencies of welfare—you have already demonstrated your love and concern for the "little people" of this great country of ours. These dislocated ones we have been talking about are the "little people" of the world. Let us encompass them within America's all-embracing charity.

But we must give some real evidence of our concern. Ours must not be merely a talking interest, a mere expression of our sympathy for those who suffer because of the dislocation that is all about us.

There are many studies under way. The ECA, the ILO, the technicians of the Foreign Ministers Conference, we are told, are all studying this whole question of surplus populations. Missions have even been sent to South American countries to study the possibilities of large-scale immigration to that area. Enormous funds are being placed at the disposal of these agencies of government. Their efforts are an encouraging sign of the ever-growing interest of the leaders of our Government in this great problem whose solution is basic to the establishment of peace throughout the world.

Perhaps some kind of office or agency in our Government is now necessary in order to coordinate these various efforts so that the best results may be achieved. What form this agency should take naturally it is not mine to say, but it seems that it is something to which a great deal of thought might be given.

The thing that I would most like to urge is that all of us, whether we be of the religious and voluntary groups, of the State commissions or of the agencies of government dealing directly with these people—that we all ask ourselves how best can we direct our efforts to accomplish an objective so significant to the future peace of the world.

Mr. Prohoc Speaks His Mind

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include a thoughtful special column, Mr. Prohoc Speaks His Mind, written by Henry Gillen, of the Boston Post, and appearing in the Boston Post of December 10, 1950:

MR. PROHOC SPEAKS HIS MIND

Mr. Truman dropped a bomb. Ten days ago, when in a press conference, President Truman, in answer to a question, said that the United States was "considering" the A-bomb, he rocked the world. All over the globe there was immediate alarm. Abroad and at home, he was censured publicly and privately for having made a colossal blunder, for making an outright demonstration of ineptness that was appalling.

The ferment which Mr. Truman stirred up all stemmed from misunderstanding. It was not a misunderstanding of what the President said about America's intentions as to the use of the bomb. It was a misunderstanding of the bomb itself. Instead of being regarded as a military weapon which the United States had manufactured to defend her in wartime, it suddenly took on another aspect.

It became in the eyes of the world the skeleton in the closet, the two-headed calf in the barn that children should not see, or the family ghost that on Allhallows Eve stalked through the castle, headless and mourning for a Lochinvar who had been dispatched by the Ninth Earl of Whoople several centuries before. Everybody knew that the United States had an A-bomb—in fact, stockpiles of them. But some thought that they should not be mentioned.

That ostrich-in-the-sand attitude was just what the Kremlin has demanded. The lying "Stockholm resolutions" for peace which Russia had concocted and sent around the world to be signed by dupes are based on the premise that the A-bomb should be outlawed. If Red Russia could only render the A-bomb ineffectual, she would have no more hesitation about going to war with America. With her prodigious manpower and snorkel-breathing subs, she feels that she could match us before our massive air fleets laid waste her cities with the blockbusters that made mincemeat of Berlin.

Mr. Truman snuffed out that one. He sent the word to the Politburo that America had no intention of putting our most formidable weapon in the Smithsonian Institution. We made the bomb to defend ourselves and if worse came to worst, we would not hesitate to use it. We didn't want to use it. We are not a destroying people. But we believe that we have a right to survive in a world gone mad, and we intend just that.

Instead of pulling a blooper, Mr. Truman made a 10 strike. He reminded the world that while Uncle Sam might at times resemble that jolly old fellow Santa Claus, he also could climb into khaki overnight and give a good account of himself in a battle to live.

The repercussions to his declaration were swift and awesome. The French and the English immediately went into a huddle. England sent its Prime Minister to Washington posthaste. Some 11 nations with Asiatic ties appealed to China to stop its notorious aggression in Korea and solve the moot question diplomatically. But something more important happened.

Europe suddenly decided that it would have to defend herself. After months of dawdling with the idea of an integrated military defense that advanced only on paper, the shocking thought arose that freedom's fireman, Uncle Sam, might be too tied up in Asia to defend with vast overseas armies those bastions which Europe herself should fight for because they are in Europe.

It stirred the inhabitants of the British Isle, France, the Benelux, and the Scandinavian countries into the belated frame of mind that it was time to marshal armies in case Russia overnight started marching.

There were other ripples from the stone dropped in the millpond by the President. Mr. Attlee publicly disavowed that England had any intention of appeasing China, Russia, or any Reds who seek concessions by holding a gun to the head of the peace-loving world. He further emphasized his point with a ringing declarative that England's flag would fly through the gathering night by the Star-Spangled Banner.

But the greatest result was that France dropped her opposition to German soldiers participating in the defense of their homeland and Europe. Thereby she lifted the gates on one of the greatest supplies of fighting manpower in Europe and cleared the way for international armies which would stand in the path of any Russian attempt to blitzkrieg Europe as Hitler did.

The immediate reaction of the moment's foe, China, to the A-bomb pronouncement was General Wu's retort that threats would not move Red China. One wonders. Centuries ago, the Chinese armies went into battle beating gongs and setting off firecrackers. The purpose of such melodramatics is attested by the Chinese in their own histories. They hoped by employing noise to frighten away their battlefield enemy. In some instances, especially against other Chinese, it worked.

It would take a psychologist of standing to say ipso facto that a nation which employed such outlandish tactics has a quirk in the make-up of its human beings. If the Chinese believed noise would frighten off an enemy might the same weapon not be turned against them? Psychologically, they might be ripe for it.

It can be argued against such a theory that the noise weapon was used in less-enlightened days and it has no place in modern warfare. Yet the Chinese armies still employ it. Stories from the fronts in Korea where the Chinese have been bearing down describe how their armies go into action by blowing bugles and clashing cymbals, and the men in arms set up weird and terrible cries. That appears to be an Asiatic trait. United States marines on embattled Pacific islands during World War II recall now how the Japs charged with outlandish and terrible screams. At first it was thought that they were stirring themselves up to charge into certain death. Since then marines have come to believe the Japs thought they would frighten away America's sea-soldiers.

A few A-bombs brought Japan, most warlike nation in Asiatic history, to her knees pronto in 1945. Perhaps the Chinese cannot take it either. We do not recommend it. We agree with President Truman that the A-bomb is a great and terrible weapon. But when the moment comes that the survival of America is dependent on its use, there is only one answer. America is considering it and our foes, deploring it, at the same time respect the fact that with it we are not a push-over. If it were not for that fact things might be worse.

Let's Stop Kidding Ourselves

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE A. SMATHERS
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I insert in the Appendix of the RECORD a thought-provoking editorial from the St. Petersburg (Fla.) Independent, of December 6, and commend it to the attention of my fellow legislators:

LET'S STOP KIDDING OURSELVES

The time has come for the American people and the administration in Washington to stop kidding themselves. We can no longer afford to promulgate and augment the delightful theory that we can win friends and influence people in the international society of nations by endlessly doling out our substance in an attempt to buy friendship.

Call it isolationism if you will. Call it what you may. It all adds up to the same thing. We're facing a fight for our very survival and in spite of the billions we've spent in an attempt to win allies, we have few friends who are going to come to our defense.

We may as well acknowledge the fact and act accordingly. If we are going to survive we'll have to be armed to the teeth. And until we are, everything else must go by the boards.

Last week President Truman asked Congress for an emergency appropriation of $18,000,000,000 to help rebuild our military department. This is only a drop in a bucket compared with the regular budget the military leaders will ask for the next fiscal year.

That's all to the good. But if we are to be properly armed and prepared for any eventuality we can't afford frivolities. This is not the time to spend billions for foreign economic aid and billions more in a vain hope of winning allies.

Perhaps in a less critical moment we could afford to play the role of international do-gooder. Perhaps we could afford billions to feed the starving Hottentots and bring the glories of President Truman's point 4 program to the underprivileged peoples of the world. Perhaps. But this is not the moment.

The time has come for us to spend more money and more effort on our national defenses and less in mending our international fences.

During the last few years the left-wing hierarchy within and without the Federal Government has expounded an ear-tingling slogan. It says you can't fight ideas with bullets. It's a fine theory. It makes good listening over cocktails or after-dinner liqueurs.

But the men who are on the receiving end of the bullets right now—the American troops falling back in Korea, who never have a chance to sip cocktails or liqueurs—know that ideological theories of government make a damned poor armor when the hot stuff is flying their way.

What peace have we gained by playing international big brother to the rest of the world?

We spent billions of dollars and much of our blood to save the Soviet Union from Germany. Where are our friends in Russia today?

We spent billions of dollars and much of our blood to save China from Japan. Where are our friends in China today?

We spent billions of dollars and much of our blood to rescue Czechoslovakia and the Balkans from the Nazi yoke. Where are our friends among them today?

We still have friends in Greece, we hope. At the moment it serves the purposes of Tito and Yugoslavia to be our friends, but no one knows for how long. Let's not kid ourselves. If worse comes to worst, we're not even sure of Great Britain and France.

Perhaps it is impossible to destroy ideas with bullets. But in a world caught between two major ideologies, and seething with unrest, nothing succeeds in winning friends and influencing people like strong military power and the ability and willingness to use it, if necessary.

Today there are many nations in the world engaged in the business of international fence-sitting. Our concepts of freedom and democracy mean little to them. No matter who wins, they want to be on the winning side. We can't buy their friendship through international uplift programs. But we can win their friendship and respect if we have the military power to assure them we're going to come out on top of the heap.

There's no use kidding ourselves about who is going to fight our battles. We are. And let's not forget it. And to fight those battles it is vital that we spend every cent we can raise to arm ourselves with the necessary guns and planes and ships.

In converting our billions from foreign economic aid to our own military strength we may divorce ourselves from some nations we now count as our friends.

If so, so be it. The chips are down. As they say in the army, it's time to separate the men from the boys.

The American Pacific Fisheries and the Peace Treaty With Japan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOR C. TOLLEFSON
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 7, 1950

Mr. TOLLEFSON. Mr. Speaker, the intense interest of the people of the Pacific Northwest in having the peace treaty with Japan contain provisions dealing with the American Pacific fisheries is made quite evident by two editorials appearing in the Alaska Weekly of December 8, 1950. I insert them in the RECORD herewith for the information of the Members of the House. The above-mentioned editorials follow:

[From the Alaska Weekly of December 8, 1950]

TIME TO ACT IS NOW

News reports last week from Washington, D. C., indicate the "quart of milk for every Hottentot" boys in the State Department didn't read the November 8 editions of our daily newspapers. Those editions carried the news of an election which most people are agreed was a complete rejection of the bumble-headed thinking which has characterized the actions of the State Department.

Now some of the State Department "experts" tell us we should sign a peace treaty with Japan, which we will concur would be a good idea. But, as revealed in our editorial of October 27, they say "they haven't time to deal with fisheries or other commercial matters" in the peace treaty.

This again demonstrates a complete and utter lack of understanding on the part of the State Department of either the importance of the fishing industry to the Pacific coast or the practical situation in regard to our resources and future peace in the Pacific.

Actually, all that is needed to protect American and Canadian fishery resources is a simply reciprocal provision providing that until otherwise agreed the Japs will stay out of American fisheries and American vessels will keep away from Japanese waters. Another point these planners in the State Department should recognize is that such an agreement is not a commercial treaty at all. The Japanese dealt with fishery matters in treaties with Russia in 1905 and in 1925.

ALASKANS REMEMBER WHEN

Alaskans, more than any others, remember the tense days of 1937 and 1938 when the Japanese with their factory ships, destructive gear and utter disregard for all sound conservation practices came into Bristol Bay and scooped up all the red salmon for miles around. We want no repetition of this situation.

The woolly thinkers of the State Department should recognize that the fisheries under discussion—salmon, halibut, tuna, herring and sardine—have been discovered, developed, cared for and conserved by the people of this continent and belong to them. They are a vital resource and should not be forgotten until we no longer have bargaining power with the Japanese. Now is the time to protect our own possessions, not give them away.

We cannot overestimate the value of the fishing industry to the Territory and the Pacific Coast generally. To allow the Japanese to dip into the savings account of American and Canadian fishermen would imperil an investment of more than $350,000,000.

Even more important, it would endanger the livelihood of 50,000 men directly employed by the fishing industry and an additional 175,000 men in transportation, processing and wholesale trade.

There is no parallel between the importance of fishing to Alaska and any other single industry to any other region. It is more vital to the economy of the Territory than lumber is to Oregon, oil to Texas, apples to Washington or any single commodity to the great agricultural States of the Midwest. Cripple that industry, as certain "thinkers" in the State Department would have us do by a gross sin of omission, and at least half the white and native population would be forced to leave. There simply would be no other source of income for them.

NO TIME FOR MUSHY THINKING

This issue is too serious to be left to the mushy thinking of State Department pink-tea intellectuals. The hard realities of the picture are that Japan has no alternative but to agree to reasonable restrictions in the peace treaty. At this juncture we would not be dealing with her on a basis of equality as a sovereign nation. In order to get a peace treaty and be restored to her place in the family of nations she will take about what she gets and like it. That fact does not justify the taking of undue advantage but it most certainly justifies our insistence upon our demonstrable rights.

Once the treaty is signed and ratified the situation will be entirely different and the time to stop this foolishness is now. Now we have the opportunity to settle for once and for all this question. Fisheries matters must be settled in the peace treaty or before it is signed. Any other action would be sheer folly.

CLARIFYING THE LEGAL ISSUE

Those opposed to the inclusion in the Japanese peace treaty of restrictions on Japan's activities in Canadian and American fishery areas may be depended upon to raise questions as to precedent as established by international law. The following excerpt from a speech recently made by Edward W. Allen on the subject of international law and fisheries is therefore unusually timely.

Mr. Allen is not only a recognized authority on fisheries problems but is equally well-known in the field of international law, having occupied the position of chairman of the committee on international law of the American Bar Association.

It has been stated that international law is a mixture of the practical and the altruistic. Perhaps it is simpler and better to say that, generally speaking, international law is an attempt to apply common sense to international relations—to be just and reasonable but not to be silly or gullible.

In this light we may approach the most imminent international situation which confronts the fishing industry of the Pacific coast—the matter of a Japanese fishery treaty. What is the situation and how can it be handled in conformity with international law?

TWO TYPES OF PHILOSOPHY

It is well known that there are two types of philosophy in this country, both inside and outside of Government circles. There are those who believe that it is neither isolationistic, unreasonable, or immoral to maintain the integrity of American industry so that this country will really be able to give the world at large sound and effective leadership. Then there is the Henry Wallace type of philosophy which apparently conceives that the way to create a happy world is to sacrifice American industry to foreigners.

PRACTICALITY RATHER THAN THEORY

The practical situation is that the Canadian and United States fisheries of this coast—sardine, herring, coastal tuna, halibut, salmon, and others—are being fished to their optimum or more by the fishermen of these two countries; that the intrusion of Japanese fishermen into these fisheries would not increase production on a continuous year-to-year basis; that for their fishermen to come clear across the Pacific Ocean would only be possible because of their low standards of living and would, therefore, necessarily tend to reduce the standards of living of our own fishermen; that they already have a greater fish poundage production out of their own coastal fisheries than we have from ours; that our prewar experience was that Japanese fishery operations were destructive and inconsistent with sound fishery conservation; that the Japanese could substantially increase their own coastal fishery production if they would apply proper conservation measures; and that, if they should come over and deplete our coastal fisheries, it would probably result in our own fishermen going across the ocean to raid the Japanese coasts, a reciprocity of the type that no one wants.

THE LEGAL SITUATION

The legal situation is that peace treaties historically have dealt with many subjects other than a mere paper peace; that Japan itself in its two peace treaties with Russia of 1905 and 1925 specifically incorporated fishery provisions; that there is nothing in international law to prevent any two (or more) nations from making treaties restricting fishing by their own nationals and vessels; that there is nothing in international law to prevent Japan from entering into a perfectly simple yet effective and reciprocal treaty that, until otherwise agreed, its fishing vessels will stay out of the coastal fisheries of Canada and the United States and, in turn, these two countries will keep their fishing vessels out of Japanese coastal fisheries; that this can readily be done and should be done as a part of the peace treaty or at the same time.

A BASIS FOR BUILDING GOOD WILL

If the leading fishery nations bordering the Pacific Ocean take timely steps to avoid disputes in that most fertile field for conflict—coastal fisheries, other fields can be investigated with more deliberation, and some treaty procedure can be evolved for dealing with the noncoastal fisheries as research may, from time to time, indicate necessity.

It is announced in the press that a Japanese peace treaty is imminent. If, as indicated, international law permits inclusion of provisions such as have been discussed, there is perhaps nothing better that could be done to create that international good will across the Pacific that is desired by the citizens of Japan as well as by those of Canada and the United States. International law can and should facilitate such sound diplomacy.

To neglect this opportunity is to court trouble and to threaten the future peace of the Pacific. International law can be misused to obstruct progress, but it can also be developed to keep abreast of world conditions and to promote world peace.

We Must Stop Trading With the Enemy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RUSSELL V. MACK
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. MACK of Washington. Mr. Speaker, the morning newspapers, today, carried a United Press dispatch from Seoul which quotes American artillery officers of the Second Division as saying that they have seen and examined American-made rockets which have been fired at American troops by the Chinese Communists.

How did these American-made rockets get into the hands of the Chinese Communists? Who shipped them to the Communists?

These United States artillery officers are quoted as saying that these American-made rockets used by the Chinese are of a type that the American forces have not been using in Korea. These Army officers say the marking on these rockets and on the boxes containing them indicate they were manufactured in the United States of America as late as June of this year.

The statements of these Army officers should be thoroughly investigated by the appropriate Government agencies and investigated promptly. If these rockets were furnished the Communists by any American supplier, he should be punished. So also, should any Government official who has aided and abetted any such shipments of weapons to the enemy for use against our troops.

We are now being called upon to appropriate billions for defense and will be asked, during the Eighty-second Congress, for even more billions to arm ourselves and our allies. Nearly all of us, including myself, are in favor of arming ourselves and our allies to the hilt to protect our country and the free world against aggressor, outlaw nations.

Yet, even now, as we arm ourselves and supply millions to arm our allies, we must deplore and should seek to stop forthwith these allies and our own people from selling war goods to our enemies.

It is a deplorable truth, that many of those whom we have been and are supplying with arms have been selling war supplies to Russia and her satellites.

In 1949, according to Commerce Department figures, the nations of Western Europe to whom we give Marshall plan aid and arms, sold to Russia and her satellites $1,098,905,000 worth of goods.

Not a small part of these goods were potential war supplies, including such items as iron, steel, lead, copper, zinc, rubber, tin, ball bearings, and barbed wire.

Here are some of the things the United Kingdom sold to Russia and her satellites in 1949:

War supplies sold to Russia and her satellites by the United Kingdom in 1949

Ball- and roller-bearing parts	$213,600
Iron, steel	12,140,800
Steel bars and rods, not alloy	1,736,000
Bars and rods of alloy steel	504,000
Hoops and strips	422,000
Railway and tramway construction	708,400
Barbed wire	420,000
Cable and rope	425,600
Nonferrous metals	4,062,800
Aluminum and alloys	618,800
Brass and other alloys of copper, etc	1,142,400
Electrical goods and apparatus	6,806,800
Machinery	45,172,400
Electrical generators	11,986,800
Electrical machinery, other than generators	2,864,400
Machine tools	5,138,000
Vehicles, including locomotives, ships, etc	13,361,600
Rubber tires	229,600
Chassis for motor vehicles	1,660,400
Total	109,644,400

All sales of this kind to our enemies should be stopped.

During 1949 France sold to Russia and her satellites these items:

War supplies sold to Russia and her satellites by France in 1949

Chemicals	$2,530,142
Rubber and rubber products	1,678,616
Steel-mill products, hot-rolled, etc	4,198,881
Steel-mill products, cold-rolled, etc	3,087,703
Aluminum, crude, etc	360,245
Aluminum alloys	408,688
Lead and lead alloys	316,349
Metal manufactures	2,046,376
Machinery and apparatus	10,272,238
Machinery, electrical	2,015,230
Transportation equipment	8,281,011
Optical, surgical, photographic materials	$1,113,145
Total	36,308,624

All such sales should be stopped.

During 1949, Belgium sold to Russia and her satellites these items:

War supplies sold to Russia and her satellites by Belgium-Luxemburg in 1949

Arms	$6,400
Iron, cast iron, and steel	19,782,840
Copper	11,028,820
Lead	1,583,160
Zinc	3,003,780
Tin	941,060
Base metals and alloys	1,387,360

War supplies sold to Russia and her satellites by Belgium-Luxemburg in 1949—Con.

Boilers, machinery, appliances, etc	$7,937,880
Electrical machinery and apparatus, etc	5,840,660
Railway and tramway rolling stock	430,600
Chemical products	1,709,540
Explosives, fireworks, matches, etc	1,447,960
Rubber and manufacturers items	942,600
Total	56,042,660

All these sales should be stopped.

We, the United States Government, are not without sin in carrying on this unholy trade with the enemy.

During the first 6 months of this year the United States purchased about $3,500,000 a month of goods from Russia, mostly the luxuries of furs and canned crab. During those same months, the United States sold Russia about $100,000 a month in American goods. In short, by this unholy trade with the enemy, who even now is killing our troops, we, each month, are supplying that enemy by this trade with more than $3,000,000 in American dollars or American dollar-credits, which she employs to buy war supplies from other nations supposedly allied with us.

We must stop this unholy trade with the enemy and insist that all nations allied with us do likewise. Unless we stop this trade with the enemy, the whole effectiveness of our rearmament program will be weakened.

The failure of the State Department to stop this trading with the enemy is just one more reason why that Department should undergo an immediate and thorough housecleaning.

National Unity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 7, 1950

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, some individuals who call so loudly and continuously for unity fail to realize that unity never comes until there is voluntary agreement upon a policy.

All too long a group of internationalists, many of whose sincerity and patriotism cannot be questioned, have assumed that they are all-wise, that they are the sole guardians of the people's welfare, of the national security. When, day by day, it becomes evident that the implementation of their policy calls for the sacrifice of millions of American young men—let us not mention the economic loss—even these self-satisfied individuals should begin to understand that to get unity in this Nation, they will be forced to consider the wishes and the judgment of others.

From the Washington Times-Herald of this morning comes an editorial which might be helpful to them, if they will read it:

SOME INTERNATIONALISTS APPEAL FOR UNITY

Two overlapping groups of internationalists world savers issued calls for unity the other day, describing liberty and peace to be in dire and immediate peril. One resolution emanated from the trustees of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, the other from a self-appointed "crisis committee."

The Carnegie outfit, as will be remembered, is the crowd of puttyheads that adopted Alger Hiss as its president after he had finished his business of assisting Russia by espionage in the State Department and by steering Roosevelt into Stalin's clutches at Yalta. The resolution was drafted by a committee of three, among whom was General Eisenhower, who stopped his armies so that the Russians could take Berlin and Prague. Mr. Hiss and General Eisenhower had something to do with the emergence of the present peril.

The resolution was moved by John Foster Dulles, the bipartisan Republican who now works in the New Deal State Department. Dulles was in Korea just before the Communists started their invasion last June. He was free with promises that America could be counted upon to help the Republic of Korea hold the line of the thirty-eighth parallel against any Communist incursion. Within a week we found ourselves in a war in support of Dulles' pledge.

The war has turned very sour, but Dulles has the crust to offer resolutions which have the effect of commanding the people to have confidence in Dulles. He has been one of the principal shapers of the New Deal foreign policy that has presented the country with a first-class disaster.

General Eisenhower, in a supplementary pronouncement, said that Americans are frightened "because we know that the opposing group [Russia] moves at the will of one man or a small group of men," while "we know we are disunited." The general's formula for unity thus appears to be the same as that of the totalitarians: Blindly obey the leader, meaning Truman, who has scarcely enough wit to button his own suspenders.

The "crisis committee" deplores what it views as destructive criticism. It states that "we are opposed to the use of political pressure for the ouster of Secretary of State Acheson. A national emergency is no time for punitive political expeditions or for singling out scapegoats."

This last is very generous to Mr. Acheson. He's no scapegoat, shouldered with an undeserved blame; he's the fellow who worked up the foreign policy that got us in this jam.

TRYING TO HIDE THEIR BLUNDERS

The remarks about punitive expeditions and scapegoats are a trifle comic, for one of the signers of this particular manifesto is former Justice Owen Roberts, of the Supreme Court, who was chosen by Mr. Roosevelt to be chairman of a special commission to saddle the blame for the Pearl Harbor disaster on Admiral Kimmel and General Short.

We note among the names of the signers those of Gov. Adlai Stevenson, of Illinois, a character witness in behalf of Hiss, and a number of veteran internationalists, among them Will Clayton, former Under Secretary of State for economic affairs, who mopped up in cotton under the Marshall plan which he sponsored; Robert P. Patterson, Roosevelt's Under Secretary of War and Truman's former Secretary of War; Paul G. Hoffman, who spent the Marshall plan money, and Dr. James T. Shotwell and Clark L. Eichelberger, who have devoted many years to preaching the gospel of internationalists.

It can scarcely have failed to occur to these people that our sad condition and the enormous casualties in Korea are the direct result of the doctrine of foreign intermeddling which they have consistently propagated. They cry for "unity" behind their blunders, hoping thereby that their guilt will escape detection.

If the people want to know the authors of their misfortunes, they can get a good cross-section by reviewing the names attached to these two statements. The official policy of committing the United States, with 6 percent of the population of the globe, to set everything right in the world, even though we utterly lack the means to do it, would never have been decreed except for the propaganda of this crowd and the gullible people who accepted their infatuated notions.

A Tribute to a Real American

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to pay tribute today to a man in the best tradition of Texas and the United States. This man had less than a complete grammar-school education, yet through resourcefulness, he has built a great fortune which he magnanimously has dedicated to the people of his State for better education and health. This man is Mr. Hugh Roy Cullen, of whom you have all heard.

Mr. Cullen's fortune is based on oil and gas production, a great natural wealth of Texas. Mr. Cullen has the imagination, courage, and the managerial ability needed to develop and maintain optimum production. He has in his oil fields the highest minimum wage of any oil producer. The Labor Messenger, of Houston, Tex., on August 5, 1949, headed a front-page editorial Friend of all Houston: Hugh Roy Cullen. The first two paragraphs were:

The Labor Messenger herewith extends a bouquet of flowers to a distinguished Houstonian—Hugh Roy Cullen.

To some people it may seem out of character for a labor paper to toss orchids to a fabulously rich man. A moment's thought should convince them it is not. On the contrary, in this instance, at least, it is an appropriate gesture.

What has Mr. Cullen done with his money: He has established a $160,000,000 Cullen Foundation which is the basis of the great new Medical Center in Houston. Mrs. Cullen and he have also given 13 beautiful buildings to schools, both white and Negro, and to hospitals of four different religious denominations—Methodist, Baptist, Espiscopal, and Catholic.

Mr. and Mrs. Cullen have made these great gifts for the education of future generations. His credo is expressed by the following quotation from a speech his grandfather, Ezekiel Cullen, made in 1839 before the Third Congress of the Republic of Texas:

It is declared to be an axiom in political science that unless a people are educated and enlightened, it is idle to expect the continuance of civil liberty, or capacity for self-government.

Answer to Tidelands Ruling

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to submit an article from the New Orleans Item quoting a statement from Hon. Bolivar Kemp, Attorney General of the State of Louisiana, in regard to the recent decision of the United States Supreme Court decision in respect to the confiscation of the tidelands of Louisiana, Texas, and California, and other States, to wit:

KEMP GIVES ANSWER TO TIDAL RULING

Here is the text of Louisiana Attorney General Kemp's statement on the United States Supreme Court's decision to require States to account for money they have collected for tidelands leases:

"The decree just entered by the Supreme Court is wrong and unjust for the following reasons:

"It would divest Louisiana of her fee simple right to the marginal sea and its resources, without a trial of the issue of title and without permitting Louisiana to offer evidence of her title thereto, undisputed for 136 years.

"No matter how you look at it, this is sheer confiscation—a seizure of property without trial on the merits.

HAVE CONFUSION

"At the same time, the Court does not attempt to vest fee simple title in the United States and indeed, it is in its decree the United States actually abandons all claims to fee simple title. So who has title to the marginal sea now? Apparently no one. The Court would take it away from us, but does not have the courage to give it outright to the United States. All we have is a hopeless confusion.

"On this state of facts, the Court apparently expect the sovereign State of Louisiana to pay money to the United States. But no Louisiana official is presently authorized by law to pass over any money to the United States unless the Louisiana Legislature votes some appropriation. How could the United States expect to collect from the sovereign State of Louisiana? Would it send its Armed Forces to Louisiana, invade our borders, march into the capitol at Baton Rouge and there seize the great seal of the State of Louisiana and put it up for sale at public auction to apply on the judgment?"

SOME SUCCESS

"While our battle has been an uphill one, we have been successful to this extent: that the decree now entered has saved the State of Louisiana the sum of $36,000,000 as against the claim of the United States in that the Government asks that we pay all sums since June 23, 1947, and the Court directed that only those moneys collected since June 5, 1950, be accounted for.

"At that time when oil is needed so badly for preparedness, the Federal Government through its own calculated effort is bringing stagnation to the oil fields on the coasts of the various States.

"I have today talked with other members of the tidelands committee of the Attorneys General Association and they are strongly of the opinion that the new Congress which meets January 1 will recognize the boundaries and the rights of the various coastal States by appropriate legislation."

American Public Scorns Wanton Attack on J. Edgar Hoover and the Federal Bureau of Investigation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. EDWARD J. HART

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, recently, as is well known, there was published a book by one Max Lowenthal entitled "The Federal Bureau of Investigation." Neither its literary style nor its contents commended it to public esteem. In fact, such attention as it has attracted derives only from the eminence, patriotism, integrity, and extraordinary ability of Mr. J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, whom it wantonly and unjustifiably attacks.

I include as part of my extension of remarks comments upon this book from the New York World-Telegram Sun, the Brooklyn Tablet, the Manresan, of Annapolis, Md., the Detroit Free Press, and the Washington Times-Herald, which reecho the views of very many other book reviewers and commentators on the current scene, set forth in many other publications:

[From the New York World-Telegram and Sun of November 30, 1950]

UNFAIR BOOK ABOUT G-MEN

Max Lowenthal's book, The Federal Bureau of Investigation, has attracted more attention than, in our opinion, it deserves.

It is primarily a voluminous compilation of all the criticisms publicly uttered against the FBI since its creation, with no balancing evaluation of the criticism, and with little space or weight given to the FBI's solid accomplishments and to favorable comment thereon even from the same sources Mr. Lowenthal quotes as critical.

For instance, the book includes numerous quotations from editorials in the Scripps-Howard newspapers concerning isolated actions of the FBI—all critical. Nowhere do we find any favorable Scripps-Howard comment about the FBI and its director, J. Edgar Hoover. Yet our offhand recollection is that Scripps-Howard's editorial appraisals of the work of the FBI and Mr. Hoover have been about 10-to-1 favorable. That's probably a better rating than these columns have given any other Government agency or human institution.

We cannot believe the FBI's good reputation will be damaged by this book. No other unit in the executive branch of the Government is as secure in the confidence of the public and of Congress. The same goes for its director, Mr. Hoover. And for the good reason that the confidence has been well earned.

Mr. Lowenthal is a well-heeled New York lawyer who has been in and out of Washington over the last 30-odd years, in various official and unofficial capacities. He has never made any secret of his active dislike for Mr. Hoover and the whole G-men set-up. Only thing new is that he has written a book about it.

One item of news interest in the book is Mr. Lowenthal's confirmation of an oft-repeated rumor that President Truman rejected a suggestion from military advisers that Mr. Hoover be appointed head of the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA). But that reflects no discredit on Mr. Hoover. To the contrary, the discredit goes to Mr. Truman who missed an opportunity to make something of the CIA.

It is well known that the CIA, under a succession of administrators, has not been worth its salt—and we're not here downrating able Gen. Bedell Smith, present CIA chief, who has not been in office long enough to warm his seat. But the obvious fact is that the CIA will never amount to anything until it gets a permanent chief of the caliber of Mr. Hoover and builds a staff of operatives of the G-men's caliber.

ATTACK ON FBI HEAD AROUSES RESENTMENT—MAX LOWENTHAL'S BIASED VOLUME WILL BE ANSWERED; AUTHOR ACCUSED OF ASSOCIATION WITH COMMUNISTS

WASHINGTON, November 28.—The Capitol is agog over a bitter attack on the Federal Bureau of Investigation—the highly respected FBI—by one of Washington's men of mystery who have had a part in influencing Government action in recent years.

The author of the book is one Max Lowenthal. He is also one of the company of David Niles, Harry Hopkins, and others who were never elected to any office but who seem to have played a tremendously important role in Government administration.

The volume—it is entitled "The Federal Bureau of Investigation"—is so obviously partisan and unfair in its treatment of the head of the organization, J. Edgar Hoover, that it would not be surprising if the FBI leader should receive a congressional award and the Bureau increased appropriations. In addition, the Congressmen will probably take Lowenthal apart, particularly to check on reports that he has been playing the Communist game. Meanwhile, his alleged friendly relations with President Truman will probably be given a public airing.

The book, a complimentary copy of which was found by every Member of Congress on his desk, treats the FBI as a secret police organization which is, or can grow into, an arm of terror. It has within its pages every unfavorable public comment ever made about the FBI and its Director, going back many years before Mr. Hoover had any connection with it, but receives its strongest blows for its harassment of Communists.

According to Lowenthal, Mr. Hoover seemingly has done very little good; the book reeks with adverse criticism of him—minimizing, when not suppressing, everything in his favor and deemphasizing all his magnificent work against spies, counterfeiters, saboteurs, etc. Facts, figures, reports, comments, and quotations are by implication slanted against the FBI. It is a smart smearing job which will please Moscow and should draw from the Kremlin a "Well done, my man; well done."

Some of the material seems to have been lifted from Albert E. Kahn's High Treason—the Plot Against the People. Kahn, of course, is an undaunted writer and speaker for Communist causes. The publishers—William Sloane Associates, New York—claim the volume is unbiased, objective, and refer to the author as a conservative; the man who wrote the blurb didn't know the author's record.

In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for September 1, 1950, Representative GEORGE DONDERO, of Michigan, exposed the record of this man of mystery, Lowenthal. He identified him as a graduate of the Harvard Law School, where "he came under the influence of another man who through the years has manipulated the Charlie McCarthy in Government office," namely, Felix Frankfurter.

Lowenthal's "skill and technique are unparalleled," he said, and his "record is one of attack on any American institution which stands foursquare for the American way of life." Mr. DONDERO continued: "In the thirties, Lowenthal concentrated upon weakening our internal security by aiding an all-out Communist attack against the Federal Bureau of Investigation. In 1940, Lowenthal sent out anonymous memorandums, smearing the FBI, which fact can be attested to by many Washington newsmen, hoping to head off the FBI in its fight to protect our shores against the menace of communism and fascism at a time when the Nazis and Communists were allies.

"Lowenthal has worked diligently and deviously, but always relentlessly, to destroy the effectiveness of the FBI in its efforts to protect our country from the emissaries of godless communism.

"He has always realized the FBI is the one agency he could not penetrate or intimidate. He has long known it was the one agency which blocked his efforts to completely undermine our internal security."

Mr. DONDERO then identified Mr. Lowenthal with many pro-Communist groups and listed "a few of his intimates" with unquestioned pro-Soviet records.

PRESIDENT'S FRIEND

People here are also discussing Lowenthal's relationship with President Truman. Jonathan Daniels in The Man From Independence identifies him as the man who changed the President from what has been called the realistic thinking of Pendergastism to the rarified liberalism of the late Justice Louis D. Brandeis. The author sets him down as a friend and adviser of Mr. Truman and states it was largely due to him that Mr. Truman permitted his name to be used for the office of Vice President. He also states Mr. Lowenthal has received considerations from the administration.

Mr. DONDERO covered the latter point in the following statement in his address of December 1:

"By pulling strings he acquired the title of adviser on disposal of Jewish property to Gen. Lucius Clay, head of our military government in Germany. Within a matter of weeks he was known as the general counsel to General Clay and had as an assistant, George Shaw Wheeler, the American traitor, Communist, and renegade who shocked all America when he denounced the land of his birth and asked Communist-controlled Czechoslovakia for asylum. * * *

"Within a matter of weeks a change occurred in Germany. The usually accurate Human Events for September 25, 1946, reported, 'It may be mere coincidence, but since Mr. Lowenthal's appointment General Clay has permitted leaders of the Soviet-sponsored SED (Socialist Workers Party) to address mass meetings in the American zone of occupation.'

"This was the opening which the Russians were awaiting because it gave them the opportunity to sponsor a Communist Party under our protection. A few weeks later the commentator, Walter Winchell, warned on his Sunday night program that as a result of Lowenthal's activities a rift had occurred between the American and British zones."

[From the Annapolis (Md.) Manresan of November 1950]

BOOK REVIEW

This is not exactly down our ally because we do not go in for book reviews. However, we are happy to take a crack at this one and with gusto. As we go to press, November 20, 1950, we find a long article in the New York Times of today, page 20, calling attention to a new book, entitled "The Federal Bureau of Investigation." A study. By Max Lowenthal (William Sloane Associates, $4.50).

The book, 559 pages, is an attack on Director J. Edgar Hoover and the Federal Bureau of Investigation. As such the book condemns itself. We know nothing about the author, except what we have read from time to time in the papers. But we do know much about Mr. Hoover and the wonderful men and women of the FBI. They can take it—the smears along with the cheers. The American public knows, respects, trusts, and loves Director Hoover and the FBI. It will take more than a minor critic to undermine the FBI. If you feel that you have $4.50 to spend, then spend it on the poor at Christmas time. Our congratulations to Director Hoover and all the men and women of the FBI.

[From the Detroit (Mich.) Free Press of December 2, 1950]

GOOD MORNING

(By Malcolm W. Bingay)

BOOSTING HOOVER

I have just read a book attacking the Federal Bureau of Investigation which turns out to be the highest compliment ever paid J. Edgar Hoover.

The book is written by a very famous lawyer, indeed; one always referred to as noted with a long and distinguished record.

Now it stands to reason that a man who is one of the most brilliant lawyers in America would most certainly have the ability to prosecute a case so that there would be no doubt of guilt.

That is why, in my opinion, J. Edgar Hoover is given the finest endorsement ever presented any public official in our times. In a book of 559 pages the author, Max Lowenthal, is unable to find anything wrong with Hoover—although it isn't because he doesn't try.

There is no question about Hoover being thoroughly hated, especially by the Communists. Pravda and the Daily Worker devote most of their energies to cursing him.

And most certainly he has been cordially hated by the hatchet men of the Roosevelt and Truman administrations.

This is because he has refused to play politics.

Born in Washington and a resident of that city he has never been allowed to vote, has never had anything to do with any political party, and has lived up to the high principles of the Bureau as expressed in the law creating it: that it shall have nothing to do with politics.

"Credit to Hoover when credit is due might have given it (the book) a better balance. The director of the FBI has instilled a fine esprit de corps in his organization. He has kept it apparently free from venality—although some of his former agents have not been above profiting from their employment under him.

"He had the good sense to resist congressional efforts to saddle him with the responsibility of passing on the loyalty of Government employees. His treatment of alien enemies in World War II was discriminating and just. He had no part in, and, indeed, opposed the Army's mass evacuation of Japanese Americans from the west coast in 1942."

Here we see the inability of a radical reviewer with a fixation of mind to say a decent thing without a feline dig. The New Republic hints that there is something venal in the fact that former members of the FBI "have not been above profiting from their employment under him."

An FBI agent has to be highly educated. He has to be physically fit. He has to be an expert marksman. He has to pass a high intelligence test and prove his courage before being accepted by Hoover.

All appointments to his staff are free from political pull.

Such an agent gets about the same annual pay as the ordinary factory worker.

Naturally there comes a time when he has to consider his family and their future. He resigns and takes a position in industry or law * * * anything honorable that appeals to him—even to writing his memoirs.

And this, it is hinted, is venal.

Starting with FDR himself, what member of the whole Roosevelt administration did not profit—and how—from association with the administration? If any of the Truman ménage has not done likewise it may be due to an inability to read and write.

These are the snide rides a courageous and altruistic patriot has to take because he has fiercely refused to play any kind of politics.

Though offered as high as $100,000 a year by corporations because of his abilities and integrity, he has refused and lives on his Government pay of around $10,000.

He has never accepted a penny for any of the articles he has written. Like some high priest of a holy cause his vision is beyond money.

The people of America owe J. Edgar Hoover an unpayable debt. He has inspired generation after generation of youths with high ideals and his school has educated the police departments of all America in the science of crime detection.

The Roosevelt and Truman politicians hate him as much as the Nazis did and as the Communists now do.

I know of no recommendation that could be higher.

WASHINGTON REPORT

(By Fulton Lewis, Jr.)

Morris L. Ernst, a noted liberal who once held other views, now regards the Federal Bureau of Investigation and its director, Mr. J. Edgar Hoover, as able guardians of individual liberties.

Ernst has set forth his thoughts in the current issue of Reader's Digest, basing them on a lengthy and exhaustive study of the FBI. He finds it currently the victim of a smear campaign.

Max Lowenthal, President Truman's tutor in liberal thinking, is also the author of a book about the FBI. We have already examined it in some detail. Lowenthal's version blames everything but the national debt on the FBI and Hoover. He is fearful that Hoover is bent on stomping out individual liberties in the U. S. A. The book in general fits perfectly as part of the anti-FBI smear campaign to which Mr. Ernst refers.

Lowenthal has had these ideas about the FBI for a long time, and on several occasions he has openly assailed the Bureau.

Lowenthal once served as chief counsel for the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, when then Senator Harry Truman was in charge of a subcommittee investigating railroads.

It was this mid-30's investigation that launched Mr. Truman on the road to the White House. Later, in World War II, a watchdog committee for military spending was set up by the Senate, and Mr. Truman got the nod to head it.

He already had a reputation as an investigator, which was made under Lowenthal's tutelage while chairman of the Commerce subcommittee. From there, Mr. Truman bounced into the Vice Presidency and finally the Presidency, with Lowenthal bouncing right behind him.

It isn't often that a Presidental intimate has such strong views about the chief investigative agency of the Government as does Lowenthal. The President keeps piling more and more antispy work on the FBI and praising its operations.

Even so, Lowenthal manages to maintain his strong dislike for the FBI and still keep the Presidential ear. It's a neat trick.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Ernst admits he once feared the FBI and its power. He says:

"Those who feared the Bureau—as I once did—will be glad to know the facts. The FBI is unique in the history of national police. It has a magnificent record of respect for individual freedom. It invites documented complaints against its agents. It has zealously tried to prevent itself from violating the democratic process."

Ernst acted as attorney in hundreds of cases involving civil liberties in which FBI agents were active. These chiefly involved Japanese and German nationalists who were rounded up at the start of the war. Of these he says:

"A few of the 16,000 persons then arrested became my clients. I defended them before hearing boards and was able to help free some of them. In every case there were fair hearings, with every consideration being shown to the defense.

"And although I was the lawyer for certain acquitted suspects, I must admit that Mr. Hoover had a justification in picking up my clients; there was cause for suspicion, and no injustice was done."

So Mr. Ernst has had some first-hand experience with the FBI. Furthermore, when he became really worried, he went to the FBI and talked it all over with Director Hoover. The above comments ensued.

Lowenthal has yet to appear anywhere around the FBI, but his book contains 590 pages of criticism of it.

Lowenthal is particularly incensed over wire tapping and loyalty cases that involve the FBI. Ernst notes something Lowenthal lightly skips over—that the Communists work furtively and zealously against our freedom and our ideas of decency.

"Something had to be done about this and the FBI had to do it," Ernst writes. "What was the task? To bring the facts up from the underground so that all the people can know what is being plotted."

Ernst gives Hoover an "A" for effort on this score.

Lowenthal simply shudders in print and asks us to shudder with him. He also criticizes the FBI for keeping thousands of anonymous messages, tips, and unsigned notes in its files.

Ernst points out that Maj. Gen. Bennett E. Meyers, former Air Force purchasing officer, was started to prison on the basis of an unsigned note to the FBI.

Scores of Communists also can ruminate about the value of information of this nature as they languish in jail or contemplate an early trip to one, at the Government's expense.

Resolution of Republican Conference

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE J. BROWN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution adopted this morning by the Republican conference:

In this critical hour, confidence of the American people in their leadership is essential to our security.

It is completely obvious that Secretary Acheson and the State Department under his leadership have lost the confidence of the Congress and the American people and cannot regain it.

Recognizing this fact, we earnestly insist for the good of our country that Acheson be replaced as Secretary of State and that there be a thorough housecleaning in the State Department and changes in the personnel and policies responsible for this lack of confidence.

Scapegoat or Blunderer?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. H. R. GROSS

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, citizens of the Third Congressional District of Iowa have lost whatever confidence they may have had in Secretary of State Acheson.

Many weeks ago I publicly called for his removal from office for it was evident then that the stupidity and blundering of the State Department and the administration had destroyed any usefulness he may have had.

The thinking of a vast majority of Iowans is well summarized in the following editorial from the Waterloo (Iowa) Daily Courier:

ACHESON: SCAPEGOAT OR BLUNDERER?

Rumors persist, despite denials, that Secretary of State Acheson will resign soon. Although his supporters may defend him stoutly against accusations of incompetence, they cannot deny that he has lost the confidence of the country. Demands for his resignation have come not only from Republicans but also from important Democratic Congressmen.

Acheson's friends insist that he is merely being made the scapegoat for military disasters in Korea, that the public merely wants to cut off somebody's head because the Russians have maneuvered us into an unwanted and unpopular war.

On the other hand, severe indictments can be brought against Acheson which prove that he, while not entirely to blame for the present situation, played a dominant role in the tragic blunders which led the country into this debacle.

First. Acheson was a leading State Department advocate of appeasement of Russia long before he became Secretary of State and must bear his share of blame for the consequences of that appeasement.

Second. Acheson was a member of the State Department clique which deserted Chiang Kai-shek in the critical period following the war when the Nationalist leader might have established his control over China. Instead, the State Department enforced a truce while an effort was made to require Chiang to take the Communists into his government. History will record that this maneuver paved the way for the eventual triumph of the Communists in the civil war.

Third. Acheson publicly proclaimed as Secretary of State that Korea would not be defended and this undoubtedly led the Communists to conclude that we would let South Korea fall in a civil war as we let the Chinese Nationalists be defeated.

Fourth. Acheson was Secretary of State when the critical decision was made to revise the previous policy and go to the aid of the South Koreans. This was a mad gamble unless there were reasonable assurances that the Chinese Communists would not enter the conflict. As far as the public knows, moreover, no effort was made to determine what the policy of the Chinese Communists was going to be. As Secretary of State, this was Acheson's responsibility.

Fifth. Acheson based American policy in the Orient on the belief that the Chinese Communists could be split off from Russia and that they would follow a policy independent of the politburo. This has been proved exactly 100 percent wrong.

Sixth. Regardless of the justice of Senator JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY'S charges, Acheson has had a "soft" attitude toward Communists and extreme left-wingers in Government service. He violated the public trust by publicly asserting that he would not "turn my back" on Alger Hiss, the convicted perjurer.

Surely all this is reasonable justification for demanding Acheson's dismissal. No doubt many of the criticisms result from the increased wisdom of hindsight; but in any case the Secretary of State is exposed by developments as a blunderer. We know of no way to judge the abilities of a Government official than by his success or failure; and Acheson—insofar as Asiatic policy is concerned—has been a failure.

Mohawk Valley Formula for Strikebreaking Used by Reactionary Republicanism To Win Elections as Well as Strikes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, at this time I wish to call the attention of the Congress and the readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to the Mohawk Valley strikebreaking formula as set forth in the case entitled "The Matter of Remington Rand, Inc., and Remington Rand Joint Protective Board of the District Council Office Equipment Workers," Case No. C-145, decided March 13, 1937, which case is to be found in the decisions and orders of the National Labor Relations Board, volume II, pages 626 and 664 to 666, inclusive.

I direct attention to this strikebreaking formula, because I feel sure that the reactionary Republican Party whose political conduct is always in step with big business, has been using this strikebreaking formula in political campaigns against the people and their interests, in the same manner as it has been used by big business against employees who sought to gain their rights from greedy, selfish, and un-American interests. It might be well for liberal Democrats and Republicans who are alined against reactionary Republicans and Democrats in a fight to preserve our country and our form of government and the rights of the people to study this strike-breaking formula and see how it has been used in past political campaigns. Many liberal Democrats and Republicans agree with me that this is the key to long past as well as more recent political campaigns which brought about the defeat of men who should have been permitted to serve the people, and it behooves all right-thinking Americans in future campaigns to follow the labor-union plan in breaking the Mohawk Valley formula. A definite manual has been prepared by labor unions to offset this pernicious formula if same is being used either in whole or in part.

This formula, as taken from the aforementioned report, is as follows:

First. When the strike is threatened, label the union leaders as agitators to discredit them with the public and their own followers. In the plant, conduct a forced balloting under the direction of foremen in an attempt to ascertain the strength of the union and to make possible misrepresentation of the strikers as a small minority imposing their will upon the majority. At the same time, disseminate propaganda, by means of press releases, advertisements, and activities of "missionaries," such propaganda falsely stating the issues involved in the strike so that the strikers appear to be making arbitrary demands, and the real issues, such as the employer's refusal to bargain collectively, are obscured. Concurrently with these moves, by exerting economic pressure through threats to move the plant, aline the influential members of the community into a cohesive group opposed to the strike. Include in this group, usually designated a citizens committee, representatives of the bankers, real-estate owners, and businessmen, i. e., those most sensitive to any threat of removal of the plant because of its effect upon property values and purchasing power flowing from payrolls.

Second. When the strike is called raise high the banner of law and order, thereby causing the community to mass legal and police weapons against a wholly imagined violence and to forget that those of its members who are employees have equal rights with the other members of the community.

Third. Call a mass meeting of the citizens to coordinate public sentiment against the strike and to strengthen the power of the citizens committee, which organization, thus supported, will both aid the employer in exerting pressure upon the local authorities and itself sponsor vigilante activities.

Fourth. Bring about the formation of a large armed police force to intimidate the strikers and to exert a psychological effect upon the citizens. This force is built up by utilizing local police, State police if the governor cooperates, vigilantes, and special deputies, the deputies being chosen if possible from other neighborhoods, so that there will be no personal relationships to induce sympathy for the strikers. Coach the deputies and vigilantes on the law of unlawful assembly, inciting to riot, disorderly conduct, etc., so that, unhampered by any thought that the strikers may also possess some rights, they will be ready and anxious to use their newly acquired authority to the limit.

Fifth. And perhaps most important, heighten the demoralizing effect of the above measures—all designed to convince the strikers that their cause is hopeless—by a back-to-work movement, operated by a puppet association of so-called loyal employees secretly organized by the employer. Have this association wage a publicity campaign in its own name and coordinate such campaign with the work of the "missionaries" circulating among the strikers and visiting their homes. This back-to-work movement has these results: It causes the public to believe that the strikers are in the minority and that most of the employees desire to return to work, thereby winning sympathy for the employer and an endorsement of his activities to such an extent that the public is willing to pay the huge costs, direct and indirect, resulting from the heavy forces of police. This back-to-work movement also enables the employer, when the plant is later opened, to operate it with strikebreakers if necessary and to continue to refuse to bargain collectively with the strikers. In addition, the back-to-work movement permits the employer to keep a constant check on the strength of the union through the number of applications received from employees ready to break ranks and return to work, such number being kept secret from the public and the other employees, so that the doubts and fears created by such secrecy will in turn induce still others to make applications.

Sixth. When a sufficient number of applications are on hand, fix a date for an opening of the plant through the device of having such opening requested by the back-to-work association. Together with the citizens' committee, prepare for such opening by making provision for a peak army of police by roping off the areas surrounding the plant, by securing arms and ammunition, etc. The purpose of the opening of the plant is threefold: To see if enough employees are ready to return to work; to induce still others to return as a result of the demoralizing effect produced by the opening of the plant and the return of some of their number; and lastly, even if the maneuver fails to induce a sufficient number of persons to return, to persuade the public through pictures and news releases that the opening was nevertheless successful.

Seventh. Stage the opening, theatrically throwing open the gates at the propitious moment and having the employees march into the plant grounds in a massed group protected by squads of armed police, so as to give to the opening a dramatic and exaggerated quality and thus heighten its demoralizing effect. Along with the opening provide a spectacle—speeches, flag raising, and praises for the employees, citizens, and local authorities, so that, their vanity touched, they will feel responsible for the continued success of the scheme and will increase their efforts to induce additional employees to return to work.

Eighth. Capitalize on the demoralization of the strikers by continuing the show of police force and the pressure of the citizens committee, both to insure that those employees who have returned will continue at work and to force the remaining strikers to capitulate. If necessary, turn the locality into a warlike camp through the declaration of a state of emergency tantamount to martial law and barricade it from the outside world so that nothing may interfere with the successful conclusion of the formula, thereby driving home to the union leaders the futility of further efforts to hold their ranks intact.

Ninth. Close the publicity barrage, which day by day during the entire period has increased the demoralization worked by all of these measures, on the theme that the plant is in full operation and that the strikers were merely a minority attempting to interfere with the right to work, thus inducing the public to place a moral stamp of approval upon the above measures. With this, the campaign is over—the employer has broken the strike.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleagues in paying tribute to our deceased friend and former colleague, Robert Fay Rockwell. I served with Bob on the Public Lands Committee when he was chairman of the Subcommittee on Irrigation and Reclamation, and have known him ever since he became a Member of Congress. I always considered him one of the finest men I ever knew. Often I commented to him that he was appropriately named, in that the "rock" in his name signified his stability. It was indeed a shock to me to hear of his passing.

The Lack of Humanity and the Inordinate Greed of Certain Omaha Doctors

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, there was a time in our land when the American medical profession was regarded highly by everyone. That time was when people could call a doctor and he would respond with the same alacrity with which a clergyman would go to the bedside of the sick or dying. That day, however, has passed as far as many present-day members of the medical profession are concerned. In fact, to these men, medicine is no longer a profession, but a cruel, greedy, money-making racket.

One can visit most any community in this country and see a beautiful house being erected and upon inquiry he is told that that house is to be the future home of the successful money-making doctor. If he chances to see a beautiful and expensive automobile upon the streets and asks a passer-by who is the owner of that automobile he will most probably be told that it is the automobile of one of the successful money-making doctors. If he sees a convertible automobile speeding down the street and inquires who is the owner of same, he most probably will be told that it belongs to the successful money-making doctor's son or daughter. If he chances to see a town car decked out in the most attractive, stunning pastel shade and is curious to know the ownership thereof, he will probably be told that that car belongs to the successful money-making doctor's wife.

In calling attention to these matters I do not do so in an envious way, but merely to direct attention to the fact that many present-day medical men are not known for their charity or personal goodness, or great medical skill, but are known only because of the display of wealth which they make and the feverish energy with which they pursue and gather in the dollar and pile up that wealth of this world which the Nazarene and his Apostles so roundly despised.

I sometimes wonder what has brought about this from Dr. Jekyll to Mr. Hyde change in medical men.

We read about the New Hampshire doctor who was charged with a mercy killing, about a midwestern doctor who was a woman killing abortionist, about a western doctor who was a kidnaper and extortionist, and about all the other public offenses which are laid at the doors of some medical men. We ask ourselves what is happening to doctors as a class. We try to find the answer and learn that the teachings which they received in the medical schools were not that which is most conducive to the training of people who will occupy eventually a place in the second highest profession known in the world—the profession of medicine which is next to the ministry.

We learn that no one could become a medical student for some few years last past unless he was a quiz kid. He must excel in the subjects required for premedical training. Class leaders are the only ones who are eligible now in medical schools. Of course when scholastic standing is the sole and only test, it is almost certain that various types of perverts will be admitted into the medical schools because great knowledge and great ability to learn without moral guidance, moral balance, moral training, and healthy bodies is the very spawning grounds for perversion. Instead of requiring that a man have the proper training of the mind and heart, medical schools today require proper training of the mind only. Instead of selecting good mechanics and wholesome people with a heart, they welcome with open arms the wan, slight, cold-eyed quiz-kid type with all of their strange ideas, cruelties, and tendencies to be unnatural.

Many splendid Omaha doctors would never have been doctors at all if the present-day standards for admission to medical colleges had been in force. Many of the old-time doctors were persons who did hard work, others were excellent mechanics, and still others, though they did not excel in scholarship, possessed that which enabled them to become real doctors in the truest sense of the word.

Something must be done to keep the quiz kids out of the medical profession. Something must be done to remove the liars from the medical profession. Something must be done to remove the trickster from the medical profession. Something must be done to remove the greedy, selfish money makers from the medical profession. Something must be done to clean up the whole sordid present-day medical mess. It is sad to reflect that some doctors have become so deaf to the call of their country by reason of greed and selfishness that Congress had to draft them into the military services for the first time in this Nation's history.

I want to give you a few samples of what some Nebraska doctors have done to debase their profession and to lose the respect of many decent thinking people.

The first instance I want to call your attention to concerns a very prominent woman who was on her way to Lincoln, Nebr., by automobile and had a heart attack. The driver of the automobile stopped at the first town he reached after she had suffered this heart attack and brought this stricken woman to the home of the leading doctor, arriving there at about noon. The patient was admitted into the doctor's house and was seated in the living room and was noticeably suffering a great deal of discomfort and pain. The doctor was eating his noonday meal in an adjoining room, and refused to leave the table until he had finished his meal, consequently this woman received no treatment whatsoever until the doctor had satisfied the craving of the inner man. No appeal to this doctor was heeded by him. He sternly announced, "Wait until I finish eating."

The second instance was that of a man who worked as a meat cutter in South Omaha, Nebr. His wife became ill and was taken to a local hospital. Inquiry was made by the doctors and the hospital as to the husband's financial standing. They were told that he had about $4,000 in the bank. The wife was treated for a period of time, during which time the $4,000 was drained away from him and then the wife was brought back home, not better but much worse because of the treatment she received. The interest of the doctor and the hospital ceased when the money ran out. Now this man with his life savings taken away from him by the doctors and the hospital can struggle along the best he can until death claims his spouse.

The third instance relates to a neighbor of mine. For 27 years he carried on a barbering business in the neighborhood, and for almost the same length of time his wife operated a beauty parlor in the rear of the barber shop. This couple lived very frugally and became the owners of a nice brick home in a plain but excellent residential section—they had it finely furnished, they had a new automobile, they had the most up-to-date equipment in their barber shop and beauty parlor, they had money in the bank and bonds. One day this man realized that he was not feeling very well. He went to a big-shot doctor, who later was connected with the so-called Healing Arts Committee. After making a financial disclosure he was taken to a local hospital. He passed through the hands of about seven or eight specialists. He was given X-ray treatments and otherwise treated for a period of several months. All of the cash in the bank was paid to the doctors and to the hospital, and all of the bonds were sold and the proceeds paid to the doctors and to the hospital; the home was sold and the money was paid to the doctors and to the hospital. In fact, practically everything these people had except their barber shop and beauty parlor was disposed of and channeled into the coffers of the doctors and the hospital. Finally there was no more money left. Then this man was loaded into an ambulance and was deposited in a room in the rear of the barber shop, where he remained for a couple of weeks and then was returned to the hospital for a few days prior to his death. His doctor complimented the wife of this man for the promptness in which she paid every bill, and when there was no more money left he and a doctor cohort threw off about $300 from the remaining bills—thus manifesting for the first time any spirit of generosity or decency. This man was buried and his wife is now struggling on to make a living, starting again almost from scratch. Is it not a pitiful thing to think that doctors and hospitals could wipe out 27 years of savings of a husband and wife in less than 7 months' time? These doctors claimed that this man had a cancer. They did not seem to know that nature oftentimes throws a wall of tissue around a tumorous cancer and entirely isolates the cancer. They gave this man deep X-ray treatments in an intense way and cooked the tissue which had the cancer contained and permitted it to spread throughout his entire body.

I would certainly like to sue these doctors, because they took this money practically by duress. Most anyone would give everything they possessed to save a loved one and these doctors knew that only too well.

I sometimes think that some doctors are worse than some undertakers I have known in my lifetime who excelled in bleeding the last dollar out of bereaved relatives on the pretense that a fine burial was the last thing they could do for the dead.

The fourth incident which I shall direct your attention to is a happening which occurred to a remote neighbor of mine. Their young child had convulsions. A neighborhood doctor was called who was a child specialist and he refused to treat this child or even view it in the home. He insisted the child be taken to a hospital and a short time after this refusal on the part of the doctor, the child died.

These instances are not isolated ones. There are many more similar occurrences which could be called to your attention. You all know how heartless a great number of the present-day doctors are. A radio entertainer made the statement that you could not go to some doctors with a splinter in your finger and have him do anything for you unless you first hit the sheets in a hospital. The doctors seem to be in league with the hospitals and channel all of their patients, who show any ability to pay, into the hospitals. They refuse to make house calls any more and you are fortunate if they even send a beginner. The hospitals pack sick people in wards in violation of all health regulations and charge handsome prices for a bed in a place where other reeking, sick people are confined. Hospital rooms in some instances cost as much as $30 and $50 a day. I wonder if it is not about time for the people to organize into groups and refuse to leave their more pleasant homes and go to a hospital room or ward to be neglected just to please a doctor and make it easy for him to call on all of his patients at once.

Many people complain about labor unions being closed organizations but they do not have one thing on the doctors. They will not permit sufficient numbers of students to receive medical education because that would lessen their incomes.

I believe that the corrupting of the doctors was brought about by insurance companies who write compensation and liability and other insurance policies.

They certainly taught the doctors how to lie both in and out of court.

I have had doctors take the witness stand and testify that a man's injury really helped him because he needed rest and the fact that he got rest would prolong his life, therefore the injury he received was a blessing in disguise.

A partial solution of this grave medical situation, of course, would be to train and graduate more doctors of not the quiz-kid type but the normal—the human type. This will not cure the present-day conditions, however.

I feel that the tax authorities of this Government should go through the books of these successful doctors with a fine-toothed comb, and I am sure if they would do so that they would catch them cheating on their income-tax returns. If that situation was discovered the doctors should be prosecuted and sent to prison, not merely penalized in money. All doctors who commit perjury should be prosecuted. In fact, there is a crying need today for bigger and better doctors in all penitentiaries.

In conclusion I want to call attention to a newspaper release which appeared recently in the press which tells a sad story:

MEDICAL PEARL HARBOR

The Committee for the Nation's Health claims the American Medical Association has opened the way to a "future medical Pearl Harbor" by opposing Federal aid to medical schools. It is said AMA's recent stand in favor of private, rather than Federal support for medical schools is a conscience sop for AMA's obstructionist tactics—a high pressure publicity gesture to drown out the almost unanimous demand for immediate * * * passage of the medical education bill.

Housing for Eskimo Families

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD O. LOVRE
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. LOVRE. Mr. Speaker, every day I receive letters from people in my district demanding constructive action in connection with the war in Korea. People recognize that we have a tough struggle ahead and that down the road to the future lie many obstacles.

They realize that if this Nation is to survive there will be blood and sweat and tears. They are ready for sacrifice—every American. Every American I know is ready and willing to do his share, to lower his standard of living, to sacrifice luxuries if it will help to stem the tide of Communist aggression.

Mr. Speaker, while people are demanding forthright action by their Government and while they are asking that their Government take a realistic view of the dangers which confront us, we find that the Government in some instances is completely oblivious to realism.

Mr. Speaker, one of the most asinine things I have run across is a press release from the Housing and Home Finance Agency, dated December 2, 1950.

Mr. Speaker, this press release reveals that while there is a call for mobilization, while stringent controls are being applied on building construction and all forms of activity close to the American people we have one agency proudly announcing a new program for housing Eskimoes. I have often been critical of the administration and of the numerous Federal employees whom I felt were contributing little to the welfare of the country—doing nothing in some cases but living at the public trough. Perhaps some officials might still condone such ridiculous goings-on. But today we are in a war, mind you, that may well determine whether we ourselves are to have roofs over our heads.

Mr. Speaker, this is another example of the Government calling upon the people for sacrifice but, by its own actions, showing that it, itself, is unwilling to sacrifice. It continues to employ hundreds—perhaps thousands—of employees and spend thousands of dollars to look into the housing conditions of Eskimoes, a condition that has existed for thousands of years and a condition which I will wager the Eskimoes are perfectly willing to continue for I can't imagine an Eskimo being any more happy about bureaucratic interference with his housing and home problems than most Americans.

Mr. Speaker, I do not have anything against the Eskimoes but I note that while we here in this country are being called upon to accept less of certain strategic materials, the Eskimo who conforms to bureaucratic edict can get corrugated aluminum roofing for his house. This at a time when we desperately need critical materials in the war effort.

Mr. Speaker, I can only scratch my head in wonder at the antics of the administration. In the hope that some of the other Members can help me out of this fix, I ask that the full text of the following press release be included in my remarks:

HOUSING AND HOME FINANCE AGENCY,
OFFICE OF THE ADMINISTRATOR,
December 2, 1950.

BETTER HOUSING FOR ESKIMO FAMILIES

Many Eskimo families in isolated and more primitive sections of Alaska are now living for the first time in warm and sanitary homes. These homes are made possible under the remote dwelling program conducted by the Alaska Housing Authority with the sponsorship of the Housing and Home Finance Agency under special provisions of the Alaska Housing Act.

Under this program an Eskimo can obtain a loan not to exceed $500 for construction or improvement of his home. Out of the proceeds of the loan, FHA supplies the materials required. The borrower may receive material enough to construct a 14- by 17-foot dwelling, using 2- by 4-inch lumber for rafters and joists and 1- by 6-inch tongue and grooved lumber for floors, siding, and sheathing. Aluminum corrugated roofing is placed over the ceiling sheathing. Asphalt-treated insulation 1 inch thick is used under the flooring and on the inside of walls and ceiling. Each dwelling has two windows, 36 by 30 inches in size. This type of construction provides a dry home much easier to keep warm and sanitary than the original dwelling which usually has only a frequently damp dirt floor.

Further Sinister Activities of the Omaha Doctors During the Past Congressional Campaign

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, the Omaha doctors, combined with the alleged Healing Arts Committee to Combat Socialism and Communism, put out a green-colored dodger upon one side of which was published an article which I had placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on March 13, 1950, entitled "More About This Socialized-Medicine Scare."

On one half of the opposite side of this dodger is a cartoon picture which is labeled "O'SULLIVAN," and I am purported to have said, "Hey, Doc, you're an evil old man." Then there appears the following:

They say that our national health insurance plan is socialized medicine, like the British plan is, when that is as false as most any old doctor's United States income-tax returns, and the hypocrite doctor knows it full well.—O'SULLIVAN.

Of course, it's hard to believe. But read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD yourself. To the doctors, dentists, and others who are trained in the healing arts: Every doctor, dentist, nurse, and assistant interested in preserving the high standards and ethics of the medical profession should read this amazing speech made by the Second District Congressman. It seems incredible that any public servant in America would be guilty of such irrational thinking. To spread such a tirade in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD discredits the people of Nebraska.

Sincerely,
Robert Schrock, M. C. Howard, J. B. Christensen, E. J. Kirk, Warren Thompson, Ralph Luikart, E. C. Sage, Wm. L. Shearer, Herbert H. Davis, Edwin Davis, James Wm. Martin, James J. O'Neil, E. L. McQuiddy, W. L. Sucha.

(Published by the Nebraska Committee to Combat Socialism and Communism, Art Renstrom, chairman; John Eckert, secretary-treasurer.)

On the remaining half of this page appears the following reading matter, some of which was stressed by large type:

If you believe that socialized medicine is wrong, then you should get your assistant to work, your wife to work, your friends to work, and yourself to work to elect HOWARD BUFFETT to Congress. BUFFETT knows that the American people are the healthiest people in the world. He knows this because of the ability and character of the thousands of men and women who have devoted themselves to a lifetime of service to humanity through the medical professions. Prevent the spread of communism and socialism by electing men who have a proven record against these evils.

This throw-away sheet was given wide distribution throughout the congressional district.

In all statements which were sent out, approximately one-half of the Omaha doctors who opposed me by claiming that I was for socialized medicine, the following printed material was inserted:

To My Patients:

The issue of socialization has been put squarely before the people of our country. Legislation seeking to socialize medicine has been introduced in the present Congress and is now being held in committee. The Congressman from this district, Mr. EUGENE O'SULLIVAN, in a speech before Congress on March 13, 1950, took the position that he was in favor of the pending compulsory national health plan, which is socialization of your health.

I am absolutely against it. How do you stand?

You must be registered to vote. October 27 is the last day for registering. Absentee ballots can be had now by calling JAckson 7555, or write to Herman E. Kuppinger, election commissioner, Douglas County Courthouse, today.

The following telegram was sent to all doctors in the Second Congressional District:

Refer to sample letters you have received. Bring sufficient number of letterheads with copy of sample letter to the seventeenth floor, Medical Arts Building. We will return.

HEALING ARTS COMMITTEE,
J. P. REDGWICK, M. D.

The sample letters which the foregoing telegram referred to were as follows:

(Attached are two sample letters suitable for direct mail to your patients. Choose 1 or both and supply us with as much of your letterhead stationery as you would like copies of the letters. We will have it run off on a letterpress, which looks like a typewritten letter. Bring your order to this office and your order will be returned to you promptly.)

MY DEAR PATIENTS: You and I have been friends for some time. I believe that I have served you and yours faithfully and well with sincere understanding, in your hours of need. I would now like to discuss with you, compulsory national health insurance, a subject of vital importance that is of particular concern to you, as well as to me. I do not know, whether or not, you are aware of the scheme called compulsory national insurance (socialized medicine) that the present administration is endeavoring to enact into law at this time.

This scheme would destroy the personal relationship between patient and physician, would make impossible absolute free choice of physician in time of illness, would lower the quality of medical care. I believe that you want to preserve your present relationship with the doctor of your own personal choice, and that you want to continue to enjoy your present high quality personal medical care.

You, personally, will not be given the opportunity to vote for or against this law, but, your Congressman will have the power to vote for or against this proposed "socialized medicine" law. I would like to suggest that you vote for Mr. HOWARD BUFFETT on election day, November 7. Mr. BUFFETT has consistently opposed socialized medicine, compulsory national health insurance, and all forms of state socialism.

This is so important to all of the people of America, and to you, and to me, I ask you as a personal favor to vote on November 7 for Mr. HOWARD BUFFETT for Congress and to urge your family, your friends and acquaintances to vote for him as well. Let us stop the trend toward state socialism in America. The voluntary way is the American way.

With best personal regards and sincere thanks for your cooperation in this most vital important matter.

Sincerely yours.

MY DEAR PATIENT: In this country we have always kept the care of the sick out of politics. We want it to stay that way.

Your doctor's job is to look after your health—not your politics. But when politics may affect your health and the care of the sick, it is your doctor's duty to speak up.

Now a socialized medicine scheme has been put up by the national administration in Washington. They call it compulsory national health insurance. That means that you have to pay for it whether you want it or not.

Whatever name it is called, it leads to the same thing—political control of the doctors, dentists, pharmacists, nurses, hospitals, and everyone else who looks after the sick. It means inferior treatment. Under this scheme the confidential relationship between a doctor and his patient will be a thing of the past. And it means more expense—another compulsory deduction from your pay check, less take-home pay, and more hidden taxes (cigarette tax, etc.).

On election day, November 7, we ask you to vote for HOWARD BUFFETT for Second District Congressman. Mr. BUFFETT is against this scheme. He knows, what all of us know, that politics and medicine don't mix.

Sincerely yours.

The following letter was also sent to every doctor in the Second Congressional District:

NON-PARTISAN DOCTORS COMMITTEE FOR AMERICAN MEDICINE,
Omaha, Nebr.

DEAR DOCTOR: The issue in the congressional election here in district No. 2 is clear-cut so far as medicine is concerned. We are lucky that is so. Now we can carry on the campaign to defeat socialized medicine on clean-cut lines which the people can understand.

Not only is O'SULLIVAN on record for socialized medicine but he is on record against the doctor personally.

Now we doctors have many friends throughout district No. 2 who are ready and willing to help us. But as doctors we must take the lead in this battle. We must be in the very forefront of the fight. We are organized and ready to go into action with a well-defined and hard-hitting campaign.

Whether Republican or Democrat, it is our duty to elect a man to Congress who will vote against socialized medicine. It's as simple as that. On a nonpartisan basis we can and should support BUFFETT, not because he is a Republican but because he is against political medicine.

Many Democrats, including Dr. R. E. Robins, vice president of the AMA and a national Democratic committeeman, believe the President's compulsory program is contrary to the principles that gave birth to the Democratic Party. Florida clearly demonstrated this stand. In their Democratic primary this spring Republicans and Democrats alike "canned" PEPPER, the arch exponent of the welfare state. The people elected SMATHERS, a fearless young Democrat who openly and firmly opposed socialized medicine. Nationally and locally Drs. O'Hearn, Carnazzo, and Howard, all old-time Democrats, publicly expressed their sentiments in this direction.

The most important single mission of the campaigns in Florida, Pennsylvania, and New York was a thoroughgoing letter-writing job, personal letters beamed to the doctor's patients on his own letterhead, over his signature, in his own envelopes. Their blueprint is our model. Make it your program, too.

The members of your medical society speakers bureau, as well as the members in print on this committee, are out on the firing line in this battle. Let's no longer indulge in the safety of inaction and the bliss of inertia. This is the hour for positive action on the part of every practicing physician. Don't plan to do it in the future. The future is now. Do it now.

It is too late now in other countries.

Sincerely,

J. PHIL REDGWICK,
Executive Director.

The following three letters were then sent to all the doctors:

IF YOU WANT TO SAVE YOUR NECK, THIS IS ONE WAY TO HELP

SEPTEMBER 12, 1950.

THE 12 COMMITTEE MEMBERS

St. Joseph's Hospital: L. D. McGuire, W. L. Sucha, Adolph Sachs.

St. Catherine's Hospital: James F. Kelly, George N. Johnson.

Immanuel Hospital: Herbert H. Davis, Julius E. Christensen.

Methodist Hospital: John R. Schenken, Howard B. Hunt.

Clarkson Hospital: Edwin Davis, Warren Thompson.

Doctor's Hospital: Roy Fouts, Joe Swoboda.

DEAR DOCTOR: We are out to beat O'SULLIVAN, in whose published statement doctors are referred to as "evil men."

Our present Representative from the Second District give 100 percent endorsement to the Truman programs, including socialized medicine.

We have selected 12 members of our profession to solicit funds to defeat O'SULLIVAN. You are one of them to work at the hospital specified above. Will you accept, and also donate, as well as solicit? The time is short.

In our solicitation of the physicians of the Second District, we could use a printed statement as follows:

1. Please accept my contribution of $_____ enclosed.

2. I do (do not) desire to have my name added to the roster of the committee.

3. I estimate that I can secure _____ votes for our American cause.

Sincerely yours,

EARL C. SAGE, M. D.

P. S.—The best method is the "personal touch."

P. P. S.—Lutheran Hospital: E. J. Kirk, Allan Hruby.

OMAHA, NEBR., October 11, 1950.

DEAR MEMBER OF THE HEALING ARTS PROFESSION: It was exactly 1 month ago (September 11, 1950) when I was sucked in to raise money to defeat O'SULLIVAN. This was on a Monday.

On Tuesday, September 12, 1950, special-delivery letters went out to 12 physicians asking them if they would help me solicit funds. Hence the name, "Committee of twelve." There was the same number of disciples. Mike Crofoot came back with the best retort: "We have the 12 apostles placed, but are wondering, who is Jesus?"

On Wednesday, September 13, 1950, letters of solicitation went out to the Omaha-Douglas County Medical Society. (Miss Franta tells me there are 358 active, paying members, about 20 honorary members, 35 associate members, and about 10 M. D.'s who will start paying dues on January 1, 1951.) Miss Franta and I stuffed, stamped, and sealed these envelopes. The letter cost $9.

Those letters have brought in funds which go to four digits. You, as yet, have not contributed, so we see no reason to tell you the exact amount. These funds are in the Omaha National Bank and we pay our bills as soon as they are presented.

Friends of ours, not in the medical profession, have given liberally. One Wahoo, Nebr., physician, Mason Lathrop, gave $50. So far, some of our members have given nothing.

Radio time costs $12.50 a minute on some stations, and on others it costs $25 a minute.

How many minutes, hours, and even days do you think some of us are donating to the cause, as well as our cash?

'Nuf said. May we hear from you?

Please make checks payable to Earl C. Sage, chairman, 1234 Medical Arts Building, Omaha, Nebr.

Thank you.

EARL C. SAGE, M. D.

NONPARTISAN DOCTORS COMMITTEE

Omaha, Nebr., October 16, 1950.

DEAR DOCTOR: Our letter-writing campaign, which has proven to be the most effective single tool in the Florida campaign to "can" Senator PEPPER, is under way right here in your own district No. 2.

Time is short. These must be in the mail by October 23.

All over Florida was heard this comment: "You know, my doctor wrote me a personal letter asking me to support Mr. SMATHERS." All were impressed with the fact that any doctor would take the time to write a personal letter.

Bring the letter of your choice and your letterhead stationery to the above headquarters at once. We want this response to match your financial response, which is fast approaching 100 percent.

We feel this is the most constructive single thing we will do to elect BUFFETT and thus defeat socialized medicine once and for all, so we can leave the political arena into which we have been dragged by the socializers, and get back to our medical practices.

Sincerely yours,

J. PHIL REDGWICK, M. D.

Of course there was other material distributed by these political cantankerous doctors, but it was more or less repetition of their previous campaign of lies.

One Hundred and Fifty-ninth Anniversary of Bill of Rights, December 15, 1950

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE DOYLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, it is certainly appropriate that we remember that today is the one hundred and fifty-ninth anniversary of the Bill of Rights. Call it a commemoration day, if you wish; call it by any name you wish. It does not alter the importance of our remembering that we as Americans will lose our identity as a freedom-loving people if we ever neglect to exalt the first 10 amendments to our own Constitution. These words, in their own text, speak more eloquently and enduringly than any words I may try to use to speak about them. So my remarks to you, Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, will be relatively brief.

Some have called our Bill of Rights our prayer book.

Just which declaration of the individual and group rights of man is most important in the world's history is still a matter of controversy in the minds and hearts of some people. Some say the Declaration of Independence; some say the Treaty of Paris, ending the Revolutionary War; some say the adoption of the American Constitution itself; some say the pronouncement of the Monroe Doctrine; some say the Emancipation Proclamation by our great Abraham Lincoln; some the war for freedom and democracy, which is believed to still be going on. My own belief is that the first 10 amendments to our own Constitution adopted by the United States of America on December 15, 1791, speak more loudly as the real soul and spirit of our own Constitution. Without the first 10 amendments, the Constitution with the original 7 articles, is largely emphasizing the protection of material things, to wit: the protection of material property.

It was Thomas Jefferson who is said to be the spearhead of that large number of our forefathers who were so shocked by the fact that the Constitution itself as promulgated in 1789, did not include any of the 10 provisions now described as our Bill of Rights.

The relative importance of these ten amendments were described by Thomas Jefferson himself when he declared, "The Bill of Rights is what the people are entitled to against every government."

Today we are in an ideology conflict with conspiracy of communism which is founded upon the rejections of the Divine in the human experience. The spiritual is eliminated and communism is militant against even the thought of God, and the denial of the divine in man's being is emphasized.

Many of our forefathers came to our eastern shores in search of opportunity for freedom of independence and freedom of opportunity to worship God and to manifest the value of the souls of men as they might desire it.

On this day of commemoration and observance of the Bill of Rights, it is well for us to again emphasize with vigilance and vigor that we as American people rededicate our lives and souls, our beings and our property to the proposition that the international conspiracy of aggressive communism against the things of the spirit; against the inspiration of the divine; against the individual dignity and independence of man himself—shall not prevail.

Mr. Speaker, not because you and my colleagues do not have in mind the substance of these ten amendments to our own Constitution, which now constitutes our Bill of Rights, but because it refreshes our minds, our souls, our spirits, and our devotions to the great principles for which we in America stand and for which we as Members of Congress are challenged and committed to legislate—I remind you that the text of this American Bill of Rights, adopted by the First Congress of the United States called to meet in New York City on March 4, 1789, was ratified by the various States and became a part of our beloved Constitution on December 15, 1791. The text follows:

FREEDOM OF RELIGION, SPEECH, AND THE PRESS; RIGHT OF ASSEMBLY AND PETITION

Amendment 1: Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

RIGHT TO KEEP AND BEAR ARMS

Amendment 2: A well regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free state, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed.

QUARTERING OF SOLDIERS

Amendment 3: No soldier shall, in time of peace, be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

REGULATION OF RIGHT OF SEARCH AND SEIZURE

Amendment 4: The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized.

PROTECTION FOR PERSONS AND THEIR PROPERTY

Amendment 5: No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb, nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

RIGHTS OF PERSONS ACCUSED OF CRIME

Amendment 6: In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be conformed of the nature and cause of accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense.

RIGHT OF TRIAL BY JURY IN SUITS AT COMMON LAW

Amendment 7: In suits at common law where the value in controversy shall exceed $20 the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise reexamined in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law.

PROTECTION AGAINST EXCESSIVE BAIL AND PUNISHMENTS

Amendment 8: Excessive bail shall not be required nor excessive fines imposed nor cruel and unusual punishment inflicted.

CONSTITUTION DOES NOT LIST ALL INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS

Amendment 9: The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

POWERS RESERVED TO THE STATES AND THE PEOPLE

Amendment 10: The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

Bill of Rights Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JACOB K. JAVITS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 13, 1950

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, today marks the one hundred and fifty-ninth anniversary of the Bill of Rights commemorating the day in 1791 on which the first 10 amendments to the Constitution were finally adopted. We are still engaged today in the struggle to validate these rights through appropriate legislation, broad public acceptance, and community cooperation. Yet the vitality of the first amendments to the Constitution is best shown by the fact that the struggle for civil rights can be waged fully in modern terms under the provisions of these amendments. There is commended to the Members on this day a rereading of the first 10 amendments of the United States Constitution which are appended, a rereading of the universal Declaration of Human Rights of the United Nations which is also appended, and an interesting analysis on the status of civil rights in the United States contained in a study by the American Civil Liberties Union which has been widely distributed entitled "Fact Sheet for Bill of Rights Day." It shows how much still remains to be done within the framework of our own constitutional democracy on this subject. Its importance is emphasized by the momentous world struggle between us and communism, which is really a struggle for the civil rights, also called the human rights of the individual. The above-mentioned follows:

Amendments: The first 10 amendments were adopted December 15, 1791, and from what is known as the Bill of Rights.

Amendment 1: Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Amendment 2: A well regulated militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms, shall not be infringed.

Amendment 3: No soldier shall, in time of peace be quartered in any house, without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

Amendment 4: The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

Amendment 5: No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

Amendment 6: In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committeed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense.

Amendment 7: In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed $20, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury, shall be otherwise reexamined in any court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law.

Amendment 8: Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

Amendment 9: The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

Amendment 10: The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

UNIVERSAL DECLARATION OF HUMAN RIGHTS
APPROVED BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS PLENARY MEETING ON DECEMBER 10, 1948

PREAMBLE

Whereas recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world;

Whereas disregard and contempt for human rights have resulted in barbarous acts which have outraged the conscience of mankind, and the advent of a world in which human beings shall enjoy freedom of speech and belief and freedom from fear and want has been proclaimed as the highest aspiration of the common people;

Whereas it is essential, if man is not to be compelled to have recourse, as a last resort, to rebellion against tyranny and oppression, that human rights should be protected by the rule of law;

Whereas it is essential to promote the development of friendly relations between nations;

Whereas the peoples of the United Nations have in the Charter reaffirmed their faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person and in the equal rights of men and women and have determined to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom;

Whereas member states have pledged themselves to achieve, in cooperation with the United Nations, the promotion of universal respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms;

Whereas a common understanding of these rights and freedoms is of the greatest importance for the full realization of this pledge: Now therefore

The General Assembly, proclaims this Universal Declaration of Human Rights as a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations, to the end that every individual and every organ of society, keeping this declaration constantly in mind, shall strive by teaching and education to promote respect for these rights and freedoms and by progressive measures, national and international, to secure their universal and effective recognition and observance, both among the peoples of member states themselves and among the peoples of territories under their jurisdiction.

Article 1

All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed with reason and conscience and should act toward one another in a spirit of brotherhood.

Article 2

Everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this declaration, without distinction of any kind, such as race, color, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth, or other status.

Furthermore, no distinction shall be made on the basis of the political, jurisdictional, or international status of the country or territory to which a person belongs, whether it be independent, trust, non-self-governing, or under any other limitation of sovereignty.

Article 3

Everyone has the right to life, liberty, and the security of person.

Article 4

No one shall be held in slavery or servitude; slavery and the slave trade shall be prohibited in all their forms.

Article 5

No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

Article 6

Everyone has the right to recognition everywhere as a person before the law.

Article 7

All are equal before the law and are entitled without any discrimination to equal protection of the law. All are entitled to equal protection against any discrimination in violation of this declaration and against any incitement to such discrimination.

Article 8

Everyone has the right to an effective remedy by the competent national tribunals for acts violating the fundamental rights granted him by the constitution or by law.

Article 9

No one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest, detention, or exile.

Article 10

Everyone is entitled in full equality to a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal, in the determination of his rights and obligations and of any criminal charge against him.

Article 11

1. Everyone charged with a penal offense has the right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law in a public trial at which he has had all the guaranties necessary for his defense.

2. No one shall be held guilty of any penal offense on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a penal offense, under national or international law, at the time when it was committed. Nor shall a heavier penalty be imposed than the one that was applicable at the time the penal offense was committed.

Article 12

No one shall be subjected to arbitrary interference with his privacy, family, home or correspondence, nor to attacks upon his honor and reputation. Everyone has the right to the protection of the law against such interference or attacks.

Article 13

1. Everyone has the right to freedom of movement and residence within the borders of each state.

Rising Prices Eat Up Three Billion Defense Dollars

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DEWEY SHORT
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I submit the following newspaper article by Earl Richert in the Washington Daily News of December 15, 1950:

AND STILL NO CONTROLS—RISING PRICES EAT UP THREE BILLION DEFENSE DOLLARS

(By Earl Richert)

Rising prices since last June 25 have eaten up enough of our defense dollars to—

Outfit and equip 10 infantry divisions.

Buy 300 B–36 bombers, enough for 10 B–36 bomber groups.

Buy 2,250 F–80 jet fighters, enough for 30 jet fighter groups.

Buy enough tanks for 10 armored divisions.

All this could be had at today's prices for $3,000,000,000—and that, by conservative estimate of military sources, is just how much inflation and rising prices have melted away the purchasing power of the defense dollar.

In other words, we would have been able to buy this much more with the money Congress has voted and is now voting had prices been held to their pre-Korea levels.

What the military is now preparing to spend $30,000,000,000 for could have been bought for $27,000,000,000 at pre-Korea prices. (The $30,000,000,000 is a rough estimate of the amount that will be spent for procurement, research, and development, and other items directly affected by rising prices out of the $42,000,000,000 already voted and now being voted by Congress for defense.)

The military, like the individual, has found its dollars constantly melting away in purchasing power as the months go past.

Specific instances were cited this week by Chairman LYNDON JOHNSON, Democrat, of Texas, of the Senate preparedness subcommittee.

The money which would have bought 100 miles of field wire before Korea would buy only 85 miles in September and only 78 miles in November.

The money that would buy 10,000 barrels of fuel oil before Korea would buy only 4,700 barrels in November.

The money that would have bought 1,000 truck tires before Korea would buy only 830 in September and 720 in November.

The money that would have bought 10,000 pairs of khaki trousers before Korea would buy only 7,600 in November. Money which would have bought 10,000 pairs of wool socks before Korea would buy only 8,500 in October, and even fewer today.

OTHER EXAMPLES

The military can buy only 690 pairs of surgical gloves now with the money that would have purchased 1,000 pairs before Korea; and only 72 space heaters for Navy barracks with the money that would have bought 100 before Korea.

Take an expensive item—about $50,000 apiece—like height finders for the Air Force. The money that would have bought 10 of these before Korea now will buy only 7. And the money which would have bought about 1,000 yards of jute burlap before Korea now will buy only little more than half that amount.

Over-all, wholesale prices—the level at which the military buys in most instances—have gone up nearly 10 percent since the Korean war began. But, as Senator JOHNSON's examples showed, the prices of scores of items affecting goods which the military must buy have gone up much more.

COMPARISON

Following is a list comparing prices of some defense materials as they stood in June, when some leaders such as Bernard M. Baruch called for price controls, and on December 13:

Commodity	June 23 price	Dec. 13 price	Percent increase
Lead, per pound	$0.11½	$0.17	48
Rubber, per pound	.282	.66½	133
Tin, per pound	.764	1.39	83
Copper, per pound	.224	.224	8.9
Zinc, per pound	.157	.182	16
Wool tops, per pound	2.00	3.35	67½
Steel scrap, per ton	37.50	42.50	13
(At Chicago)
Cotton, per pound	.338	.419	24
Rosin, per 100 pounds	4.85	8.50	71
Hides, per pound	.258	.378	46
Shellac, per pound	.35	.465	33

America's Shame

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. H. R. GROSS
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, the following editorial from the Waterloo (Iowa) Daily Courier needs no comment on my part except to extend my compliments to the editor for having the courage to put into print some of the things that need to be said:

AMERICA'S SHAME

It is with a feeling of deep depression and shame that the American people discover the true nature of the man who holds the post of Chief Executive in these desperate times.

He is a man without sense of dignity or restraint as a result of the high office he holds. He publicly uses the cheap invective of back alleys to give vent to momentary anger over what he considers a slight to his family or himself. American politics has had its lurid moments in the past; but never has a Chief Executive sunk so low in public utterances or revealed so petty and vindictive a character.

How can the public at home have confidence in a man who calls a columnist an s. o. b., who declares that the Marine Corps—with men dying in Korea—has a propaganda machine comparable to Stalin's and who threatens to punch a music critic in the nose because of unfavorable comments on his daughter's singing? In his latest outburst, the President spoke of the music critic's "lousy" review, asserted that the critic would need a new nose if he (Truman) met him and declared that "Westbrook Pegler, a guttersnipe, is a gentleman compared to you." That is the President of the United States speaking.

These are no momentary outbursts of petulance resulting from a sudden lapse of temper since they have not been retracted except in the criticism of the marines. They show a man contemptuous of the rules of decent courtesy and careless of the responsibilities of his office.

May God give him strength to rise to the level of statesmanship required in these perilous times.

The Hour Is at Hand

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. VICTOR WICKERSHAM
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, and to include a radio broadcast made by me on the morning of December 15, 1950, in advance of the President's speech. The broadcast follows:

THE HOUR IS AT HAND

One hundred and seventy years ago, this new Nation in a new land became the heir and the hope of mankind's oldest dream: The dream of freedom—that was the United States of America.

Eight generations of Americans have been the faithful and successful guardians of that dream. Now, in this year 1950, it has become clear that our generation shall have to determine whether this dream can survive.

Ours is a struggle between freedom as against Communist slavery.

Red fascism and communism are birds of a feather and the twin enemies of our America.

We must continue to prosecute Communists who advocate the overthrow of our country by force, and convict them as we have done with the 12 in New York.

There must be no thought of appeasement or of rewarding aggression.

No one here in Washington of responsibility in the Government, in the Congress, or in either Republican or Democratic Party has the slightest desire to appease Communist China. And no one in any of these categories here ever did want to appease Communist China or has the slightest thought of taking any steps which would properly be subject to the label of appeasement. It isn't news to say that President Truman and Prime Minister Attlee have ruled appeasement out of their consideration. It was never in their considerations.

It has been proven time and again that appeasement doesn't pay. It did not prevent World War II. It cannot stop future wars. Our only honorable and practical course is to demonstrate anew that we shall not be the victims of intimidation, that we intend to stand for the right and to follow a resolute course.

We must not allow the Soviet Union to dictate our military policy. Let's run our own policy. Let's not have a crisis military policy. Let's have a stable, long-range policy that can ride over periodic crises without all this commotion and disturbance.

The Godless Russian Red hordes know no laws and have no restrictions.

Let us remember that the United Nations forces were sent into Korea on the authority and at the recommendation of the United Nations.

The United Nations forces have the advantage of superior air power and naval support, but on the ground they are confronted by a heavy numerical superiority.

The Russians are the biggest bluffers in the world. They will try and have tried to steal us blind at the conference tables. Personally, I don't think they have the atom bomb in a stage advanced sufficient to make use of it. We must seize the initiative and force issues. First of all, by total mobilization of the Army, Navy, Air Force, the Marines, and industry on the assumption that there will be war in 4 years. Just as soon as we are strong enough we should demand outlawing of war. If Russia rejects the proposal, as she did with the atomic bomb, we make it crystal clear that we will take retaliatory measures against aggression and violation of agreement.

Ever since the Bolshevik revolution of 1918, the Soviet Union has been an armed camp. The population has had periodic purges, regimentation, campaigns of terror, and oppression, costing untold millions of Russian lives. If we could get their people to revolt from within the Reds might be overthrown.

Stalin has proved that he intends to conquer the world, that he will use whatever means are at hand to do it, that he will use war whenever that is the most expedient course.

The United States and United Nations have stated that they will resist his attempts, that they will stand by the principles of the United Nations and fight aggression.

Unless either of these powerful forces surrender their intentions, world war III is inevitable. It is bound to come. We must face this fact.

Stalin and his satellites are at war with United Nations. In spirit, they are not, and never have been, part of United Nations. The United Nations will never succeed as long as they remain in it.

Their tactics prove that they are using the world organization only to subvert the purpose for which it was formed.

When German and Japanese armies surrendered in late 1945, there was an immediate and irresistible demand in the United States for immediate demobilization of the victorious armies. In 1946, most of the great American war machine was taken apart and discarded.

Incidentally, I was not a Member of Congress in 1946 and 1947 which were the 2 years the Republicans were in absolute control.

It was during this same year 1946 that Soviet Russia quickly disclosed its acquisitive and imperialist inclinations.

If the United States had maintained its armed strength intact, then the United States would have been in a physical position to contest the initial advances. But the United States had not maintained its physical position intact. On the contrary, the United States had become less potent.

The administration wanted to resist Soviet imperialism sooner and more vigorously than it did. But Republican power politics prevented it.

As soon as the chaos of demobilization had given way to some minimum reforming of the United States Armed Forces, the United States did begin to resist Soviet imperialism.

President Truman and Prime Minister Attlee have reviewed together the outstanding problems facing our two countries in international affairs. The objectives of our two nations in foreign policy are the same: "To maintain world peace and respect for the rights and interests of all peoples, to promote strength and confidence among the freedom-loving countries of the world, to eliminate the causes of fear, want, and discontent, and to advance the democratic way of life."

The President has stated: "For our part, we are ready, as we have always been, to seek an end to the hostilities by means of negotiation."

We recognize that adequate defense forces are essential if war is to be prevented.

The President, after conferring with the Big Four Democratic leaders in Congress, indicated a state of national emergency should be declared.

Many months ago on the floor of the House, I recommended all out mobilization and overall controls, retroactive to May 15, 1950.

Furthermore, as each National Guard unit is mobilized, we should have immediate replacements and training units at all times; likewise, as Reserve units are called, we should have further replacements of each individual and group in order to maintain a full Reserve.

During the duration of this emergency prices have increased greatly. There is one group that needs immediate attention, and that is the aged. These deserving old people should be paid at least $20 more monthly from the Federal Treasury, otherwise they will suffer unduly for the lack of food, clothing, shelter, medicine, and the necessities of life. This should continue until the emergency is over, or until prices decline, or until a more adequate, direct Federal old-age pension system is inaugurated.

The first thought of the Congress, the Government, and the first thought in every man's mind must be the defense of the country. The President and the Joint Chiefs of Staff have recommended that we should have Armed Forces of 4,000,000. Congress favors this. As long as Russia is a threat, our preparedness expense will run high. The people will not be lulled into a sense of false security.

You and your neighbors are the strength of your Government, the strength of these United States in every period of crisis. With this calm strength, we can and will overcome the present threat, great as it is, to the peace and security that is our goal.

The President could not have picked a better man to place in charge of the Office of Defense Mobilization than Charles Wilson, of General Electric. He knows how to get the job done.

This is not a war of ideas. That dangerous illusion must be killed. This is primarily a war of bullets, bombs, tanks, guns, planes, and armies.

We should consider former Senator Josh Lee's plan—draft wealth with men.

Congress will likely enact universal military training, as outlined by unanimous vote for Association American University in session, but will likely be compelled to also invoke universal military service because of the international situation at this time.

We should improve selective service, use young men found unfit for active duty in the field service in the Department of Defense for whatever other duties might best contribute to the national interest. We should expand the ROTC in schools and give our young men a training of high moral standards similar to that given at West Point and Annapolis.

Stalin sees Europe weak and divided, apparently ripe for taking by the 165 divisions he controls west of the Urals. However, United States atomic superiority makes him hesitate. We should threaten him with the use of the atom bomb, unless the Red invasions stop. Mao sees Asia falling apart. Its pieces offer rich prizes for his armies of 4,000,000 to 5,000,000 men. Western powers, with less than half a million in the Orient, already are being pushed out by Communists.

On hundreds of occasions I have pointed out the possibility of further aggression. The aggression in Korea is but a plot compared with possible aggression by the Reds in Iraq, Iran, Saudi-Arabia, the island of Bahrein, Alaska, Germany, Japan, and other places.

Western Europe is the great prize of Russian strategy. Here are the shipbuilding facilities, aircraft factories, arsenals, large cities, resources, and manpower for great armies that someday may try to conquer America. These are defended now by only 19 divisions.

Iran and Iraq, which supply most of Western Europe's oil, are wide open to invasion. Stalin wants that oil, as well as the oil in Saudi-Arabia and the island of Bahrein. You will recall that 11 Members of Congress, of which group I was a member, viewed these countries first hand 5 years ago and warned that Russia wanted these rich oil fields.

Tibet is being taken over by Mao. That will give Communists a downhill drive into India, with 325,000,000 people, and into Pakistan.

Korea, if lost, leaves Japan open to attack. United States has 100,000 combat troops in or near Korea; Britain has 85,000 soldiers in or near Korea and Malaya. Communists are pushing them out, or they have been or are being evacuated.

Indochina, if lost, opens way to conquest of Thailand, Burma, Malaya, and Indonesia.

France, with 150,000 soldiers in Indochina, is losing.

Japan, Okinawa, Formosa, and the Philippines form a strong chain which can prevent the spread of Communist aggression beyond the Asiatic mainland. As islands, they can be defended from invasion by a strong fleet, including carrier-based air power. If we breach the chain by giving up one link to the enemy, we have abandoned the means of arresting the spread of Communist aggression.

Military authorities and State Department officials point out that it is absolutely essential that we prevent the Communist aggressors from obtaining control of Formosa. That island was wrested from the Japs by American manpower and American blood. For us to allow it to be turned over to our enemies would be cowardly. We would be breaking faith with those Americans who died fighting in World War II, and those who are now fighting and dying in Korea.

Formosa is but 250 miles from the Philippines and 600 miles from Japan. In World War II, the Japs used Formosa as a base for operations and staged the invasion of the Philippines from there. What the Japs did, the Communists might also do.

On Formosa there are almost 300,000 to 600,000 well-trained Chinese troops who are loyal to the United Nations and friendly to the United States. They are willing to fight and die to prevent the triumph of communism. Defense officials, the President, and Congress should weigh the possibility of using these men.

It will be necessary for Congress to increase defense appropriations and manpower for the armed forces. Yesterday we passed another large supplemental appropriation bill for this purpose.

We must increase our supply of strategic raw materials of which we are short.

Completion of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization plans for Western Europe's defense should be formally announced soon. Then, Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower will be appointed supreme commander, and the United States will speed up the flow of arms to Europe. The United States should and will devote much time and energy in the Pacific to strengthening Japan and the Philippines. The question of rearming Japan and Germany must be carefully weighed and a prompt decision reached.

The rate of construction of freight cars, pipelines, essential defense plants will be speeded up early in 1951, requiring production cutbacks in autos, and many other civilian goods.

Defense orders will grow so rapidly that the Government will take complete control of allocations of steel in a short time.

There will be acute shortages of skilled manpower for production of electronic and other specialized types of military equipment in the first half of 1951.

We will actually need 200,000 machine tools per year. The Munitions Board is readying plans to put back into 100 percent defense work more than 70 percent of 450 industrial reserve plants—those owned by the United States of America but sold under a contract requiring them to convert to defense production in 120-days' notice.

In order for agriculture to properly perform we must be assured of our fair share of steel and other necessary materials, after defense needs have been met. For many months I have been working toward that end, urging officials of the National Production Authority and the Secretary of Agriculture to see that our farmers' needs were met.

More than a year ago, I felt that I foresaw the likelihood of an all-out war, and I recommended at that time on the floor of the House of Representatives to the Agricultural Committee a much greater acreage and production of cotton.

Agriculture will play an important role in any preparedness or defense program. Oklahoma is both an agricultural and oil State, therefore it can and will do more than its part.

We must keep our powder dry, otherwise international disaster will be our reward.

We must take our fleets, submarines and planes out of mothballs and place them in fighting order without delay—We need to expand our jet-plane facilities and speed up our atom-bomb production. A number of Congressmen, including myself, have visited the atom-bomb plants, which has caused us to appreciate the value of same during the present international situation.

This means that military preparation must have No. 1 priority in United States and every free nation. All else is secondary and must be subordinate to it.

The United States Government must face facts. It must tell people that they face another world war and must make complete preparation for it.

It is the only possible hope of preventing world war III (by forcing Stalin to change his plans) or of surviving that war when it finally comes. Half-way measures will not work.

We must establish a Federal civil defense structure to provide means and leadership to coordinate State and local civil-defense measures.

The UN should consider the creation of an international force.

The point 4 program for helping backward nations will be increased, but only if it does not interfere with military aid.

Stalin's Red Russia should be ousted from the United Nations as soon as practicable. The UN today is not a United Nations organization. It is a group of nations whose desire for unity to bring peace, freedom, and justice to the world is frustrated and defeated at every turn by Stalin and his stooges. Every session should open and close with prayer.

Complete economic boycott of Russia and its satellites should be instituted by United States to weaken Communist governments as much as possible, impair their war-making ability, and encourage disaffection from Moscow.

Free nations must start to subvert Stalin Russia. Voice of America should give more hope to the people it reaches. China is the best place to start subversion of Stalin. Just as his conquest of China had great psychological and military effect, his loss of this huge territory would have an equally bad effect—in Asia and all the world.

The Communist regime in China is unpopular. There are wide-scale insurrections. There are well over a million guerrillas in China proper. The free world should take advantage of these conditions and similar conditions in all Communist-controlled nations.

A coalition of all anti-Communist governments, similar to anti-Fascist alliance of World War II, must be formed.

We may need a 90-group Air Force. I voted for a larger Air Force many months ago. We need to enlarge our Navy attack-carrier force to at least 25. We need at least 500 submarines, 40 cruisers, a half dozen more battleships in commission for training purposes, and about 30 light and escort carriers. We need to modernize carrier aviation and make truly modern, flush-deck-type aircraft carriers. We need to increase the size of our Marine force. It takes all the components.

Many Members, like myself, have consistently voted for a full preparedness program at every opportunity.

But there always has been, and still is, a very serious question about the proportion of American energies and resources which can wisely be used to punish aggression by China in a world in which China is the secondary, not the primary, aggressor. If Russia is the real opponent, then it is a matter of elementary strategy that proposed western maneuvers always should be tested against the question: Does this weaken or strengthen the position of the west against the Russians?

It is no longer a question whether we will choose to talk to the Chinese. They have the military whip in hand. It is a question whether they would talk with us or the United Nations. Prospects are negligible that they would. But if by remote chance talks should take place, the American purpose in those talks would be to reserve as much American strength as possible for the continuing struggle with the primary antagonist, Russia, instead of spending it in struggle with a secondary antagonist, China.

We should deplore the present efforts by many snipers to make capital of our country's crisis. A distinction must be made between sober, constructive criticism and partisan advantage seeking.

Everything we do or say today, as individuals or groups, or as political organizations, should be measured by the yardstick of how our words might affect the whole international situation. This does not mean that criticism of our Government or our foreign policy must be suppressed or throttled. But it does mean that there is a new and important obligation upon all of us to exercise the utmost responsibility now that America is operating on a world stage.

It is quite clear since 1945 that Red Russia has attempted to crack the common front of freedom wide open at every opportunity. The Soviet Union has been successful in many instances of cutting off the good will and support of the world's people from America.

As your Representative in Congress I intend to continue to devote my full time to the service of my district, State, and Nation. At no time during my service as your Congressman have I ever had any other interest than that. I realize that many public officials, including myself, have been unduly criticized, but I always try to remember the words of Lincoln, and I quote:

"Duty as seen by Lincoln: 'If I were to try to read, much less answer, all the attacks made on me, this shop might as well be closed for any other business. I do the very best I know how—the very best I can; and I mean to keep doing so until the end. If the end brings me out all right, what is said against me won't amount to anything. If the end brings me out wrong, 10 angels swearing I was right would make no difference.'"

Our national needs are far greater than those of myself or any individual.

We Americans have a national emergency without precedent, which cannot be met by confusion, division, or hysteria, but through a clear and accurate understanding of the danger and of our strength to meet it, and by a sober sense of our individual responsibility.

We can develop the enlightened and inspired unity on which our future as a free people largely depends.

We share a common danger and a common hope with all the free people of the world.

We should decentralize our strategic Government offices and defense plants, moving them away from the larger cities.

The military capabilities of the United States and the United Kingdom should be increased as rapidly as possible. The same is true of other United Nations members. The President has stressed this.

It is absolutely necessary that we prevent materials and items of strategic importance from flowing into the hands of those who might use them against the free world.

The Secretaries of Commerce, Defense, and State have already taken remedial action to see that this be done.

War production should be around the clock—24 hours a day.

America, as a Nation, and you and I, as individual American citizens, must rededicate and reconsecrate our lives at this time.

The need is for steady nerves, for calmness of judgment and firmness of action, and, above all, unity in our determination to preserve our national integrity and our way of life against any attack.

Certainly, we must refuse to listen now to the shrill voices of discontent and disunity from certain radio commentators which always arise in a time of national crisis. Their motives are clear, if you will read their bitter, vindictive, and irresponsible words on the editorial pages and in the columns of some of our metropolitan newspapers, and hear them on the radio, you will know that most Americans loathe their tactics and discount their lies and distortions. But their steady hammering, their constant distortion of truth, their daily repetition of lies, could have the cumulative effect of weakening our Nation and its position in the world. We can combat these vocal saboteurs of unity by seeing that the people know the truth and that they have the opportunity to recognize this campaign of distortions for what it is.

We must spread the burden evenly and absolutely prevent excessive war profiteering.

I have recommended to Congress and suggested to the President, the Secretary of Defense, and the Veterans' Administration that hereafter a straight $10,000 gratuity be paid to the family of a veteran upon his death, in lieu of the insurance. This will reduce paper work, simplify payments, and assure every veteran's family of being cared for. At the present time many do not take out any insurance.

In the circumstances which confront us throughout the world our nations have no other choice but to devote themselves with all vigor to the building up of our defense forces. We shall do this purely as a defensive measure.

Only Congress Can Declare War and Make Treaties

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. LOVRE. Mr. Speaker, I take great pleasure in presenting to this body a transcript of a speech by a former Member. I am speaking of a radio address made on radio station KISD, in Sioux Falls, S. Dak., on December 3, 1950, by former Republican Congressman C. A. Christopherson, of South Dakota.

Mr. Speaker, I have long sought the advice and counsel of Mr. Christopherson. He is a grand gentleman and in South Dakota, he is considered as an elder statesman.

Mr. Christopherson is an astute student of political science and international affairs. Mix in this wealth of knowledge with his good common sense and you can understand why his advice is worth while and worthy of consideration by every American.

Mr. Speaker, I commend the following to the attention of every Member of this body. An important message vital to all of us in these grave times is contained therein.

ONLY CONGRESS CAN DECLARE WAR AND MAKE TREATIES

There is an old saying, among the rural folks, that a rooster "fights best in his own barn yard." Anyone who has lived on a farm has seen the rooster bristle up to strange birds coming into his flock, and fight with courage and determination to destroy or drive the intruder away.

We are now in this Korean war, learning the truth of that saying. The North Koreans are fighting with a vengeance and utter disregard of life, which points to the problem of the stranger who has come in to settle differences. We are learning that to carry on a war 7,000 miles away, is a task more devastating to us than it is to the enemy we are trying to discipline, who is fighting on his own ground.

This Korean war points to a phase of our national procedure which is dangerous, to say the least—a direct violation of our Federal Constitution, which contains the following paragraph, one of the powers granted to Congress, viz: "To declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water."

The framers of our Constitution, profound students of government, possessed the knowledge that in foreign lands high officials and military men had the say of when the nation should go to war. People had no say in this important step. Realizing this, our founding fathers caused to be inserted in our basic law the words I have quoted, placing the power to go to war solely in Congress—the representatives of the people.

This provision of our Constitution has been observed, beginning with the declaration of War of 1812, and since, until this Korean war. Yes, I know they say it was "police action" by the United Nations. Who ordered General MacArthur to send troops pronto from Japan to Korea? Not the United Nations, I am sure. If they did they have more control of us than they have of other members of the UN, in that to all others they sent out word that the North Koreans had invaded South Korea, and a mild request for all to come in and help.

Congress was in session; the matter could have been laid before Congress and had consideration there immediately. But Congress was bypassed and some Washington authority ordered MacArthur to take the steps he did.

I have often, during the summer and fall, as the war and its problems developed for us, pondered what Congress would have done with this foreign potato if President Truman had submitted it to that body. I realize that it is useless to be figuring on that now, but I have some doubt if Congress would have approved of our going in and shouldering the full responsibility, as we have and are doing. Especially so, as not only some of our high officials but Members of Congress had expressed doubts about our attempting to defend Korea. But that body was not given the opportunity to determine this question. All that Congress has been asked about the matter is to appropriate the money with which to meet the extraordinary cost of the war.

The plain unvarnished facts are that we have now been in a costly war in Korea for more than 5 months, without any declaration of war by Congress, notwithstanding the specific provision of the Constitution which I have quoted.

Regardless of what Congress would have done with this if submitted to it, the step taken is a dangerous one to our welfare and security.

For the last 10 years, the practice has arisen whereby the executive branch of our Government finds ways in which to bypass our basic law, thereby setting at naught the provision written therein by our wise and learned founders who sought to safeguard future generations from rule by a "clique of self-centered officers" who may be entrusted with power.

Going to war is the most serious step a people can take; a step that should never be taken until our legislative branch of the Government has had the opportunity to consider and determine whether the exigencies are such as to justify such a drastic and dangerous step. The word "dangerous" is a mild designation, for it has been said that war is the "cancer" upon civilization. With the present destructive instruments of war, that is just what it is; and it is my belief that no nation can engage in a full-scale war 7,000 miles from home and escape the dire consequences of an economic collapse in the homeland. We hear frequent reference from high officials for "maintaining military strength" but nothing about our financial stability. Recently James Byrnes, the well-known statesman of South Carolina, said on this subject, "Our first defense is a solvent American economy." Those are words our officials charged with responsibility should ponder seriously.

In other ways our executive officials are bypassing Congress. Only recently a delegation from France came here seeking aid for France to maintain its colonial rule over the French Indochinese. When they went home they had the promise of $6,000,000,000, if necessary. So far as I know, this was never submitted to Congress. Later that body will be asked to appropriate the money. The question of aid to France is for our participation in a French Indochinese war; definitely one for Congress to determine before any commitment is made. If this practice continues, we will soon have here the centralized government we decry abroad and which we are expending ourselves to suppress. Let us hope the incoming Congress, the Eighty-second, will have heard enough during their vacation on the home front; observed the trend in the recent election, to the extent that it will retrieve its constitutional functions, and display a degree of independence that will say to the White House and other branches of the executive department, that it will not tolerate any further invasion of its field. That commitments of huge sums for foreign purposes will not be approved simply because a promise has been made. That such will only be approved, if meritorious, regardless of commitments made by high officials without authority from Congress. It is time Congress begins to function in its own right; break the White House influence and exercise independence on Capitol Hill.

We are now engaged in a costly war; one which if continued may break us financially. But our officials seem to be sailing along with an utter disregard of consequences. As for instance, President Truman, last winter, before we were in this war, submitted what he termed his point 4 program, which has for its purpose raising the standing of living in all backward nations. That of course may take in the entire world, in that we hold to the belief that no people have the standard of living that we enjoy. Congress very generously appropriated the sum of $34,500,000 to inaugurate this program.

A few days ago the President appointed Mr. Henry G. Bennett, of Oklahoma A. & M. College, to set in motion this program. Now that this costly war is on, would it not seem sensible to forget about this standard of living for people in all other parts of the world and think of our own situation? Who will help raise our standard when we find ourselves in the whirlpool of insolvency, toward which we are, with indifference, floating? Ere long Mr. Bennett will have a staff of helpers numbered in thousands, traveling about the world, telling people in other lands how many bathtubs they must have; how to mix and bake their bread, and so forth. Have we not learned by this time that foreigners do not want our advice nor our standard of living? They are living their life as they want it; have done so for a thousand years or more. All they want of us is our money and, if we are so anxious to get rid of same, the foreigners will be pleased if we will send same to them, minus the advice. They will be happy with that arrangement, but incensed at us for presuming to tell them how to live.

As I have been attempting to keep in touch with the many involvements and complications that are befalling us, I have come to the conclusion we as a people have one pronounced weakness, great as we are. It is this, we never seem big enough or courageous enough to admit a mistake. That is especially true of our officials in charge of our foreign affairs. Perhaps, when our President submitted his point 4 program, it may have seemed to have some merit. But, now with the war, which will absorb every nickel and dime we can spare, it seems prudence would suggest that this is no time to try to expend our dwindling resources in an effort to change the mode of life of some near 2,000,000,000 people; let this point 4 sleep until some more favorable time. But no, having once proposed same it must be carried out regardless of changed conditions. To do otherwise might be construed as a mistake in the first place.

Similar analysis can be applied to the much advertised Marshall plan, which in my opinion has primarily made many foreign people dependent upon us. But whatever may have been the necessity for its inauguration in the first place, that necessity has been overcome by the war and the money we are spending abroad for war supplies at a high price. Foreign people are making money from us on account of the war. This is evidenced by the fact that we are losing in adverse trade balances near a billion and a half dollars, in gold, each year. But no, having proposed this plan, it must go on, regardless of what becomes of us here at home. You will recall that Mr. Paul Hoffman, in what I believe was his last appearance before a congressional committee, on this Marshall-plan help, in response to a question, said, in his opinion it must be continued for an indefinite number of years. He should have added, "Just so long as we are gullible enough to continue to shell out; Europeans will never say quit."

Our foreign involvements are more serious than any before. The Korean war took a surprising adverse turn, pointing to the fact we are fighting on unknown terrain, against forces well organized who resort to tricks and ways unknown to us. We have considered our adversaries stupid; have said so publicly. Time we come down to earth and realize we are fighting forces that if they cannot lick us on the field of action, can exhaust us in manpower as well as economically. Then what shall we have gained; who in all the lands of the world will help Uncle Sam? None, and what is more, many are now chuckling at the predicament we find ourselves in. Better try some sane and level diplomacy; bluff and display of arms do not seem to get us anywhere.

In the meantime, may we all offer fervent prayers for our bewildered, fearless forces, who have been surrounded in an unknown land, by fighters that spring up, in front, rear, and both sides, in numbers they cannot stop. It is a tragic fate that has befallen our soldiers, because of stupidity or lack of knowledge on the part of our swivel-chair leaders.

Address of Hon. William M. Boyle, Jr.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. A. S. J. CARNAHAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an address by the Honorable William M. Boyle, Jr., chairman of the Democratic National Committee, delivered at the national committee dinner in New York City on December 12, 1950:

We are meeting tonight at a serious and solemn hour. At this moment our Armed Forces with the forces of other countries of the United Nations are fighting heroically.

Because the security of our Nation is at stake we do not meet solely as partisan members of a political party. Instead we gather together as Americans to join hands with all other Americans to pray—to work—to fight for the security of our country.

Your meeting in this spirit of patriotism and unity is a tribute to the leader of the Democratic Party, our great President, Harry S. Truman.

He has the courage, determination, and the will to confront the dangerous forces that would seek to destroy us. I know that all patriotic Americans, regardless of political affiliations, will join together to cooperate with him.

The Congress and the President need continuous and outspoken support from all loyal Americans for the steps which must be taken.

The danger to our security has been growing increasingly clear as the enemies of freedom drive relentlessly on.

Thus we gather, not to celebrate, not to achieve political aims, not as representatives of any partisan group, but as Americans who are concerned about the problems which confront our Nation and the world.

I know the feelings with which thousands of families, in every part of the country, have waited for news of their loved ones. They have been fighting to win for us the right to live in security and peace.

I, too, know these feelings.

We must all be worthy of the sacrifices that are being made for us. We are worthy when we stick to our jobs. We are worthy when our farmers, working men and women, in fact, every citizen, puts in the productive energy which has made the United States the greatest Nation in history.

Today, civilization wavers between a better life than we have ever known, or a world of total slavery. As we stand at this crossroad let us realize that the battle for the survival of democracy will not of itself be resolved. This struggle for the world, now being waged, is a contest to the finish, because the triumph of brutal aggression would spell the doom of freedom.

In this battle for life, let's look up with confidence to what we have, and to our capacity for engineering the triumph of good over evil.

Not many decades back the founders of this Nation reached above the rule of tyranny and with divine guidance brought down a segment of that power from above—and gave to man the power to rule himself.

They gave vitality to the thoughts of philosophers and statesmen. They launched democracy—by instituting a government which derived its right from the consent of the governed. In so doing we recognized that man—the individual man—was first, and that the state existed but to protect his rights. We openly acknowledged that man was greater than the state—because the state has no immortal soul.

This is the hour in which we proudly point to our heritage as Americans. Those who pioneered this great Nation were ready and willing to make any sacrifice for the good of the Nation and its people. In the same way, we in our generation must meet whatever demands are made upon us for the sake of our country.

No sacrifice will be too great for patriotic citizens to make for the security of the Nation. When the security of this Nation is at stake, there is no time for partisan politics.

Patriotism must come before politics and before profits.

The hour has passed when men may think in terms of pettiness. Selfishness, envy, and greed must not be a part of the thinking of mankind if we are to save America, preserve our freedom, and give hope to a staggering world.

Now, more than at any time in the past, the need is for steady nerves—for resolute purpose, for calmness of judgment and firmness of action. Above all, we need a single-minded unity in our determination to preserve our national integrity and our way of life against any attack.

Certainly we must refuse to listen now to the shrill voices of discontent and disunity. Those individuals who seek to sow distrust and to divide us should feel the full weight of public condemnation.

I can no longer refrain from plain speaking about the small group whose words are aimed to divide our country in time of peril. I believe the people of this country will rise up in wrath against these narrow selfish men who put partisan advantage ahead of the safety of their country.

While politics in a partisan sense is out—politics in the highest meaning of patriotism and service to mankind should be continued and advanced.

The Democratic Party will hold intact the progress we have made for the benefit of the farmers, workers, business and professional men and women, and for all the people of this country.

The Democratic Party will continue to be the party of the people as it has been since the days of Thomas Jefferson, and as it has advanced under the stirring leadership of Woodrow Wilson, Franklin Roosevelt, and Harry Truman. But, in so doing, the Democratic Party will cooperate with all Americans for the good of the country.

Let no one outside of the United States be misled by the clamor of our election campaigns into thinking that Americans are so divided that they cannot unite for the security of our Nation.

When the votes are counted, both sides, Democrats and Republicans, take their gains and losses in accordance with the will of the majority of the people.

Totalitarian dictators, who make a farce of elections by forcing their subjected people to vote as they are told, find it difficult to understand how free people may vote against a man and yet, when he is elected, support him. These dictators miss the whole point of democracy. They underestimate the hidden wells of strength that feed life and courage to our people.

I believe each of our two great parties has an important part to play in maintaining our free way of life in these times.

That is why I intend to stick to my job as chairman of the Democratic National Committee.

I intend to do the best I can to help make sure that democracy works at home while the free world looks to the United States to help bring victory and peace.

The fundamental issue of the moment, the fight between freedom and Communist slavery, is part of the continuous progress in the government of men. In this fight, our country—by the grace of God—stands a free, prosperous, and strong Nation.

This is an hour in which men with firm convictions renew their belief in the democratic way of life—indeed, in their faith in Almighty God. The faith of our fathers must be found in our hearts, in our minds and souls, as we stand steadfast today in support of our leaders.

As America has no desire for one inch of territory—as we fight to preserve the decency of mankind and the freedom of the world—so, we who are a part of the Democratic Party have no desire for partisan political advantage, as we join hands with loyal Republicans to give to America its greatest strength.

If we will stand as loyal Americans, we can survive the terrific ordeal which faces us. And, when the clouds of the crisis have cleared away, we will continue to have the right and privilege of perpetuating a government which will be the servant of the people. That is made possible by our traditional two-party system.

We realize that no nation ever had greater responsibility for the future of the world. American democracy is the hope of the world. If the light of freedom were to be extinguished here, future generations would know only slavery. Accordingly, as the responsibility of world leadership is ours, let us, Americans, all Americans, go forward with unity of purpose.

Let us not leave to the future a task which we ourselves must face. If we are to accomplish this end it cannot be done by mere feeble words or petty bickering. It cannot be won by indifference. It cannot be achieved by delegating the task to someone else.

It can only be gained by constant, positive, individual action on the part of each of us, working together.

Without this approach we struggle in vain, because the strength of policy, the power of Government itself, is only as strong or as weak as you and I make it.

This year is the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the election of Thomas Jefferson as President of the United States. As Democrats we can take justifiable pride in the fact that he founded the Democratic Party. We can take pride in keeping our party strong and vigorous. We can be proud of the Democratic program for the benefit of all the people of America.

America will win through this period of danger. I pray God that the day will soon come when the blessings of peace and prosperity will be made secure to every person in this land, and when the bountiful production of all the great industries of the world will be fully available for the peaceful advancement of mankind instead of for destruction.

These are our objectives. I ask all Americans to join with us tonight in the spirit of the words of Thomas Jefferson: "Let us unite with one heart and one mind."

Ohio Vote Law Needs Clarification

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

OF

HON. WALTER B. HUBER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. HUBER. Mr. Speaker, it was my extreme privilege to join this august body in a time of great national emergency. And to have shared in the deliberations and decisions which enabled American arms to emerge victorious in World War II has been a matter of great personal satisfaction.

Because it now appears that my service on behalf of the Fourteenth Ohio Congressional District may be temporarily interrupted by the irregularities beclouding a clear-cut decision in that district's 1950 elections, I take occasion today to express my deep regret that such an interruption should occur when this Nation is faced with crisis of even greater urgency.

I express the belief that this cessation of service will be only temporary and of short duration, for the issue has yet to be determined. The election in the Fourteenth Ohio district is under contest. And before a final determination has been made, thorough and exhaustive investigation of the irregularities claimed will have been concluded by two committees of this House.

The contest in my district is based upon patently illegal procedures on the part of several county election boards and the secretary of state of Ohio in ignoring the clear mandate of the Ohio Constitution on the equitable rotation of the names of candidates on an election ballot.

Attention of the House committees was brought to bear on these irregularities because of the contention of the Ohio State Supreme Court that it does not have jurisdiction, even in the face of a clear-cut violation of the State constitution, because the contest relates to the election of a Member of the Congress of the United States.

Studies of several competent and nationally known election analysts show plainly that the positional disadvantage suffered by this contestant had an important bearing on the outcome of voting in the Fourteenth Ohio District.

My confidence that I shall soon return to your midst is based upon the spirit of fair play so dear to the heart of every American and my confidence that the citizens of my district will want to see their representative to this body selected on a fair and equitable basis in accordance with the rules of the game.

I am inserting in the RECORD at this point several newspaper items that explain the illegal rotation of ballots that occurred in the Fourteenth Congressional District:

[From the Cincinnati Enquirer of December 8, 1950]

OHIO VOTE LAW NEEDS CLARIFICATION

(By Clem Thompson)

WASHINGTON.—A strange flaw in the workings of the Massachusetts ballot in Ohio has just been revealed by the defeat of Representative WALTER B. HUBER, Akron Democrat, and his protest of the election. Certainly, as the Akron Beacon-Journal has pointed out, it calls for clarification of procedure by the Ohio Legislature. Worse than that. It appears to this correspondent, after careful study of the figures, that Representative HUBER was defeated and WILLIAM H. AYRES, Republican, was elected only because of the flaw in the use of the ballot.

It arose this way: The new constitutional amendment adopting the Massachusetts ballot for Ohio, provided for rotation of the names of candidates for an office on the ballot. It declared that each should be at the top of this group "substantially an equal number of times."

But suppose you have eight men running for State representatives and three for Congress, as was the case in Summit County. When you print your ballots, how do you rotate the names of each office? They took the matter to Ohio's secretary of state, Charles F. Sweeney.

Mr. Sweeney searched the law and came upon Ohio 4785–80 dealing with primary elections. This provided that the number of ballots to be printed should be divided by the largest number of candidates for any one office and that the quotient would be the number of ballots printed in each series.

Take it this way: Summit County was to use 600 books of ballots. It had eight candidates for State representative. Divide 600 by 8 and your quotient is 75.

That means that on your first series of 75 ballots Candidate A (for State representative) would be at the top of the list for that office. On the next series he would go to the bottom. Candidate B would move up to the top, and so on. Each of the eight would be at the top an equal number of times.

But what about the three running for Congress? Well, every time they stopped the press to change the list for State representative, they also changed the candidates for Congress.

They made eight different press runs on the ballot, as we saw above. But you can't divide three into eight and come out even. So in Summit County one candidate for Congress was at the top three times, another was at the top three times. What difference did that make? You will see.

Lorain County, in the same congressional district, has voting machines. It would have been easy to rotate all candidates evenly. But Lorain followed the same system at Summit. It worked out even worse. Lorain's largest number of candidates for any office was four. Its machines, therefore, were set up in four series—a different candidate for State representative at the top for each series.

Again you cannot divide three into four and come out even. So one candidate for Congress was at the top twice out of every four machines. This was AYRES. Another was there once, Robert G. Brenneman, Independent. The third was also there once, HUBER.

Because Lorain County has voting machines, figures are available there to show how each candidate ran when in each position. Presumably the same effects were felt in the other three counties of the congressional district, where paper ballots were used.

Keep in mind that in the race for Congressman AYRES was at the top 74 times in Lorain County, second 37 times, third 37 times, HUBER was the top 37 times, second 37 times, and third 74 times.

An independent, Robert Brenneman, virtually unknown, was at the top 37 times, second 74 times, third 37 times. We'll ignore him from now on except to point out that when he was at the top he got an average of 31 votes; when he was at the bottom, he got an average of 4. He illustrates that position plainly drew votes.

Strangely, however, both HUBER and AYRES ran better when their names were second on the list than when first. Only third place apparently was costly.

When listed first, AYERS got an average of 148 votes; when second, 156 votes; when third, 92.

HUBER got, when first, 126; when second, 137; first, 73.

Now each of them should have been in each position 49 times. Suppose we shift them about to come out that way. Here, admittedly, we run into speculation. We presume, for instance, that if you take a man out of top position and put him in third, he will then get the vote which he actually averaged when in third position.

At the election AYERS was actually in first position 74 times. To cut him down to 49, we shift him from first to second 12 times and from first to third 12 times.

On a shift, first to second, he gains 8 votes to the precinct or 96. On the shift, first to third, he loses 672. His net loss is 576.

Leave HUBER last 49 times. Shift him to second 12 times. He gains 768 votes. Shift him to first 12 times. He gains another 636 votes. His net gain is 1,404 votes.

AYRES' loss and HUBER's gain, added, total 1,980. HUBER lost the election by 1,921 votes. Presumably, then, if each candidate had been in each place an equal number of times, HUBER would have won by 59 votes.

And that adjustment is for Lorain County alone. Presumably it should be made for the other three counties also.

HUBER protested to Ohio's Secretary of State against certifying the election of AYERS, on grounds the election was illegal because candidates' names did not head the list in substantially an equal number of times. His protest, however, was ignored and AYRES' certificate filed here with the Clerk of the House Monday.

HUBER has said he will protest to the House against the seating of AYERS, a process that requires 7 or 8 months, at least, for adjudication. The last unseating was in a New Hampshire election in 1939, on grounds of error in the count.

Whatever the result of the protest, it seems clear that Ohio had better clarify its law.

[From the Akron Beacon-Journal of November 22, 1950]

BEHIND THE FRONT PAGE

(By Robert H. Stopher and James S. Jackson)

BALLOT

Regardless of the outcome of Representative WALTER B. HUBER's demand for a congressional investigation of the November 7 election in the Fourteenth District, the legislature can be expected to plug a loophole in the State's election laws which HUBER's protest has revealed.

Besides asking the House Committee on Elections to probe the Fourteenth District vote, the Akron Democrat has asked the secretary of state to order another election here and meanwhile to hold up certification of Republican WILLIAM H. AYRES as Congressman-elect.

HUBER's protest is based on the fact that in all four counties in the district his name appeared in the bottom position on the ballot oftener than it was at the top.

Instructions from the secretary of state were followed by boards of elections and ballot printers in all four counties. (An interesting coincidence, by the way, is the fact that the ballots for Summit and Portage Counties were printed by Craftsman Press, a company in which Democratic Chairman Clarence E. Motz has an interest.)

The instructions were based on the section of Ohio law (4785–80) which prescribes the method of rotating candidates' names on the ballot in a primary election. This section says:

"The names of candidates on all such primary ballots shall be printed in rotation. The whole number of ballots to be printed shall be divided by the greatest number of persons whose names have been duly presented for any office and not withdrawn, and the quotient shall be the number of ballots in each series of ballots to be printed as follows:

"The names of candidates shall be arranged in alphabetical order and the first series of ballots printed; then the first name shall be placed last and the next series printed, so shall the process be repeated until each name shall have been printed first.

"The ballots shall then be combined in tablets by collecting one from each series of ballots in regular order, and so repeating, so that no two of the same order of names shall be together."

HOW IT WORKED

In Summit County, the whole number of (books of) ballots to be printed was 600.

The greatest number of persons whose names had been presented for any office was eight—four Republican and four Democratic nominees for State representative.

Six hundred divided by 8 gave a quotient of 75—the number of ballots in each series to be printed.

After 75 (or a multiple of 75) ballots had been printed, the press was stopped and the name of Candidate A for State representative was moved to the bottom of the list. At the same time the name of WILLIAM H. AYRES was moved to the bottom in the Congress list.

After 75 more ballots had been printed, the press again was stopped, Candidate B for State representative was moved to the bottom and at the same time the name of Robert G. Brenneman was moved to the bottom in the Congress list.

This process was repeated until all eight candidates for State representative had had an equal number of turns at the top of the list. But AYRES, who started out at the top of the Congress list, occupied the No. 1 position in three of the eight series—that is, on three-eighths of all the ballots printed.

Brenneman also was at the top through three series, but HUBER, starting out at the bottom, was No. 1 in only two series or on one-fourth of the ballots.

In Portage, Medina, and Lorain Counties—where the trouble was caused by the difficulty in reconciling three congressional candidates with four candidates for State representative—the disadvantage to Huber was greater. In those counties his name was at the top of the list one time out of four, in the middle once, and at the bottom twice. AYRES was at the top twice, in the middle once, and at the bottom once.

CONSTITUTION

The new constitutional amendment providing for the Massachusetts ballot says candidates names shall be rotated so that each appears in every position "substantially an equal number of times."

However, the secretary of state chose to base his instructions to election boards on the more specific statute which governs primary elections.

Whether HUBER wins or loses on his protest, the new legislature is likely to revise the law to prevent future arguments about rotation.

It may be necessary—in order to have names rotated evenly in all contests—to put ballots through the printing press twice, maybe three times. This, a printer estimates, would increase the cost of ballots by at least 25 percent.

NOTE.—A special congressional election—in the event HUBER succeeds in invalidating AYRES' victory—would cost between $60,000 and $70,000.

Official vote count	Summit	Lorain	Portage	Medina (county)

Johnny Moore, Colington, Saw First Flight

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT C. BONNER
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. BONNER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following newspaper article by Aycock Brown:

JOHNNY MOORE, COLINGTON, SAW FIRST FLIGHT

(By Aycock Brown)

The 17-year-old muskrat trapper who just happened to stop by Kill Devil Hill on the morning of December 17, 1903, while returning from the shore of the nearby fresh ponds, was amazed at the story Wilbur Wright told him.

In the Wright brothers' camp was a well-supplied kitchen. In it was a box filled with eggs. Seeing so many eggs put a questioning look on the youth's face. Pointing to a couple of chickens scratching in the sand near the kitchen door, Wilbur reportedly said:

"See that little black hen out there? She lays six eggs every day. That is why we have such a good supply of them."

Then Wilbur returned to a queer-looking object on a single track nearby where his brother Orville was doing some last-minute inspection before they started the engine which started the propellers to spinning. In the meantime, some men from the life-saving station over on the beach had arrived. One of them was standing near a camera which the 17-year-old boy had noticed one of the flying-machine men had set up a few moments previously.

As the engine on the plane increased, one of the men (Orville) climbed aboard and lay flat on his stomach and the engine increased more. There was a man at either end of the machine's wings. A third person cut a line which had the thing anchored and it moved down the one track rail increasing speed as it went. As it neared the end of the rail the thing left the ground and for 12 seconds it was in the air—not very far from the ground, but in the air.

Johnny Moore, that was the 17-year-old boy's name, had seen these same two men on several occasions, especially the previous year, flying their giant kites, some of which he had been told were large enough to haul a person into the air. But on that December morning, 47 years ago come next Sunday, the contraption that Johnny Moore watched with great interest was not a kite, it was a glider with propellers something like the propellers of the new fangled gas boats he had seen. And the thing took off under its own power.

If Johnny Moore was amazed at the story about the hen which laid six eggs daily, he was even more surprised, and so were the shouting men, that the flying machine had taken off under its own power. It was when the little group of men gathered happily together after the first take-off that Johnny Moore is credited with saying, "Danged if she hain't flew."

Today, 47 years later come Sunday, Johnny Moore, only living witness of that first flight, will be a guest of honor at the annual first flight celebration which Maj. Al Williams has arranged for Sunday morning at the great Wright Memorial atop Kill Devil Hill. Later Johnny Moore and his wife, Chloe, who live on nearby Colington Island—will be guests at the annual first flight anniversary banquet in the Carolinian Hotel dining room.

My America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GERALD R. FORD, JR.
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, a column by Harry Boyd, entitled "My America," appears every day in the Greenville (Mich.) Daily News. Mr. Boyd's comments for December 12, in my estimation reflect the views of many citizens throughout the Nation, and for the bentfit of those who have not seen this column and the observations contained therein before, I include it as a part of my remarks:

MY AMERICA

(By Harry Boyd)

Much as it may irritate the tender hides of the Achesons and their chronically outraged champions, I look for the next session of Congress to be the reexaminingest setto that has been staged on Capitol Hill since the boys first voted themselves pensions.

Personally I think a little earnest national introspection will be good for our souls.

The stimulus for it, of course, came out of the November election results.

Analysts with more woman's intuition than I've got have read all sorts of meanings into those results. Some say the voters plumped for a more isolationist foreign policy. Some say they were demanding a more belligerent foreign policy.

For my part, I don't know what the voters were clamoring for. Except one. I have a pretty good idea of what my vote was intended to mean, so far as foreign policy is concerned.

I wasn't insisting that we pull out of the international political melee, I wasn't urgent that we get into it with all 4 feet and raise more of a rumpus.

Mainly I was suggesting that somebody undertake to find out what we're trying to do in there.

After that's cleared up, maybe how we ought to go about doing it will be more obvious than it has been up to date.

I freely grant that the seventh inning is a little late to be pausing to apprise ourselves of the object of the game. But better late than never, I always say.

The seeming inconsistency of the maneuvers of the last year has me punch-drunk. We cuss Stalin, play footsie with Tito, snub Franco, coddle Mao Tse-tung, soft soap Nehru, scold Attlee, and scuttle Chiang.

We break our backs to gain yardage in Europe and we give it away in Asia.

We ship stuff to Korea to shoot at the Reds and ship stuff to Russia for the Reds to shoot at us.

We send foreign nations money to build the set-up they want and reformers to persuade them to want something else.

We blow hot; we blow cold; we blow lukewarm. When otherwise unoccupied, we just blow.

What I'd like to know is what goes on here. Are we embarked on a program of national defense or world evangelism or what?

It makes a difference in how we should dress for it.

I have an uneasy feeling that instead of just trying to get along with other nations without getting hurt we are trying to make them over. And that strikes me as biting off a mighty big piece to chew.

I have misgivings about sending washed-up New Dealers overseas to bribe the Greeks and other nations to go in for new dealism.

I question whether we can put over abroad social reforms we still aren't sure we haven't bungled at home.

And it's debatable whether taking a closer look at all these scattergun enterprises should be called reexamination. The record isn't clear that they were ever examined in the first place.

Let's Put First Things First

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLEVELAND M. BAILEY
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, what our Nation needs most today is national unity—no individual or group of individuals should place personal—or party aggrandizement above national welfare. My thoughts on this matter are best expressed by an editorial under the caption "Let's put first things first," which appeared in the Clarksburg News, Clarksburg, W. Va., editor, Mr. H. G. Rhawn, on December 14, 1950.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the above-mentioned editorial:

LET'S PUT FIRST THINGS FIRST

From the President of the United States right down to Mr. Average Citizen, the time has come, it seems to us, to put first things first. Nothing in the frightful picture of world affairs is quite so disheartening as the lack of unity among our people.

So many people, both among the leaders in government and those in private life, seem to be pulling not only in opposite directions, but in all directions. Our President has caused himself to be lampooned by what are his too human, too outspoken outbursts. His firm conviction and the solemn resolve of all our people to stand unflinchingly against Russian aggression is the issue which comes first. In that aim and objective we must all unite quickly.

Today there are too many discordant, petty, and carping notes, too many who create their own realities out of second-hand knowledge and urge their own course of action. Hurl your war of words at Stalin, not at American leaders. He is the enemy, not Acheson, not Truman, not MacArthur, not McCarthy, not Johnson, not Marshall. Let's back our leaders. That will be putting first things first in a grave crisis.

President Gordon Gray's Inaugural Address

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT C. BONNER
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. BONNER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following inaugural address of President Gordon Gray, of the Consolidated University of North Carolina, which was delivered in the coliseum of North Carolina State College in Raleigh, N. C., at noon Tuesday, October 10, at final exercises of the 3-day program.. Exercises were held Sunday at Woman's College at Greensboro, and Monday at the University at Chapel Hill. The address is as follows:

Unfortunately the management of our Nation and the conduct of our affairs today cannot be dictated by traditional forms and procedures. Some of the easy protections of the past afforded by geography principally are not now with us.

It seems evident that no longer can an institution of learning have truly cloistered halls. Nor can there be any such thing as an isolated village.

The mechanical genius of man has been able so to compress time and shrink space that we find ourselves all world citizens. The inhabitants of the State of North Carolina from Manteo to Murphy might easily, except for the convenience of the Post Office Department, be domiciled with United Nations at Lake Success insofar as the impact of world events on their lives is concerned.

Any meaningful reference to the world at this moment in history must be a reference to what we know as the free world, for, indeed, there are two worlds living physically if not peacefully side by side.

This is the principal fact of life which unhappily must serve as the backdrop for all of our living, planning, hoping, praying.

It is vital that we as North Carolinians and as Americans have an awareness of our national obligations, capacities, and commitments, as well as those on the State and local level. Our country now has by reason of circumstance attained a position of world leadership which expresses itself in military, economic, political, spiritual, and psychological terms. This necessity to assume leadership arises not only out of our great physical and human resources but from the illimitable reserves of our spirit as a people and from our growing democratic institutions and forms and from our own peculiar cultures.

While we recognize that our institutions and cultures have made us great, we do not seek to force them upon any other people of the earth; yet they continue to serve as the basis for courage and determination of the freedom-loving people everywhere.

We must preserve them as the hope of the free world.

We must continue to accept the responsibilities of leadership, which means that we must be strong economically. We must maintain an adequate military posture and assist our friends in building up their military strength in an effort to deter aggression and avoid the immeasurable consequences of a world war III. Our diplomatic leadership must be sound and just and our economic statesmanship enlightened.

We must communicate to the free people of the world and to those who aspire to become free the meaning of the democratic dream; we must make clear that it is our desire that the democratic dream be not just an idea, but a way of life.

This leadership must be firm and yet must be sensible. We should at all times appraise our commitments and assess them against our capabilities, for to overcommit would present the tragedy of weakness born of attempting to share our strength.

Americans and southerners and North Carolinians must understand these things.

For the reason that the world as we know it is divided against itself, it is vital that the elements of the free half of the world move toward the basis of mutual trust and help. We must understand one another, but we must also interpret the meaning of the kind of world in which we find ourselves.

Other generations have faced other threats from totalitarianism of various sorts. The crucial fact of our time is that there are now two worlds—one dominated by communism and the other led by the spirit of freedom.

There should no longer be any question in the minds of any of those who believe in the dignity of the individual and in what we know as freedom that communism is an enemy of both. Indeed, it should be clear to those with open minds that communism is committed to the denial of both, as well as to the extinguishment of religion except where expediency dictates a certain amount of lip service to religion.

Recent events have indicated that, where subversion and infiltration do not promise success in accordance with the Soviet time table, then there will be Soviet encouragement of military aggression. This probability, long suspected and now proven, demonstrates that communism, in its self-generated dynamism, considers that the aim justifies any means.

It should be clear to those who accept as we do the essential dignity of man, the search for truth, freedom of inquiry, and the right to worship, that to encourage communism is to abandon these things and to embrace its dogma. Indeed, believers in truth and freedom and those who have true faith must enlist themselves in the cause of combating communism.

There has been much talk about freedom. Indeed, my own use of the word has been prolific. May I suggest that freedom in its true meaning is the sense of an alternative; the opportunity to make a choice.

This, of course, implies in some cases a right, in some cases a power, in some cases a privilege. But these manifestations of freedom must in every case be accompanied by an obligation, a duty or a responsibility.

The sense of an alternative, therefore, must carry with it the awareness of the consequences of electing the alternative. This is our price for freedom, voluntarily paid.

Communism discourages alternatives. The restraints we know as duties, obligations, and responsibilities are imposed by individuals upon themselves or by the influences of a free society upon its members; in the Communist state they assume the form of force, wielded by the state.

We are in a decisive struggle for the loyalties and hearts of men; a struggle between Stalinism on the one hand, and the forces of kindness and decency and humanity and character on the other.

Because a university in its very nature is committed to preserve what communism would destroy, it would seem that the very weight of its free influences would render impotent any Communists it might unwittingly, or otherwise, be harboring. It would not seem that an individual, or even a small group of them could harm an institution or endanger its reputation, because of counteracting pressures.

But the closed mind will not yield, and the Communist mind is a closed mind. And for the reason that, often, this insidious influence does not manifest itself, the counteracting pressures cannot come into play. The healthful rays of sunlight have little effect upon the underside of an anchored rock.

Frequently academic freedom, which must be preserved at all costs, has been used as a cloak to give a sort of immunity to Communists and their side-car passengers. I cannot believe that firmness toward Communists, prudently exercised, violates the principle of unfettered research, and the pursuit of truth. I cannot believe that any university must reach into the ranks of those who are disloyal to American principles to develop a dedicated, independent faculty.

My own position should be made very clear. We shall not provide asylums for those who would extinguish the lights of liberty. Indeed, Communists are not welcome at any of our three institutions.

We shall not knowingly allow any campus to become a workshop, or laboratory, or training ground for the operations of those who are committed to the destruction of American cultures and institutions.

This having been said, it must be added that in our institutions, as should be the case everywhere, we shall approach the problem sensibly and with restraint. We shall not be governed by hysteria. We shall not persecute the innocent, nor malign the clearly misunderstood. And we shall be convinced beyond a reasonable doubt.

I have perhaps overdwelt on this matter. Communism, to the extent that it does exist in our institutions, is far from being our major concern. Deal with it, we will. But we in the Consolidated University must not become overabsorbed with it.

America Must Not Stumble Into War With Red China

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH P. O'HARA
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Minneapolis Star of November 22, 1950:

AMERICA MUST NOT STUMBLE INTO WAR WITH RED CHINA

Has the American Government—the President, members of his administration, and Members of Congress of both parties—lost its way in world affairs?

Unless the Star's editors completely misunderstand public reaction, this question is torturing the thoughts of most Americans.

Here they stand, at the brink of the most senseless war in all American history—war against an Asiatic people with whom they have no real quarrel—war in which torrents of American blood and mountains of treasure might be spent without the prospect of settling any meaningful issue, much less of gaining anything of tangible value.

In these circumstances, which are nothing short of desperate, the men the country has elected and appointed to guide its affairs twitter in Washington and at Lake Success. Not a single voice sounds a clear "Arouse and beware!" to the Nation.

In the capital, politicians of both parties backbite and rant over old issues, and appear content to let a do-nothing, lame-duck Congress mumble through weeks in which firm and timely decisions might make the difference between life or death to a million young American men.

The President, who a few weeks ago minimized the dangers of his Korean adventure by calling it a police action, whistles nonsense into the wind about enacting a domestic program in which the country, smelling a national disaster in Asia, has lost immediate interest.

At Lake Success, God Save us, the delegations at a United Nations that was to remake the world, huddle and bleat like sheep stalked by wolves as they await the arrival of Chinese emissaries who, presumably, will say what ransom, what tribute America must pay to extricate its young men from a Communist deadfall. As if the initiative to save the situation could come from that direction!

Can anyone point to another hour in the country's history when boldness and imagination were more imperatively required, or when the inspiration for a dramatic stroke of state was so lacking?

What the country needs, lest more and larger mass avards of purple hearts are to be photographed, is a recess from smallmindedness—an adjournment of politicking for the next election—a holiday from recriminations over past blunders.

This Nation must not stumble into an Asiatic war.

For as many days, weeks, or months as it takes to break the stalemate into which American policy has fallen, the country wants all its Government's energies bent to that single purpose.

A Message to the American People

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NORRIS COTTON
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. COTTON. Mr. Speaker, many loyal and patriotic Chinese-Americans in this country have suffered as a result of the aggression of Communist China. Under leave to extend my remarks, I include a statement released today by the Chinese Consolidated Benevolent Association of Washington, D. C.:

A MESSAGE TO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE

We, the members of the Chinese Consolidated Benevolent Association of Washington, comprised of the citizens of Chinese descent and Chinese Nationals in the District of Columbia, deeply feel it is our responsibility in this world crisis to respond with everything at our command to defend the democratic principles that have been uprooted in China. We stand wholeheartedly behind the United States Government and with all the free peoples of the world as they engage the menace of communism.

Since the land from whence we sprang has already been poisoned with despotism of the most autocratic and vicious kind, we know full well the great danger that lies in the thunder clouds that surrounds us all and this kinship with a lost land inspires us to work perhaps a little harder than others to ward off the threat to the liberty of the world.

The Communist despots who have by the force of arms seized control of great areas of China are undertaking a nefarious campaign to mislead the Chinese people into believing that their source of hope is Russia. We in the United States who have the good fortune to experience life under a true democracy can vouch for the sincerity of the United States in its long-standing friendship with and generosity to the Chinese people; we know that China must ultimately look to the United States, as she has in the past, for guidance and assistance to revive national spirit, to regain national honor and to eventually rebuild herself along the democratic principles of free government.

The Communist engine of despotism has placed a gun in the back of many Chinese and compelled them to fight against the forces of the United Nations. We hope and pray that this condition of servility which is as alien to Chinese philosophy as it is to American tradition will be quickly cast off.

We hope that the people of the United States will understand that the Chinese would never take up arms against the United States; they are only coerced to do so at the instigation of the misguided, selfish, and lawless bandits who are steering the plot to sacrifice China to the avarice and idiocy of the international Communist conspiracy. We, who hear the liberty bell ring out hopeful tidings upon the air, have faith in America—faith unswerving and high, faith in the wisdom and the fairness of the American people. No pro-Communist propaganda however skillful and efficient can change our firm belief that the preservation of democracy is worth our every sacrifice.

We pledge our unqualified support and cooperation as Americans first and as people who have a profound knowledge of the real menace of communism and despotism. We make this pledge with a keen sense of humility and with a fervent hope that the American people will understand the peculiar delicacy of our present position.

THE CHINESE CONSOLIDATED BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION OF WASHINGTON,
Rev. C. C. HUNG, Chairman.
WING WONG, Executive Secretary.

Is This Our Last Hour?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BURR P. HARRISON
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include an editorial which appeared in the Washington Evening Star.

This is a forthright expression, and I believe it represents the thinking of a much larger segment of the American people than those charged with the leadership of the people seem ready to admit.

The measures which are being taken in our effort to avert destruction are the uncertain, indecisive steps of leaders moving in a haze of disbelief. There is with us still the refusal to admit that things are as bad as they certainly are; to acknowledge that the forces of communism are on a march which holds for them, at the moment, a real promise of complete victory.

Full mobilization would give us our only chance to confound the Kremlin's plan to crush the United States at the time the Kremlin appoints. I cannot believe that the American people are not ready to make the necessary sacrifices. When shall we emerge from this never-never land of selective controls and wait and see? The Kremlin never had it so good. The editorial from the Evening Star follows:

IS THIS OUR LAST HOUR?

"Is this the hour of our Nation's twilight, the last fading hour of light before an endless night shall envelop us and all the Western World? That is a question which we still have in our power to answer. If we delay longer we can expect nothing but darkness and defeat and desolation. If we answer the challenge with courage and confidence, and with the ability of which we are capable, we can, I am sure, triumph over our foes."

It was in these words that Senator LYNDON JOHNSON of Texas summed up an address to the Senate this week—an address which deserves a great deal more attention than it has received. It was a talk which deserves attention because Senator JOHNSON was addressing himself to the most urgent question of our time: What must we do to survive?

There are men—men of ability and integrity—who advocate something less than a total all-out effort. General Marshall spoke for them when he testified on December 1 before a House committee. The Secretary of Defense wants a greater effort. But he does not favor an all-out war mobilization at this time. He fears that if we go to total mobilization the Communists might then ease up and leave us in a difficult position. General Marshall is worried about the reaction of the people in that situation. He is concerned with the matter of cost. In short, he is against an all-out wartime mobilization until we clearly have to do it.

Senator JOHNSON takes the stand that that time is now—that the need is clear and will never be clearer while we still have a chance to survive.

The Texas Senator is in a position to speak with some authority on this question. As chairman of the Senate Military Preparedness Subcommittee, he has seen at first hand the hesitations, the uncertainties, the fumblings of the rearmament program. And he has come away from that experience with this conviction: "I say that the policy of 'wait and see' must end, and it must end now. For what are we waiting? What do we expect to see tomorrow that we cannot see clearly today—or could not see (when the Korean war began) on June 25?"

What Senator JOHNSON sees is this:

"First, we are at war. We are at war not merely with Communist China, but with all the military strength and both the physical and human resources behind the iron curtain. We have been at war for 6 months. We may well be at war for 10 or 20 years more.

"Second, our primary and immediate goal in this war is survival. This is a bleak, disturbing reality. In other wars, our goal has been simply victory. Now, however, we must make our survival certain before we can hope for victory, because we cannot be confident of survival.

"Third, we are not getting ready for war. We are in a war, but all our effort is seemingly directed toward staying out of the war that we are in already. This is adolescent nonsense."

The Star believes that these are facts, and that no rational appraisal of the rapidly mounting evidence can lead to any other conclusion. It is possible, by an emotional process of wishful thinking, to arrive at some other conclusion. If one resolutely turns his face away from the evidence, if he merely shrinks from the 34,000 American casualties in Korea, if he will not look through his mind's eye at the Russian jet fighters which have appeared in some force over the Korean battlefield, if he ignores the words of Russia's Mr. Malik, if he closes his ears to the Communist threat to drive our armies into the sea—if a man will do these things he can make himself believe whatever he wishes. But he cannot convert a state of war into a state of peace. And such a man will never be ready to take the steps that must be taken in the interests of our self-preservation.

What should be done? This question cannot be answered with any absolute assurance. Senator JOHNSON has some definite opinions. He says that first, and above all else, we must have a long-range global plan of strategy for the war to which we are committed. We must not let the Russians decide where we shall fight and where we can fight. We must not fall into the tragic error of squandering our young men in futile, indecisive little wars before the real enemy is even directly engaged. Second, we must fully mobilize for military service all of our available manpower—that if we do not do this we will be weaker by next June than we were when we went into Korea in June of this year. Third, he calls for immediate mobilization of our economy, including tight controls, and an urgent drive to organize and greatly increase our productive capacity.

There are others who say in all earnestness that we should not go this far now. They give reasons for their stand. They say that the necessary plans have not been made, that the machinery has not been set up, that the need is not finally clear. One might ask why, after 6 months of war, so little planning has been done, so little machinery is ready. But that serves no useful purpose. We have to go on from where we are and do the best we can.

Those who would move slowly are gambling on the time factor. This must be so, for certainly if we should find ourselves at war with Russia tomorrow they would urge all possible haste.

But how much reliance can be placed in this assumption that we will have the time required? Some of these people thought that the Russians, at earliest, would not get the atom bomb until 1952. They got it in 1949. Our military planners once looked to 1954 as the period of greatest danger. Now they have moved that date up to 1952. Will they be saying in a few weeks or months that next spring or summer will be the critical time?

Let us think a moment about this. Every hour of delay is a gamble with the life of the Nation. If the Russians should strike before we have had time, at our present pace, to get ready, the problems that bother us now, the difficulties which loom so large, will seem trivial by comparison. We will not be worrying then about the cost or about the psychology of the people. We will be much too busy burying our dead, caring for our wounded, and trying to save what is left of our country.

Time is not, and never will be, on the side of those who waste it. As it is, there may not be enough time left. Even so, is it better to do too little or too much? We have trifled to long with the security of this country, with all the beliefs and the traditions and the things that are dear to us. Opportunity is slipping away. How shall we answer if we are called up on some desolate tomorrow to explain why we did not make the most of it?

Vision and Courage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. LLOYD M. BENTSEN, JR.

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an excellent editorial from the Austin American, Austin, Tex., dated December 15, 1950.

There is now a virtually unanimous admission of the peril facing this Nation and the sacrifices which must be made, not only on the battlefront by our young men, but on the home front as well. Much of this call to arms is now being voiced by Monday morning quarterbacks. A notable exception to the hindsight prognosticators is our colleague and friend, HOMER THORNBERRY, of the Tenth District of Texas, who cared not for the wails of business as usual or politics as usual, but went to work months ago to prepare the people's case against communistic aggression.

The editorial is as follows:

THE EDITOR'S NOTEBOOK—"FULL MOBILIZATION," THORNBERRY PLEA

The emphatic telegram of Congressman HOMER THORNBERRY this week, supporting mobilization of manpower and resources to meet the Nation's peril was a reiteration of what he said back in the early days of the Korean invasion.

Congressman THORNBERRY's message commended the stand taken by the Austin business community urging immediate steps for full mobilization of manpower and industry and reaffirmed his advocacy and support of these measures for national preparedness.

But the Austin district Congressman had been working at that all through the perilous days of North Korean aggression, of United States and United Nations decisions to resist aggression.

An Austin businessman has a letter from Congressman THORNBERRY, written months ago, which even this soon seems prophetic, and which in unmistakable terms defines his attitude as a national lawmaker.

THORNBERRY said in that letter: "In my judgment, the Korean situation goes very deep, much deeper than some seem to realize. In fear that we are confronted with two serious enemies—communism and inflation.

"I feel that we must be militarily strong if we are to meet the threat of communistic aggression. Thousands of men are being called to make very great sacrifices. I feel that sacrifices must also be exacted from others of our society if we are to meet the equally dangerous threat of inflation.

"I have expressed many times, publicly and in private, the firm belief that we must have full mobilization of all our resources—not just of the men who are called into our military service and their families. * * *

"From the best information available to me, I am convinced that any half-way measure, any vacillation, any weakening on our part, will destroy us all—not only those of us of the present generation, but our own children. No one who sits at my desk and reads the letters from the men who are now fighting in Korea—and from their families who seem to be left to the mercy of rising prices and limited income—can think we should do business as usual or play politics as usual.

"If we are to gain any lesson at all from our experience in the last war, it is that we cannot have effective control against inflation if we are to impose controls only on part of our economy. I do not believe in making an exception of any special group. I have voted for imposition of controls on prices, wages, and credit—clear across the board. Not only did I vote against the special exception to which you refer, but against all amendments which have exempted other groups. * * * We must cut nonessential spending to the bone and enact profits tax which will prevent undue profits by any group at the expense of our all-out effort to preserve our Nation."

And Congressman THORNBERRY followed this up with this statement in a speech in the House of Representatives last August 15, when he was opposing a bill for nondefense spending:

"Our first duty during these days is to cut nonessential spending to the bone, so that we can send bullets, guns, tanks, and airplanes to our men in Korea."

The sense of national peril is acute here in Texas. Some have come to share it only recently. It is reassuring that the Representative of central Texas in Congress has had the vision and the foresight and the realistic purpose to go down the line for total mobilization from the beginning.

Perverts in Federal Agencies Called Peril to United States Security

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT F. RICH

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following article from the Washington Times-Herald of December 16, 1950:

PERVERTS IN FEDERAL AGENCIES CALLED PERIL TO UNITED STATES SECURITY—SENATE PROBERS REPORT RUSSIAN SPIES SEEK UNSAVORY FACTS ABOUT OFFICIALS

(By Bert Wissman)

Homosexuals and other sex perverts should be kicked out of Federal jobs and kept out because they are poor security risks and easy prey for blackmailer spies, a Senate investigating committee said in a strongly worded report yesterday.

Russian spies here are under orders to dig out unsavory facts about high United States officials so the knowledge can be used to force disclosure of information valuable to the Soviet, the report stated.

"One homosexual can pollute a Government office," said the Senate investigating subcommittee which probed employment of sex perverts in the Government.

NO ESTIMATE ON NUMBER

The subcommittee sharply criticized the State Department and other agencies for following a head-in-the-sand attitude which has permitted sex perverts to continue in Federal jobs even after their sexual immorality is known.

The subcommittee, headed by Senator HOEY, of North Carolina, stated it is not possible to determine accurately how many perverts are employed in the Government.

But it cited nearly 5,000 known cases within the last 3 years.

Of the civilian agencies, the State Department showed the largest 3-year total—143—of whom 106 had been fired by the time the investigation started. In the 7-month period ending last November, 97 sex perverts suspects were uncovered in the Veterans' Administration alone, the report revealed.

URGE HARSHER TERMS

Legislators stressed that many violators in the District have been able to escape by forfeiture of $25 collateral or less, and proposed enactment of legislation to strengthen Washington sex statutes to provide stiffer fines and jail terms for such offenses.

The disclosure that Russian spies have been ordered to seek out perverts in Government jobs as prime targets for blackmail was contained in the testimony of D. Milton Ladd, assistant to the FBI director.

The subcommittee reported also that United States intelligence officials had advised them Nazi and Communist agents have attempted to gain information from employees of our Government by threatening to expose their abnormal sex activities."

Ladd told legislators that the Communists, without principles or scruples, have a program of seeking out weaknesses of leaders in Government.

He said the FBI has information of unquestioned reliability that orders have been issued by high Russian intelligence officials to their agents to secure details of the private lives of Government officials, their weaknesses, their associates, and, in fact, every bit of information, hoping to find a chink in their armor * * * upon which they might capitalize.

The subcommittee investigation revealed 4,964 cases of perverts in the Government from January 1 to November 1, 1950, of which 4,380 were in the Armed Forces uniformed personnel and 574 in civilian Government agencies, almost all of the latter in the Washington area.

Of those in the civilian agencies, 382 cases were found after last April, when the clamor for investigation was building up, a fact which HOEY said indicated Federal personnel officials were doing little or nothing about the situation until the spotlight of publicity was thrown on the problem.

The discharges from the Armed Forces for perversion maintained a more even keel over the 3-year period, indicating the military have been more aggressive in weeding out such individuals, HOEY stated.

Of the 574 cases discovered in civilian agencies, 213 were allowed to resign, 207 were fired, 85 were cleared, and 69 cases are pending, the report said.

The subcommittee recommended:

1. Thorough investigation of all complaints of perversion.

2. Strict enforcement of regulations which call for firing of perverts as immorals, something which the legislators charged has not been done in the past.

3. Creation of a board of review to hear appeals of persons discharged for sex perversion.

The subcommittee said its investigation of the handling of sex-perversion charges by District police disclosed glaring faults, both with enforcement by the police and with sex statutes as they now exist.

It recommended that the penalty for indecent exposure, or committing any lewd, obscene, or indecent act be upped to a maximum $500 fine and 6 months in jail and that the practice of permitting forfeiture of collateral be dropped.

PROSECUTION CHANGE

The legislators also recommended that prosecution of sex cases be taken from the corporation counsel and given solely to the United States attorney.

Legislators also urged tightening of language covering solicitations because it determined that such solicitations frequently occur at places not covered by the specific terms of the act as it is presently written.

Late yesterday, HOEY introduced a pervert-control bill containing the subcommittee's legislative recommendations.

The State Department was cited as a glaring example of how homosexuals find their way from one Government job to another because the real reason for their discharge is not noted with the CSC. Of 91 homos discharged by the State Department between January 1947 and January 1950, some 23 found new Federal jobs, the report said.

A Change of Tune

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLIFF CLEVENGER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. CLEVENGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Chicago Sunday Tribune of December 17, 1950:

A CHANGE OF TUNE

It used to take only the appearance of a British Prime Minister in Washington to send internationalist morale soaring, but Mr. Attlee was no shot in the arm. The events in Korea have been too dismal; and in Western Europe the mood bears a closer resemblance to that of a debating society whose members are scoring nice points at each other's expense than it does to an area living under Stalin's suspended sword. There is only a pretense at preparing a defense.

The accumulating evidence seems to have impressed some of our erstwhile internationalists with the thought that we have been given the bag to hold in Korea, and that the same gift, only larger and emptier, is to be expected if there is aggression in Europe.

Thus Senator PAUL DOUGLAS has been heard from again, this time to the effect that the British are shirking (have not made an adequate contribution in manpower to the Korean forces).

More startling, however, is the new Walter Lippmann. This syndicated oracle, who not so many years ago set forth the thesis in a book called United States Foreign Policy—Shield of the Republic, that the United States for more than 75 years was protected by the British Navy, is now hinting broadly that our allies have run out on us.

In appraising the prudent and wise policy we should pursue under these circumstances, Mr. Lippmann finds inspiration in the counsel that Prime Minister Gladstone gave Queen Victoria in 1869. Gladstone urged a thrifty use of England's power and credit when the common trasactions and general interests of Europe were involved.

"England," he said, "should keep entire in her own hands the means of estimating her own obligations upon the various states of facts as they arise * * * as it is dangerous for her to assume alone an advanced, and therefore an isolated, position in regard to European controversies, that, come what may, it is better for her to promise too little than too much; that she should not encourage the weak by giving expectations of aid to resist the strong * * *; that she should seek to develop and mature the action of a common or public or European opinion as the best standing bulwark against worry, but should beware of seeming to lay down the law of that opinion by her own authority. * * *"

"I do not know," remarks Mr. Lippmann, "whether in the tiresome jargon of our day this would be called isolationism or appeasement. But a great empire was governed and a long peace was achieved when it was deemed honorable to be that prudent and that wise."

The example which Mr. Lippmann now cites for our guidance is remarkably different from the formula he offered in 1943 when his book was published. He held then that since 1900 American foreign policy was insolvent because we had not developed sufficient power to balance our overseas commitments. Mr. Lippmann's prescription to attain solvency was to bring our overseas commitments and our power to enforce those commitments into line by entering an alliance with Britain and Russia. Seven years later even Mr. Lippmann cannot regard his own ideas of that day as wise or prudent. He has made a complete turnabout, at the risk of being called an isolationist.

Facts at length drill themselves into the most obdurate skulls. So now Mr. Lippmann quotes approvingly from Gladstone: "Is England so uplifted in strength above every nation that she can with prudence advertise herself as ready to undertake the general redress of wrongs? Would not the consequences of such professions and promises be either the premature exhaustion of her means, or a collapse in the day of performance? Is any power at this time of today warranted in assuming to itself this comprehensive obligation?"

These arguments will not be precisely new to those who read this page. They appeal to internationalists because the predictable consequences of overreaching the Nation's means have been realized. There is yet time to avoid the same debacle in Europe that has already rewarded an incautious adventurism in Asia.

Italy, a country 30 percent Communist, is impotent militarily. The English social revolution has reached the point where soldiers no longer will follow the aristocrats, but where England has not yet been able to produce a new model army on the Cromwellian pattern composed of lower class professional soldiers. France is disaffected to the point where General de Gaulle fears an uprising or a collapse which will put the country in the Communist camp.

By thrusting ourselves forward everywhere we have succeeded in bringing this Nation closer to complete isolation that it has ever been—a result which the internationalists feared and which, ironically, they themselves have brought about.

It Would Be Worth Trying

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH P. O'HARA
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Fairmont Daily Sentinel, of Fairmont, Minn., dated December 5, 1950:

IT WOULD BE WORTH TRYING

There is a growing feeling among the people who pay the bills and do the actual fighting, that it is about time we cultivate the friendship, good will, and understanding of Canada, Mexico, and South America, and let the warmongers of Europe and Asia wither on the vine.

The two Americas have everything we can possibly need, and we can live in peace, plenty, and considerable security so long as we are a united, friendly people.

Were we to spend a fraction of what we have thrown away in Europe, it would no doubt be surprising at the amount of genuine good will and understanding we could promote on this and the South American continent.

The people who pay, and the people who do the actual fighting should have something to say about it. They are entitled to a chance. Our diplomats and statesmen, based on past experience, haven't done too well.

If We Are Going To Survive

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RALPH HARVEY
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. HARVEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Indianapolis News of December 16, 1950:

IF WE ARE GOING TO SURVIVE

Millions of Americans, regardless of politics, heard the strong and resolute words of Gov. Thomas E. Dewey, of New York, Thursday night with the hope that President Truman in his address to the Nation Friday would speak with the same inspiring boldness.

The President fell short of that mark. Like Governor Dewey, he called all Americans to rally in unity and sacrifice to the cause of freedom. But where Dewey's call was clear and ringing, the President's was muted. The President has gained stature over the indecision of the last 6 months, but he has yet to rise to the "real leadership" of which Dewey spoke—the leadership to which "the American people will respond— every one of them—to the sacrifices that are necessary if we are going to survive."

President Truman showed little of the toughness, realism, and sense of grim urgency that moved the leader of the opposition party to call for an all-out program of military and economic mobilization. The President accused the rulers of the Soviet Union of trying to undermine or overwhelm the free nations, one by one, and being willing to push the world to a brink of a general war to get what they want. Dewey, with clearer vision, warned that world communism under the leadership of Soviet Russia is waging ruthless war against the whole free world.

The President, still speaking of peace when there is no peace, clings to the everything-will-be-all right hope that there is no conflict between the legitimate interests of the free world and those of the Soviet Union that cannot be settled by honorable means. Dewey says: "Let us get rid once and for all of the idea that Russia wants less than the whole world," and "We shall all be brave and strong and remain free or we shall be timid and weak and become slaves." In the light of the events of the last year, which view is hope, and which hard fact—and which represents the considered judgment of the American people?

While Mr. Truman speaks approvingly of the puny measures taken to date and, in a mood reminiscent of the "on hand and on order" of another day, of what we shall have produced a year from now—and what, Mr. President, will happen if the blow falls before then?—Governor Dewey says: "The hour is very late—I do not know how late. Whether we have a day or a year or two years, not a second should be lost." Where the Governor urged the summoning of the full resources of 100 National Guard divisions, President Truman calls two more making a total of six, to active service. Where the President says that we need the help of other free nations, Governor Dewey realistically welcomes the support of all who will fight in the cause. "In the kind of struggle I propose," he says, "we should stop being fussy about who will help to prevent it."

He would lay it on the line to our Allies with the condition that Europe break away from its petty barriers and bickering, and with the understanding that "our military aid will be extended only to those nations who demonstrate a willingness to fight on our side." And he would carry the fight to Russia, fighting fire with fire, and striking behind the rotten facade of the Soviet Union with the same weapons by which the Kremlin seeks to weaken the free nations.

On both the military, diplomatic, and home fronts, one program is positive, the other piecemeal.

Despite the contrast, however, the President has moved toward the view represented by Governor Dewey and reflected in the country. At long last, he is turning—if somewhat too slowly—toward all-out mobilization. He proposes to do something about inflation—dealing not only with its symptoms through limited and selective price controls but with its causes as well. At long last, he has ordered a cessation of all nonmilitary Government spending except that which contributes to the defense of the nation. At long last, also he has struck at the hydraheaded bureaucracy of economic mobilization by concentrating responsibility and authority in the hands of the able Charles E. Wilson, president of General Electric.

There are notable gains, and it is significant also that both the President and his opponent in the last election speak, if in different tones, in much the same voice. The American people are pulling together, and they are willing to pull much harder than they have yet been asked.

The two speeches add up to this, too, for the average American: As Governor Dewey warns, "we cannot save our freedom and also keep our personal comforts and luxuries." Or, as the President truly says: "All of us will have to pay more taxes and do without things we like. Think of this, not as a sacrifice, but as opportunity, an opportunity to defend the best kind of life that men have ever devised on this earth."

The testing time for America is here. God grant that we shall not fail.

The Unfinished Revolution in China

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THURMOND CHATHAM

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. CHATHAM. Mr. Speaker, for some time I have publicly recommended that we recognize the Peoples Government of China—a government that controls practically all of the mainland of China and would control Formosa except for the intervention of the United States—mind you, not the intervention of the United Nations.

The people of China have always been conservatives; and when the Chinese Communists promised them food and peace, they readily accepted the new regime. For many years under the Nationalist Government they have been subjected to graft, corruption, and greed. The present government of Chiang Kai-shek has lost all control. A similar situation might have arisen during the days when we threw off the yoke of England if the royal agencies had moved to Long Island and some outside government had said to our victorious Revolutionary forefathers, "Stay off your own Long Island." We would have felt as the mainland Chinese feel today. A small group of rabid Chiang supporters have completely misled us in backing a lost cause.

I commend to my colleagues a press release by Dr. Sherwood Eddy, dated November 5, 1948—over 2 years ago. This great Chinese expert has called the turn to an uncanny degree. Why it has not been fully publicized in the present crisis is a mystery to me.

The group of Chiang supporters are among the leaders of the get-Acheson movement. He has realized what Dr. Eddy prophesied, and events have proved he was right. The Chinese people will never follow Chiang. The supporters of Chiang will not admit they were wrong and are trying to put the blame on a great Secretary of State. These gullible people are doing the Nation a great disservice—promoting disunity.

I appeal to you to read Dr. Eddy's article—read what he says about Chiang, about the Communists, about the Chinese people.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include Dr. Eddy's article in the RECORD, as follows:

THE UNFINISHED REVOLUTION IN CHINA

(By Sherwood Eddy)

At the beginning of our long journey across Asia we found a new Japan, completely disarmed, in the midst of a unique and apparently successful experiment for the reconstruction of a new democratic, peaceful nation out of a recently conquered military foe. Next we visited the new Korean Republic, where our old friend Syngman Rhee had been chosen as President in the first elections ever held in Korea in 3,000 years. It is true that the Communists are trying to assassinate him. It is also true that the Korean people, following an age-long tradition accentuated by the Japanese occupation, are still sadly divided in fractions, both in church and in state. But as the southern Koreans have now achieved their political independence, I believe they will slowly, perhaps with many humiliating lessons, build an abiding and united Christian democracy.

In China, we have arrived in a dark hour, when the Government is apparently on the verge of falling. We can see nothing that can now save it. The failure of the National government, however, will be in some respects like the fall of the 24 dynasties in China's more than 4,000 years of history; and this massive civilization will go on under a new leadership. On our arrival in China we proceeded immediately to the capital city of Nanking in order to seek full and unhurried interviews with cabinet members and the principal leaders of the Government. We were invited to tea with President Chiang Kai-shek and Madam Chiang; we also spent some hours with our Ambassador, Leighton Stuart, who is the most sympathetic and understanding representative America ever had in China. We had interviews with the Vice President, Chen Li-fu, who controls the Kuomintang Party and who is called the head of the reactionary C. C. clique; and we met or interviewed some 50 Chinese leaders, foreign experts, and missionaries. We tried to see everyone who could give us essential information, but we shall quote no one. The situation is far too delicate and full of dynamite.

During the last year in Europe and Asia, my wife and I have visited defeated countries, occupied countries, liberated countries; but China is the first nation we have visited that is in the midst of an awful civil war, and that on a scale far more colossal and cruel than was ever experienced in the United States. We found, as we have said, a new Japan and a new Korea, and we shall find a new India, but there is no new China. Instead, there is a vast unfinished revolution in China—far deeper and slower, larger and longer than any other revolution in the world. Four hundred and fifty million of the most conservative people on earth, most of whom are illiterate peasants still living under conditions comparable to those in the feudal Middle Ages, cannot be transformed in a day or in a generation.

It may be said that potentially China's revolution began the day that Robert Morrison, the first Protestant missionary, stepped ashore in Canton in 1807. All unconsciously Morrison introduced into China's static civilization three dynamic and disruptive forces—the dynamic of a new religion and the disruptive forces of a new nationalism and of an industrial revolution, the latter to be produced by western capitalism and trade. The great Chinese revolution entered upon its second stage of material destruction in the peasant revolt of the Taiping Rebellion (1851–64) that swept away 20,000,000 people in bloody slaughter. This stage of negative material destruction was resumed in the last spasm of the old order during the Boxer uprising in 1900, and will be completed by the Communists as they conquer successive areas. The revolution became articulate when Dr. Sun Yat-sen set up the republic in 1911 and declared its ideals in the three principles of the people—nationalism, democracy, and livelihood.

The revolution became militarily supreme while Chiang Kai-shek united China during the anarchic war-lord period and during her 8 years of indomitable resistance to the Japanese. By VJ-day, however, when China, exhausted and demoralized by war and the Japanese occupation, was liberated, the revolution had ceased or had been betrayed by the reactionary leadership that dominated the Kuomintang. Today Chiang Kai-shek is proving utterly incapable of leading China into a completion of the constructive phases of the revolution. The generalissimo continues to give military orders, but there are almost none who will obey them. The Government, which has become too largely a police state, with its spies in every college and institution in China, has lost the confidence and moral support of the people and has incurred the deep hatred of the students and other radical elements of the population. One reason for this is that Chiang has ordered so many of the students to be put to death. Tragically it is now the Communists and not the reactionary Kuomintang who demand the completion of the revolution on the lines laid down by Dr. Sun Yat-sen. This, however, is only the first stage of the total revolution that may ultimately follow the Russian blueprints as in other lands.

A plot has been formed that may falsely claim to fulfill General Marshall's year-old efforts to unite all parties in a genuine coalition government. Li Chi-shen was to be the puppet president, and Mao Tse-tung, the Communist leader, as vice president, was to play the part of Stalin in the government. The "Christian" general, Feng, was on his way to China to lead all the revolutionary armies when he perished in a fire on a Russian ship. Old Chu Teh may now lead the forces. The Communists may advance under this plan of a nominal coalition, offering positions to Chinese leaders who will collaborate with them, as did the Japanese, or, throwing off all pretense, they may drive back the Government forces and set up a ruthless dictatorship, as they have done in other countries.

The Government is not only threatened by repeated military defeats in many places in North China, but by widespread moral and fiscal deterioration. When Chinchow fell (beyond the Great Wall), and then Mukden, the Government lost its control of the corridor to the north, and all north China was threatened.

We flew this week to Peiping and Tientsin, now on a small island surrounded by Communist forces that can take these cities almost at will. That would bring them, however, into conflict with the foreign powers, which they may wish to avoid or postpone. The Communist plan thus far has been to surround cities, cut off their food supply, and let them starve. Mukden is now starving, and dead bodies lie unburied in the square and open streets, to be eaten by hungry dogs, while the Communists pour in to capture the city. As I write, Peiping is crowded with pitiful refugees, with airplanes and carts hourly bringing in their famished human freight. I have never seen such terrifying hunger nor such pressure of an overcrowded population upon the bare means of subsistence.

The new currency has already failed. It is impossible for the Government to master or maintain it when it is spending four times as much as the income it received. This itself causes wild inflation, with untold suffering to millions of people. The old currency has fallen till one United States dollar would purchase from twelve to fifteen millions in inflated paper. A week ago I bought the new currency at 4 to 1, but today in the black market it would buy only 10 to 1. Frantic police measures will not hold it, just as the Confederate money could not have been held after the defeat of the South.

After a lapse of 13 years I again met President Chiang Kai-shek in this tragic hour. Seeing the widespread failure of the Government and its impending doom, I felt only a deep pity for him. Chiang has long believed, as have many others, that he was China's man of destiny who alone could save his people from "the wicked Communists." He seems to be unaware that he has already lost the long war with them, though he is now beginning to be haunted by the fear that his career will end in failure. He is apparently as completely blind to the significance of the mighty ground swell of the social upheaval of revolution that is rising irresistibly all over China as were the Bourbons of France, or the Romanoffs of Russia, though it would be unjust to compare him with either of these effete dynasties.

Yet Chiang will go down as one of the great names of Chinese history. In my opinion, Chiang is a far stronger man than the dreamer, Dr. Sun Yat-sen. I knew them both. Chiang's wife is beautiful and brilliant, but, as she well knows, her husband is a greater character than she. He is a far stronger man than the little Emperor of Japan, whom I met last month. Yet most Japanese would gladly die for their Emperor as the symbol of the nation; but the Chinese, like the Koreans, tear down their leaders rather than support them. Dr. Nitobe told me years ago that individually the Chinese rise above the Japanese in ability, but nationally the Japanese succeed where the Chinese fail. The Japanese are monolithic, or like a solid block of cement; whereas, as Dr. Sun Yat-sen himself said, the Chinese are like a heap of sand—divided in their extreme individualism.

Cynics may sneer, but I found that President Chiang Kai-shek had deepened in his personal religious experience—however blind he may be to the social implications of religion. I found him even more a man of prayer, more cheerful and healthy than I had ever known him. He begins and ends each day in prayer, and prays many times a day. I am not ashamed to say that I pray for him daily, as I assured him I would. The last of the Czars, however, was also personally pious; and even Ivan the Terrible had spasms of repentance and of religious austerity, but the personal religion of the Czars seemed to have no bearing on the social welfare of the people. Chiang, on the other hand, is deeply concerned in the welfare of his people—up to his lights. The man who knows him best says: "Chiang is proud, stubborn, and conscientious—a dangerous combination." Judged by his reactionary book, China's Destiny, I thought he had a Confucian rather than a Christian conscience—until I learned, to my relief, that the book was written by a ghost writer, Tao Hsi-hseng.

A quality that troubles me more in Chiang's character is his abysmal and willful ignorance. There are now only two persons who ever dare tell him unpleasant truths—and that very rarely, for he flies into a rage. The sad fact is that, though Chiang has done more to unite China than any other leader in modern history, he has failed to fulfill all the three principles of the people. Try as he has, he has been utterly unable to solidify this "heap of sand," these individualistic Chinese people, into one cohesive, patriotic nation. In Chiang's military training in China, Japan, and Russia, he never saw, conceived, nor obtained the ability to create a genuine democracy. And especially, he could not or would not provide the people's livelihood in economic justice for the peasants, nor prevent the high tide of graft and corruption that now permeates all except the highest ranks of officials in China. Therefore the Chinese people claim their immemorial right of revolution (derived from Mencius) against him.

The most disturbing fact of all is that, if and when Chiang falls, there is absolutely no one in China who can take his place, or who can hope to unite this vast amorphous people. I say this after wide consultation with Chinese and foreign leaders both in south and in north China. He has himself tried to eliminate every possible rival. And no triumvirate, nor group, nor committee could succeed him, for the Chinese have never learned to cooperate and work loyally together as equals. That leaves only the Communists.

Despite the iron curtain, upon the testimony of many witnesses we are forced to admit that in several respects the Communist areas in the north are better governed than the areas of the now reactionary Kuomintang in the south. Just as Lenin quickly did in Russia, the Communists almost immediately wisely distributed the holdings of rich landlords to the tillers of the soil, as Dr. Sun had urged. The Communists stopped the graft, because they shot the grafters. They tried to improve the lot of the peasants and have won their loyal support in areas governed by the Communists. All this poor Chiang Kai-shek has never succeeded in doing. I saw the officials in Nanking, who have a ton of paper plans for distributing the land—after they defeat the Communists. But that day will now never come. For such a government as the present National Government never can defeat them materially or morally.

I saw the generalissimo launch his new life movement in the Province of Kiangsi in 1934. This movement aimed at the reform of China through personal virtue. I saw Chiang when he had plenty of money, airplanes, and a large army of over half a million men, directed by some 40 German military advisers—including the generals who built up Hitler's Reichswehr. I saw Chiang trying to conquer the Communist commander, Chu Teh, when the latter had a tiny force of only 10,000 fanatical fighters using arms torn from the hands of Chiang's forces. Even then Chiang was able only to starve them out but was never able to crush them. Now that, according to General Marshall, the Communist armies number over 1,000,000, and control a population of over 100,000,000 in north China, they certainly are not being beaten and I fear cannot be beaten. Just as the gigantic armies of the nominally Christian czar were unable to crush the handful of Lenin's morally superior revolutionaries—even though they were atheists—so it is in China today. Just as the flaming zealots of Islam were able to sweep over nominally Christian countries, so the zealots of atheist communism are often able to overcome even true but feeble Christian communities in Russia, China, and Northern Korea today. Even though America has been pouring into China from all sources over a billion dollars a year for the last 3 years, the Chinese Government has not been able to conquer. Many of the American arms we provided for Chiang's armies are now in the hands of the Communists, and more will be in their hands soon. Even if the United States sent an army of several million troops to China, Russia, next door, could send far more. It will be fatal if we are involved in China's civil war. Britain's foreign minister, Ernest Bevin, said to me in London last year: "I do not talk war, nor expect war, but if it arises it will come where you fall foul of Soviet Russia over China." Increased American aid to China may well prove an invitation or challenge to Russia to back the Communists more openly and powerfully than she ever has done, and that in turn might lead to war with Russia—world war III.

The policies of William C. Bullitt and of Congressman WALTER JUDD if followed will fatally involve the United States in China's civil war and ultimately in world war. The more money we pour into China, the more we seem to earn their ingratitude, and the more are the Communists able to brand us as China's enemy No. 1—the wicked American imperialists. Many of China's intellectuals stand on the side lines, completely irresponsible, blaming in turn the United States and Chiang Kai-shek as the scapegoats for all China's ills. They have never formed effective liberal parties between the reactionary Kuomintang and the radical Communists, especially since Chiang Kai-shek banned the Democratic League, which General Marshall thought was one of the most hopeful parties. But the intellectuals cannot shirk nor deny their responsibility for China's present woes. They were one of the causes of China's failure.

The Chinese Government troops, under the present system of graft which grew enormously during the Japanese occupation, do not have and have never had the morale of the Communist troops. Chiang's troops have met defeat ever since September 23 and have lost several hundred thousand men, the cream of the Nationalist armies—the bulk of 39 divisions trained and equipped by the United States during the war. The Nationalist soldiers were too long robbed by their officers, as recorded truly in the Stillwell papers. I had personally witnessed the graft and robbery of the Government forces for nearly 20 years before Stilwell recorded it, and long ago I personally laid the condition of the worst provinces and divisions of the army before Chiang Kai-shek. The 450,000,000 of China, however, are bound by their age-long traditions. Chiang, steeped in these traditions and aware that "face" must be saved, never dared dismiss even the worst offenders, but had to provide other jobs for them lest they gang up on him or assassinate him. Alone he could no more prevent the graft of China than King Canute could stay the tides of the sea. I hope to show this in my next report.

If anyone doubts this dark diagnosis of China's desperate state—with which the majority of the Chinese and foreigners I have met in Nanking and Peiping agree—let him read the truest book yet written on this sad country, The United States and China, the Harvard Press. China is probably at the moment one of the darkest countries in the world politically, and she is sinking into yet deeper darkness. After examining many witnesses from the Communist areas—whose evidence I hope to record in my next report—I must say that until the Communist flood engulfs this unhappy land, China is the most favorable field in the world for Christian evangelism among students. Even though the Communists seize power and establish their police state of terror and bloodshed, which may last long, it will still be only temporary. Many of the churches will survive as they have in Russia and in Northern Korea. No more than Emperor Nero in Rome, can Stalin or Mao Tse-tung crush out religion or Christianity. We are having crowded meetings—thousand or more attending each night in every place, and there will be large and lasting results in the 13 cities which we are now visiting from Peiping to Canton. I hope to describe these meetings in my next report, together with other more hopeful features of the situation. China will go on forever, and a greater and freer China will yet emerge than Dr. Sun Yat-sen ever dreamed of.

The Truman Emergency

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLIFF CLEVENGER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. CLEVENGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Chicago Sunday Tribune of December 17, 1950:

THE TRUMAN EMERGENCY

A national emergency exists, so Mr. Truman's speech writers tell him. If there is an emergency, it is Truman himself and his foreign policy. His speech makes it abundantly clear that he intends the country to have more of the same that produced the debacle in Korea. The next step is to add a prospective defeat in Europe to that in Korea.

Mr. Truman sees the European commitment as a one-way street. While Europeans refuse to exert themselves in their own behalf, Americans are to consign their sons to the custody of Mr. Truman's army, to have ever greater taxes heaped upon them, and to do without a lot of things because production is to be diverted to implements of war.

Do you hear Britain, or France, or Italy, or anybody else proclaiming an emergency? You do not. Do you notice all of them rushing their young men to the training camps? Hardly. Do you hear them preaching higher taxes and civilian hardships? Not on your life.

It should be elementary that this country can't save people who refuse to try to help themselves. All we can expect is another fearful military defeat if Russia chooses to take up the gage that Truman has cast down. His speech was virtually an invitation to the Soviets to move. He confessed our weakness. He told how long it would take to start getting war production—not very substantial production at that.

There is nothing to stop Russia taking what she wants, east or west, except for the atom bombs we have in stock. She may not even fear those too much, for she is supposed to have, by now, an effective radar warning screen and a large air force for defense. She is so spread out that we can't cripple her by a massive stroke, even if the bombardiers were lucky enough to center on all of their targets.

There is danger, all right, but it is danger to the nations that are refusing to proclaim any emergency. There is little we can do for them; there is nothing that they will do for themselves. But this doesn't add up to an emergency for the United States. We are in no greater peril than we were all through the last 5 years. We might have a few atom bombs dropped on us, but if we can't protect the continent and its outposts after having spent $89,000,000,000 on defense in the last 5 years, and with $45,000,000,000 more dedicated to that purpose this coming year, then Mr. Truman and his Secretary of Defense ought to be impeached and his service chieftains court-martialed.

The only emergency America faces is in proportion to the degree of risk it assumes in Europe and has assumed in Asia. Mr. Truman isn't proclaiming an emergency in the United States; he is proclaiming that the United States is assuming France's emergency, England's, Italy's, Yugoslavia's, Korea's, and any others that may exist anywhere.

Korea has taught him nothing. He is leading the Nation toward additional gigantic defeats on other foreign battlefields. If he is not checked, our fighting forces will be slaughtered abroad, until at last this country, within its own borders, stands defenseless.

Nero, Bring Back the Fiddle

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH P. O'HARA
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Fairmont Daily Sentinel, of Fairmont, Minn., dated December 12, 1950:

NERO, BRING BACK THAT FIDDLE

While our boys in Korea are retreating, what do you suppose occupied the Senate of the United States Friday, December 8, 1950? A bill (S. 4236) to provide for the development and regulation of methods of weather modification and control.

And they're not joking. The bill was twice read by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The official title is "Weather Control Act of 1951."

Shades of the late F. D. R. Imagine the Government regulating the weather and having to write your Congress for rain.

Imagine the New Deal or the Fair Deal seizing control and inflicting drought on all Republican areas; cyclones, hurricanes, thunder, and chain lightning on Taft in Ohio, Youngdahl in Minnesota, Warren in California.

Contemplate the stark tragedy that might follow an act of the State Department sending all the available moisture overseas to help the people in the uninhabited and underdeveloped portions of the earth. Imagine our fertile, verdant fields in normally Republican Iowa being turned into a Sahara.

It is to weep.

Since the time of Christ and probably a long time before, the Almighty seems to have done pretty well in handling the weather. But not now. The Fair Deal, slap-happy at the turn of events in Korea, in China, in Formosa, on the home front, in Germany and France, seeks yet another buzz-saw to back up to.

Nero was a piker, and our friend whose name lives in history because he wept believing there were no more worlds to conquer, hadn't even made a good start.

Somebody pinch us, quick. We must be dreaming.

Veterans' Loans in Wisconsin

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GLENN R. DAVIS
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, on August 21 last, I inserted in the Appendix—page A5945—a statement on loans made to veterans by the Wisconsin department of veterans' affairs.

This morning I received a letter from Mr. John P. Cullen, manager of United States Veterans' Administration office No. 30, at Milwaukee, furnishing me with information corrective and explanatory of the previous insertion. I ask permission to insert Mr. Cullen's letter herewith.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that in furnishing me with the information on which the August 21 insertion was based, Mr. Gordon Huseby, director of the Wisconsin department of veterans' affairs, meant not the slightest criticism of the Veterans' Administration office at Milwaukee. Mr. Huseby recognizes, as I do, that Mr. Cullen has done, and is doing, a fine job for Wisconsin's veterans. Wisconsin veterans are fortunate in having men of the caliber of Gordon Huseby and John Cullen to direct the State and Federal agencies which administer the veterans' programs in Wisconsin. If there is any rivalry at all between the two, it is not a personal rivalry. Rather, it is a healthy and friendly contest of doing the most, in the most effective and efficient manner, for the veterans of the Badger State. The letter follows:

REGIONAL OFFICE No. 30,
Milwaukee, Wis., December 11, 1950.

Hon. GLENN R. DAVIS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. DAVIS: On page A5945 in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for August 21, 1950, the following extension of remarks by you was published:

"Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I have just received information from Gordon A. Huseby, director of the department of veterans' affairs of the State of Wisconsin, that the Wisconsin department of veterans' affairs, in 9 months, has either completed or committed funds for 1,271 housing loans for a total of $1,905,600. This represents a remarkable record for the first 9 months of operation of this work.

"It is interesting to note how this record compares with the record of Federal agencies in making loans to veterans and other individuals. During the first year of its operation, 1935, the Federal Housing Authority completed 255 loans in the State of Wisconsin. During the first year of its loan operations, 1945, the Veterans' Administration completed 628 loans in the State of Wisconsin.

"As Mr. Huseby aptly put it in a letter dated August 16, 1950: 'I think our record will stand on its own.'"

It is believed that the correct figures and circumstances with regard to Veterans' Administration loan guaranty activities for the year 1945 will be of interest to you. You appreciate, I know, that during most of that year the majority of veterans, including yourself, were still in service. During 1945 we received a total of 987 applications for loan guaranties. Of this number, 868 were approved, 81 were declined or withdrawn and the balance of 38 were pending at the end of the year. Having received only 987 applications, we could hardly, during our first year of operation, have exceeded the 1,271 housing loans completed or committed during the first 9 months of the State loan program. It will also be appreciated that our applications covered not only those for home loans but also those for farm and business loans.

I thought you would wish to have this information and I think that the loan guaranty record of the Veterans' Administration regional office for Wisconsin during the year 1945 can also stand on its own.

Yours sincerely,

J. P. CULLEN,
Manager.

If We Are To Come Through the Next Grim Half of This Twentieth Century Still a Republic of Free People, We Will Need All of Our Courage and Brains

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD H. REES
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. REES. Mr. Speaker, under consent heretofore approved by the House, I am submitting a timely editorial by W. L. White, my fellow townsman, and distinguished editor of the Emporia Gazette. The editorial contains food for thought and is worthy of your reading. It follows:

Six months have gone by and where are we?

The total number of Americans killed, wounded, and captured in Korea to date make this the fourth bloodiest struggle in our Nation's history—surpassing in casualties the American Revolution, the War of 1812, the Mexican War, and the Spanish-American War.

And the goal of it all? Well, it seems there should be free elections in Korea. But why did we wake up to the value of free elections so late? Why, when we were powerful, did we not insist on free elections in Poland, in Hungary, in Rumania, in Yugoslavia, in Czechoslovakia, in East Germany, and in the Baltic States? Why do we suddenly begin to shriek for a free election in Korea, a backward country which, in all its 3,000 years of history, never has had free elections nor seemed particularly to miss them?

But you forget political considerations. Last spring Republican Senator JOSEPH MCCARTHY had aired his charges against Owen Lattimore, including a number of which Dr. Lattimore probably was innocent. The martyred St. Owen of Lattimore was declared politically pure and ideologically virginal by MILLARD TYDINGS and the other Senate Democrats, and promptly sat down to write of his ordeal of slander. But the country was uneasy. For obviously much had been smothered under whitewash or suppressed, including the smelly Amerasia case.

At this moment there came what seemed to be, from the political standpoint, the Heaven-sent opportunity of Korea. It promised to be a quick, popular little war against a weak enemy, and in behalf of the true, the beautiful, and the good. The unbearable vulgarities of JOE MCCARTHY would be drowned out by bugle and drum. Who then would dare say the Truman administration was not firmly anticommunistic? And so into Korea were sent not Dr. Lattimore, not Dean Acheson—but the little American draftees from Japan. The frailties of our statesmen were to be glossed over by the blood (in modest quantities) of our sons.

We are therefore now at war in Asia, and, furthermore, our outnumbered soldiers are now hightailing it down the valleys of Korea in the most humiliating spectacle the American flag ever has flapped over since the Battle of Bull Run. How did we get into it? Somewhere in the bookcase you surely must have a copy of that half-forgotten document, the Constitution of the United States. Pull it out and in the fine type you will find that the Congress and only the Congress shall have the power to declare war and make peace.

But don't be old-fashioned. That cumbersome contraption of representative government was set up by those old fuddy-duddies, our founding fathers. A congressional debate on whether or not to go into Korea would have meant weeks of delay; in the end Congress might have decided to stay out altogether.

Readers of this column will remember that the Gazette was in favor of standing up to Stalin as early as 5 years ago when our truly magnificent armies were still intact, and when Harry S. Truman was a happy fellow-traveler who had not yet discovered the horrid Soviet menace.

In view of this fact the writer presumes now to list five guideposts to a future American foreign policy. These are:

1. Since we are now pitiably weak, we should for the moment avoid hopping carelessly into wars which we cannot hope to win.

2. We should not concentrate all our forces in one distant isolated spot. Almost everything we have is now packed into Korea; if hell should break out in Europe, we have left only the Eighty-second Airborne Division to put between Stalin's 300 divisions and the Atlantic Ocean.

3. We should avoid war to capture regions which are strategically worthless and which, if we won them, would be a further liability.

4. When we are losing a war in a distant area, we should not be offended when a nearby ally offers help. (Stalin is winning this Korean war without the loss of a single Russian life, whereas Dean Acheson virtually turned down Chiang Kai-shek's offer to send 200,000 anti-Communist Chinese fighting men into Korea; Mr. Acheson felt this might offend those peace-loving agrarian reformers, the Chinese Communists.)

5. Until we are stronger (should Moscow allow us the time to get stronger) we should try to cut to a bare minimum the number of wars we enter solely to win local American elections.

The writer feels that we are now entering a period of terrible stress, in which, if this Nation and all Christendom are to survive, we will need the same steady wisdom, solid character, and firm courage that our people had in Lincoln's day. As a flabby, rich, and stupid nation we cannot hope to survive. We can no longer continue fat, dumb, and happy, babbling that this is the century of the common man, electing to high office any grinning dummy who will pledge himself to bribe us with paper-dollar subsidies paid out of our own public Treasury, stupidly believing that if the Kremlin cannot be appeased, then it can be quickly licked in a bloodless push-button war.

If we are to come through the next grim half of this twentieth century still a republic of free people we will need all of our courage and brains. We cannot hope to survive the storm with a government which is by the nincompoops, of the bird-brains, and for the greedy dimwits. Because of its follies such a government will surely and deservedly perish from the earth, and all the sane and all the brave will be crunched in the wreckage of its crash.

Vermont Society Honors Hon. Charles A. Plumley, of Vermont

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NORRIS COTTON
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. COTTON. Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday evening, December 6, the Vermont State Society of Washington held a meeting in honor of the Honorable CHARLES A. PLUMLEY, who is about to retire voluntarily as Representative at Large for the State of Vermont. As a near neighbor and warm friend of our distinguished colleague from Vermont, I desire, under leave to extend my remarks, to include an account of this meeting written by one of the members present. I am sure it will be of interest to all Members of the House who hold Mr. PLUMLEY in such high regard:

A HISTORICAL VERMONT EVENT

After the bountiful repast and the election of officers had been had, the master of ceremonies called on GEORGE AIKEN, pardon me, I mean Senator AIKEN. Among the other things he said was the first radio speech he ever made was in support of CHARLES A. PLUMLEY as a candidate for Congress. He went on to say he never regretted he made the speech although at the time there were a lot of people very ready to cut his throat.

Then Mrs. Dale, the widow of the late Senator Porter H. Dale, paid a wonderful tribute to Mr. PLUMLEY's father and to Mr. and Mrs. Plumley and the family, all of whom she had known over long years so intimately. In conversation, she said, "The Plumleys really are and have been a part of Vermont. Charlie's father and mother were both educated in Vermont. He and his wife were both born and educated in Vermont. Their children are graduates of Vermont universities and colleges. In short, she said, they are Vermonters from the roots up."

The gracious lady outdid herself.

I just couldn't see how Mr. PLUMLEY could take it the way he did although I noticed that he was blowing his nose once in a while.

Then they called on Col. Jack Crowley, who once was a candidate against Mr. PLUMLEY for nomination to Congress. His tribute to Mr. PLUMLEY was what might be called a jewel.

Then they called on CHARLIE to speak in rebuttal. That he was deeply moved by all the things that had been said was very evident. He came back at them, however, by saying that, "It is not every man who has an opportunity living to attend his own funeral." He said he didn't like these things although he came because he had been invited as a guest despite the fact that his experience over the years had shown that such observations and celebrations were the end of one's official connection with either the State or the Government and ordinarily spelled an end which he did not anticipate for he was not superstitious. Then he told them the story about the lady who had a very jealous husband. She was being solicited by a book agent on the thirteenth floor of an apartment house. Just about the time she was all ready to buy the books she heard the key turn in the lock of the door and she said to the book agent, "You better get out of here quick because my husband is intensely and insanely jealous." The salesman said he would hide in the closet, to which the housewife replied there was no closet. She said, "The only thing for you to do is jump." "But," he said, "this is the thirteenth floor." To which she replied, "Don't be superstitious."

Then in response to what Senator AIKEN had said about his first radio speech, Charlie said he recalled a day before George was ever a candidate for office and when he was operating the Aiken florist business at Putney. As he was in a hurry to make a delivery at Brattleboro, he was stopped by the police, who said, "Don't you know, George, you're exceeding the speed limit?" and George said, "I don't know whether my speedometer works or not." Whereupon the police officer said, "Haven't you any governor in the car?" to which George, later governor of the State and a very distinguished United States Senator, as we all know, said, "No, the governor is in Montpelier, what you smell is fertilizer."

Thereupon George, pardon, the senior Senator from Vermont, read the following letter from RALPH FLANDERS, the junior Senator from Vermont:

"CHARLES PLUMLEY is a Vermont institution. More people in our State have shaken hands with him, have known him, and like him, than is the case with any other of our citizens.

"That we like Mrs. Plumley, too, does not have to be stated. In fact, if it were possible for us to like anyone more than we do Charles, it would be his good wife to whom Vermonters in exile here in Washington are glad to pay a tribute of praise.

"The Honorable Charles is an institution not only in Vermont but in the House of Representatives. Having been there since 1933, he would naturally know a lot of people and have a lot of influence. But he has far more of acquaintance and influence than comes by his service of 18 years. The place he holds did not drop into his lap. He made it.

"He has always represented the old Vermont traditions. He thinks our thoughts and speaks our language. We are glad to feel sure that he will spend his days of retirement in our State, in his home town, though we are willing that he should go South during mudtime, if not before.

"To Mr. and Mrs. Plumley, Mrs. Flanders and I, unable to be present, join with you in extending our admiration, affection, and hearty good wishes.

"RALPH E. FLANDERS."

If anything could have "floored" the sole Representative from the State of Vermont, this should have done it. But, after a moment or two of hesitation, he rose in rebuttal to say:

"Sometimes I think I am a moron, but I think I know enough to take a hint. I think it is time for me to proceed. I am not like the boy who left his girl's house so early that his friends asked him why; to which he replied, 'Well, you see, she and I were sitting on the sofy—we were sitting kinda togetherlike and kinda talking. Her folks had all gone to bed. I was trying to get up my courage to move up a little toward her when she turned out the light. Don't you know I knew enough to take a hint—and so I left.'

"But," said PLUMLEY, "I just can't leave, and now, formally, and speaking for myself and Mrs. Plumley and for the record, we are deeply appreciative of all the kind things which have been said and done for us over the years we have enjoyed our membership in the Vermont Association.

"We appreciate the flowers, verbal and otherwise, for they are the sweetest things God ever made for they show thoughts that words cannot express and, as somebody said:

" 'I sometimes think that never blows so red
The rose as where some buried Caesar bled.'

"There are occasions and events to which only the heart responds. Words find their inadequacy because they are not opportune and cannot be spoken.

"For some 17 years we have been members of this association; have enjoyed your hospitality; been your neighbors—never unappreciatively.

"Now we come to the end of a long road for that in an official capacity we shall not longer enjoy your sufferance and your tolerance, nor your wholesale good will which so always has permeated all the meetings with you.

"That does not mean that old acquaintance should be forgot and we swear eternal friendship to all of you and those who have preceded you. I could reminisce, but I remember that La Rochefoucauld said once, 'Everyone complains of his lack of memory, but no one of his lack of judgment,' and that somebody else said that 'Nothing is more common than a fool with a strong memory'; so admittedly and of necessity I am going to shut up right now, period. I am not sure in which class I fit.

"You know it has been said also that people with good memories seldom remember anything worth remembering, but on top of that comes another who says memory is the power to gather roses in winter.

"I have listened with great interest and great pleasure to all things which have been said, deserved and undeserved. I would like to say to you Vermonters that I am not a quitter. Possibly had I recognized the situation in futurity which confronted me as of a year and a half ago, I might have still been a candidate for office because of my alleged information and a lot of things accumulated by experience over the years. The Government will always have the benefit of anything I know.

"Nevertheless, I thought, and still think, that some younger man should bear the burden of the responsibility for carrying out the ideas and the ideologies for which I have stood over the years as I have undertaken as your sole Representative to represent the State of Vermont.

"It will take a lot of that intestinal fortitude only born of those who are born to inherit that fearlessness, minus foolishness, which is only to be found, still—and I don't mean quiet, but I mean yet—in a few of the States of this Union, of which Vermont stands out predominantly, to undertake and to preserve from complete communization, socialism, and destruction the ideals of democracy for which our founding fathers fought, and I have incessantly undertaken to maintain.

"What a horrible situation obtains in Korea, and world-wide, civilian and military; in what an awful situation the United States of America finds itself as it confronts world war III, which is now already in progress. I declare no responsibility for it can be attached to me nor to the representatives of the State of Vermont.

"I am not much at poetry, but the following occurred to me and I wrote it:

"I WONDER

"As once I wandered at eventide alone
In rain-drenched garden paths through flowers and weeds,
I wondered if any day and sun would ever follow to atone
For all the wind and dark had done; to which no heed in world at large
Is paid by those who idly pass to waste both lives and time and money never earned,
Lightly burdened by thought or care of whence these came or what a burden some must bear
To save us from the catastrophic flair
For reckless, wicked waste of things they claim do make men great!

"Still stand I wondering what will be their fate—
The fate of those who measure not nor calculate
The depth to which by ill-considered recklessness with lives of other people's sons, and dollars, not their own,
They have condemned those generations yet unborn
To travail such as other age has never known.

"But I found respite, if not relief, in that which my friend Hurd said who put me in my place poetically and otherwise when he wrote:

" 'The scythe that severs life lays waste the world:
The hate which cumulates to wrath is hurled
Against the peace which trembled like a flower
Upon the stalk of hope. The fatal hour
Has struck. * * * Is this the end
Of Hope? The ultimate for which men spend
Their years in never-ending toil and sweat?
Is this the doom to which our days curvet
Like moths unable to resist the light
Whose flame is death?'

" 'Thus fell the boasted might
Of Nineveh and Troy * * * thus Carthage fell * * *
And Babylon. Shall future centuries tell
A similar story of our rise and fall
To depths too deep for resurrection? Call
The roll of systems grown obese and weak
From glutton: apply the pure critique
Of reason to historic facts and know
The ageless truth that nations cannot sow
The retroactive earth with hate and reap
The fruits of love. Oblivion lies deep
Upon the names of tyrant men and states.
Be not deceived, for time reiterates
The unlearned lessons of the fruitless past.

" 'The slashing scythe cannot destroy the vast Insistency within the root. The ground
Grows quick with promise: without audible sound
Or visible motion, life thrusts toward the light
Like secretive grass that grows despite
The devastation of the scythe. Madmen sow
The soil with steel, indifferent to woe
Implanted: ignorant of Nemesis.
Tomorrow is a deep and dark abyss
Into which the cruel and unjust
Will slide and vanish. Empires fall to dust—
Democracies will follow if they dare
To break eternal faith with man—despair
Is fertile soil for change. Lay waste the earth—
Apply the blade to beauty and to mirth—
Reduce each city to a cluttered grave—
Destruction is not final if we save
A single fibered root of freedom. Now
Is not forever! Wait! Somewhere, somehow
The severed stalk of liberty shall rise,
Grow green, and flower under friendlier skies.'

"So, as my valedictory to this association which I have loved, I would like to leave you with the thought in your mind that I said to you that once I stood in admiration before the tomb of Shakespeare in the church at Stratford; another time I stood in awe before the tomb of the mighty Napoleon in the Invalides at Paris. Often I have stood in suspense before the tomb of the Father of our Country at Mount Vernon. Last Sunday I went again to the tomb of Lincoln. I wanted a message from him to give to you tonight. His spirits seemed to say: 'Go tell my fellow Americans and particularly Vermonters, in these days of stress and conflict everywhere, to be brave and have no fear. Tell them to stand by any man who stands right; stand by him while he is right and part from him when he goes wrong. Tell him that we here highly resolve * * * that government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth.'"

The Need for Allies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE L. HAYS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a column from the Washington Post of Monday, December 18, 1950, by Messrs. Joseph and Stewart Alsop. I believe that their thoughtful discussion of our need for allies warrants the attention of the Members of the Congress:

THE NEED FOR ALLIES

(By Joseph and Stewart Alsop)

A new, extreme isolationism is being born of the defeatism that now horribly pervades this confused city. No leading figure has as yet dared to give public voice to this important trend. But all over Washington, in the lobbies of the Senate and House, among the more tremulous policy makers, and even in the recesses of the military staff the same subterranean muttering is going on.

Our allies cannot be depended on. We have not the power to carry the burden of world leadership alone. We must contract our "commitments" (the new catchword). We must abandon first Asia and then Europe to their fate. We must retire into our own hemisphere, which we can defend. So goes the story. It makes even Senator ROBERT A. TAFT, who at least proposed a Monroe Doctrine for Europe, look like a rabid one-world man.

The simplest way to see the poisonous falsehood of this reasoning is to have a look at the effect on the value of our only major military asset, the stockpile of atomic weapons. To put the cart of conclusion before the horse of proof, the atomic stockpile which is our only security will lose almost its whole value, if the above-outlined program is blundered into or adopted.

The causes are plain enough. In the first place, plutonium and even hydrogen bombs, no matter how numerous they may be, or how great their destructive power may be, have no value whatever locked up in a cave in Kentucky. They must be delivered to their destined targets, or at least they must be possible to deliver, in order to fulfill their purpose. As of today and for a long time to come, the value of our atomic stockpile must therefore be measured by the capabilities of our strategic air arm.

The strategic air arm is presently composed of 14 groups, of which four are B–36 groups designed to strike targets in the Soviet Union from bases in this hemisphere, and 10 are medium-range groups equipped with B–29's, B–50's, and B–47's. Improvements in Soviet air defenses in recent months have considerably depreciated the worth of the B–36 groups, since so many other characteristics had to be sacrificed to build great range into this airplane. Hence the medium-range groups, which are all to be equipped eventually with the admirable B–47, must be regarded as vitally important.

The worth of these medium-range groups in turn obviously depends upon the availability of bases for them. By the tricky method of refueling in the air, they can in theory reach targets in the Soviet Union from airfields on this side of the Atlantic. But in practice, even the enthusiasts frankly admit that the efficiency of the strategic air arm will be hopelessly impaired if these medium-range groups, which now comprise over two-thirds of the total force, are denied bases overseas.

At the moment, the necessary overseas bases are available and ready. They comprise the large airfield complex that has been built up in eastern England; another important complex in the British-controlled north African region of Cyrenaica; a vital, very advanced base on the British-controlled island of Cyprus; bases now abuilding in French North Africa; and airfields used by us as transport bases in Tripoli and at Dahran in Arabia. A glance at this list reveals what is now rapidly becoming almost the central fact in the strategic situation of the United States.

We may control the atomic stockpile, but our allies, and particularly Great Britain, control most of the bases we need to give the atomic stockpile any value.

There are a thousand other reasons, of course, why the program of abandoning our allies to their fate and withdrawing to our hemisphere is a quick way to national suicide. Some of them will be examined in a subsequent report. Meanwhile, the significance of the situation outlined above ought to be faced by every American. We have gone on smugly for 5 years, supposing the atomic bomb was ours to use or not to use, as we alone saw fit. We have gone on smugly for 5 years, neglecting our own defense and the defense of the free world, and relying for security on this magical weapon.

But we have been wrong. When Prime Minister Attlee told Parliament the other day that he was sure we would not use our bombs without consulting the British Government, his promise was doubly guaranteed by the facts of geography and the ranges of our airplanes. If now, in the hour of peril, we abandon our allies, we cannot hope that they will not abandon us. And thus, those American leaders who are secretly advocating this course today, and will no doubt publicly advocate it tomorrow, are in truth proposing that the United States freeze its only military asset, the atomic stockpile, which is also, at the moment, the only defense of the free world.

Would Bomb Shelters Become Traps?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH P. O'HARA
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Fairmont Daily Sentinel, of Fairmont, Minn., of December 6, 1950:

WOULD BOMB SHELTERS BECOME TRAPS?

There is talk of spending around $3,000,000,000 for bomb shelters in the United States.

Maybe it's a good idea, but it would appear Congress should go pretty thoroughly into the plans before saddling such added expense on the American taxpayer.

While details of construction, and perhaps location of such shelters could not be made public in too great detail for security reasons, to the uninitiated it would seem that bomb shelters might well turn out to be traps instead of shelters, in case of attack.

What more could an attacking armada ask than to have its victims bunched in one place?

Liberty Shall Not Cringe in the Face of Brute Force

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL ELLIOTT
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, in 1950 the Southland answered the call to arms, just as it has done in every war in which this Nation has engaged itself. It has again demonstrated its willingness to sacrifice in order that our common country remain free, independent, the land of hope.

In this connection it is a privilege for me to include as a part of my remarks, an editorial by my friend, W. W. Gunter, editor of the Mountain Eagle, Jasper, Ala., in which Editor Gunter expresses the sentiment that America must unite and make the sacrifices which the times call for in a spirit of true patriotism:

THE SOUTH IS DEPENDABLE

How strange it is that in this most wonderful of all ages, with its manifold conveniences and opportunities, that there should exist in the world today powerful nations who choose to scatter the flames of war over the world in a coordinated effort to impose their totalitarian form of government over all the people of the world.

While the free nations of the world are facing a danger unprecedented in the history of nations, the old, romantic South stands ready again to make any sacrifice necessary along with the rest of the Nation in order that this Nation shall remain free and independent.

The southern people are noted for their cheerful disposition and for their courage under difficulties in the past. During the darkest days of the Revolution, southern soldiers, poorly equipped, remained cheerful and hopeful. And thus it was with the heroic Confederate soldiers as they filed their weary ways through the mountain passes of Tennessee, North Carolina and South Carolina, and fell in line in the Valley of Virginia; it was not with dread and fear pictured on their faces but with gay songs of their beautiful Southland and their wives and sweethearts left behind. Neither are their descendants discouraged today.

Through two great wars, descendants of Confederate soldiers from the Southland have gone out and fought side by side with sons and daughters of other States on the battlefields of Europe, in other lands, and the islands of the sea, and many of them never returned with their victorious comrades.

Insofar as the southern people are concerned, the great sacrifices made by this Nation in the past shall not have been made in vain, that liberty shall not cringe in the face of brute force, that through the coming years the Statue of Liberty shall continue to stand there in New York Harbor, looking forever toward the east, serving as a beacon light to the people of the world who seek the blessings of liberty.

Free Ireland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following article which appeared in the Washington Post, Saturday, December 16, 1950:

IRELAND AND ATLANTIC SECURITY

On April 18 of this year I had the honor to address the Overseas Writers' Press Club at Washington on the subject of Ireland's place in the North Atlantic defense scheme.

At that time I urged the vital necessity of a sound political background to military planning, indicating from recent history (World War II) the disasters inherent in the failure of politicians to provide the military command with a realistic basis for their plans and operations. On such occasions the overlooking of some political factor not readily apparent to the military mind causes military action to be based on faulty premises.

I fear this has once again proved true in Korea both when the North Koreans attacked initially and when the Chinese invasion completely altered the military basis. Absence of a sound political background to military operations normally causes initial deployment of unduly weak forces within effective striking distance of a superior enemy. In such circumstances, I suggested, a wise commander should have in mind the worst possible case as well as the best possible case.

Fortunately reverses in Korea do not directly threaten the safety of the powerhouse and main base of the free world, the United States, to the degree that a similar series of defeats in northwestern Europe, resulting in the overrunning of the British Isles, would compromise American security.

Whoever the American designated to command in the northeastern Atlantic theater, he must remember that he cannot afford to ignore the worst possible case; indeed he must initially face the fact that that case already obtains, since there is nothing to prevent Russia from reaching the Atlantic coast and the Channel within 3 weeks of his assuming command and, should that occur, Russia will not repeat Hitler's unpreparedness for a trans-Channel operation. Russia's object will be the expulsion of America from Europe.

Initially the best he can hope to achieve will be the retention of the eastern Atlantic islands, Iceland, Britain, Ireland, and the Breton and Iberian peninsulas. It will be more important politically and strategically to arm and integrate Spain than to rebuild German forces. French "national redoubts" in Brittany and on the Garonne should have priority over a new Maginot Line, and a united reintegrated Ireland is vital to the over-all concept. Indeed his headquarters could better command from Limerick than from London or Paris.

Much as Americans will sympathize with those European nations in the Atlantic Pact for whom military security cannot at present be provided we must none of us sacrifice the substance for the shadow; for complete defense of the Western European zone must remain a shadow until there are at least 50 efficient combat divisions deployed in Germany.

The retention of Britain must be the keystone of our immediate planning. Britain is perfectly able to guard her own southern and eastern coast line, but her situation would be gravely weakened were Russia to secure a footing in central Ireland in conjunction with an invasion of Britain. Russia might well invade Ireland by air with impunity at the most critical moment for Britain. Free Ireland, outside the Atlantic Pact, and excluded from participation in the pact, because of her dispute with Britain over northern Ireland could not at present dispose of a Russian airborne invasion.

Thus a divided Ireland becomes the Achilles heel of Atlantic Pact strategy and will remain so for at least two more critical years. Alternatively, an integrated and reunited Ireland, defended by Irishmen in conjunction with the United States of America, provides an absolutely secure base for the defense of the Atlantic fringe of Western Europe, which is all of Europe our means will allow us to defend with certainty.

In this context the defense of Ireland becomes of greater importance to the Atlantic community than the defense of London. It is the bounden duty of the high political chiefs to give their military chief a clear-cut political background against which he can plan realistic strategy. He must be free to deal with Ireland, Spain, Portugal, and France as well as with Britain without cramping political restrictions.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH P. O'HARA
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial comments of Mr. Claude N. Swanson, editor of the Fairmont Daily Sentinel, of Fairmont, Minn., in the issues of December 5 and 7, 1950:

Before we go to making any further deals with Socialist Britain and helpless France, we'd best find out what we are to receive in return for the billions of good, hard-earned American dollars we've dumped in their laps. If they are not interested in helping themselves, what use is there to give them further aid at the expense of the American taxpayer. What we need now is help, not a couple of milistones around our necks.

The Nation will never be able to go forward in the war effort so long as Acheson remains in our State Department. Not only do the American people lack confidence in him, but his record of handling our foreign affairs to date is nothing in his favor. Besides, his close friendship with Alger Hiss, and other out-and-out Reds that burrowed into the State Department should make him a class-A subject for the skids.

The average American is not too concerned about a Government-provided pension, or other forms of security at the expense of the taxpayer. But he is concerned about the right and privilege to whittle out his own security, to be able to save for a home and for ultimate retirement and travel. He isn't interested in welfare projects thought up by an army of visionary, impractical swivel-chair nuts who ought to be out earning their own living.

Let Congress demand a full and above-board accounting of what is transpiring between President Truman, Secretary Acheson, the State Department and Socialist Britain's Clement Attlee. The American people don't care to have Yalta repeated. We want no secret commitments. If we can't be trusted, chances are it isn't good for us.

It's getting about cold enough for that luscious, peppery, steaming hot bean soup. With every bean preserved in its individual shell, the delicate flavor sealed in; the broth concocted of pure water, made savory with just the right amount of juice of slow-cooked ham hocks, bacon rind, a bit of parsley and seasoning to taste.

Let's kick Acheson and his fellow travelers out of the State Department and get people in there in whom the American people can have unquestioned confidence. Then we can start all over again with a united, unwavering front.

The Alabama Department of Aeronautics

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL ELLIOTT
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a statement of the origin, composition, and policies of the Alabama Department of Aeronautics, taken from Alabama Aviation News:

THE ALABAMA DEPARTMENT OF AERONAUTICS

ESTABLISHMENT AND DEVELOPMENT

The Alabama Department of Aeronautics was first established as the Alabama Aviation Commission by the 1935 Legislature through Act 493 (Senator Will Walton), approved September 13, 1935. It began operations on October 23, 1935. The 1943 legislature, through Act 248 (John Chichester), broadened the responsibilities of the Commission to include control over the safety of all aeronautical activity in the State.

In 1945 the Commission became a major agency when the legislature with Act 402 (Senator S. L. Toomer), created the Alabama Department of Aeronautics to replace the Alabama Aviation Commission. It was activated as such on October 16, 1945.

AIRPORT AMENDMENT

An amendment to the State constitution to authorize the State to engage in or assist airport construction, operations, etc. (Act 419—Henderson, Bradford, High, and Chichester), was authorized by the 1945 legislature, was approved at the general election on November 5, 1946, and was proclaimed part of the constitution on November 14, 1946.

AVIATION GASOLINE TAX ALLOCATION

The 1945 legislature passed an act allocating all revenue from the aviation gasoline tax to aeronautical purposes (Act 367—Chichester). Refunds were authorized to municipalities owning or operating public airports and the balance was assigned to this department.

ORGANIZATIONAL PATTERN

The department consists of the Alabama Aeronautics Commission, which is the governing body; the director of aeronautics, who is the executive officer; and the staff. The commission consists of seven members. Five are appointed by the governor and two are statutory, these being the director of the highway department, and the director of the department of public safety. The appointed members serve a 4-year term on a staggered basis. Each of the appointed members is, or has been, a pilot and aircraft owner. The director is appointed by the commission, subject to the approval of the governor, when initially appointed, and serves an indefinite term dependent on satisfactory service. Members of the staff must be, and are, selected from the State civil-service register in accordance with State law.

AERONAUTICAL JOB CLASSIFICATIONS

In June 1947 specific aeronautical job classifications were established for the department for the first time. These classifications fully cover administrative, aeronautical and engineering needs and will enable the department to keep pace with new activities as they arise and to render broader and more effective service.

EXPERIENCE OF PERSONNEL

The present director, who has served since 1935, is an overseas Air Force veteran of both World War I (France), and World War II (England), as a pilot and operations officer. He has been active in aviation since 1917. Every male member of the staff, with one exception, is also an Air Force veteran of World War II and one is also a veteran of World War I.

SERVICE AGENCY

At all times this department has considered itself as a service agency and has recognized that its primary considerations must be those of service. That has been its policy, and that has also been its record, all through the years back to 1935, when it was first established.

SERVICES RENDERED

This department feels that its service to Alabama aviation must cover the entire field of civil aviation and all the needs of Alabama aviation. In this connection its service has involved more than 300 distinct types of operations.

BUSINESS AGENCY

From the time of its establishment, in 1935, this department has been permitted to operate as a business agency, on a nonpolitical basis. It has, likewise, endeavored to operate as a business agency on a careful, effective, economical basis. All of the Commissioners, those of the present as well as those of the past, have all been businessmen, as well as pilots and aircraft owners.

To substantiate this, our budget requests for 1949–50 and 1950–51 were less than our 1948–49, when others were asking for increases; our expenditures for 1948–49 and 1949–50 were less than budget authorizations, and during the present fiscal year, 1950–51, there will also be substantial savings. When budget requests are submitted for fiscal years 1951–52 and 1952–53 we again expect to further reduce our expenses. Meanwhile, our service has not been impaired.

PROGRAM

This department is not operating aimlessly on a day-to-day, free-wheeling basis. Since it was changed from a minor agency to a major department in 1945, it has a definite operating program, with at least 22 major objectives. These constitute an orderly, progressive, and productive program to meet both current and future needs of Alabama aviation.

A Time To Take Heart and Renew Courage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH P. O'HARA

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Fairmont Daily Sentinel, of Fairmont, Minn., dated December 5, 1950:

A TIME TO TAKE HEART AND RENEW COURAGE

Memory of the living does not go back to a time when our Nation faced a more turbulent road ahead than it does right now, but this is not a time to lose heart; nor is it a time to give up.

It is a time, instead, to take heart, for the people are aroused as never before to the utter inadequacy of certain officials in high places, and before long they will be relegated to the scrap heap and men with courage and vision, unquestioned patriotism, and a devotion to our form of government will take their place.

Then, and not until then, will we pull out of the miasmal fog that has beclouded our world relationship for these many years.

We have no one to blame but ourselves for the condition that exists. With less than one-half of our qualified voters taking time to go to the polls, slightly more than 25 percent of these have put men in office who believe that charity should begin—not at home—but overseas. We have thrown away billions to buy friendship, and, now that friendship is needed, we find our beneficiaries looking out the window.

American Fishing Industry Should Be Protected

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RUSSELL V. MACK

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. MACK of Washington. Mr. Speaker, in the years prior to the late war, Japanese fishermen landed enormous hauls of fish from the ocean waters off the Pacific coast, from Alaska to Mexico, and then after packing this fish, often in floating canneries, dumped large quantities of their canned fish on the American market.

American fishermen and cannery workers could not compete with the low living standards and low wages of the Japanese workers. At a result the American fishing industry of the Pacific coast suffered grave injury financially and in employment.

The Japanese, by their attack on Pearl Harbor, blew themselves out of the American market, and to meet the demand for fish food the fishing industry of the Pacific coast was enormously expanded until it now employs about 50,000 people. Huge American investments have been made since Pearl Harbor in canneries and in fishing boats and gear. These investments and this employment will be irreparably impaired if the Japanese are permitted to resume their prewar practices of fishing anywhere they please off the Pacific coast and again engage in operating floating canneries off our shores for the packing of fish. These practices by the Japanese, if resumed, will again as in the past be the source of new international misunderstandings and disagreements that will disrupt rather than cement ties of friendship between the United States and Japan.

It is therefore vital that the State Department in negotiating a peace treaty with Japan bind the Japanese Government to respect the interests of the United States fishing industry to the end that the stability of the American industry will not be undermined, its fruitful source of employment destroyed and the likelihood of international misunderstandings be increased.

I append to these remarks an editorial from the Seattle Post-Intelligencer, of Seattle, Wash., one of the largest and most influential newspapers of the Pacific Northwest, setting forth the need for protection of the American fishing industry being made a part of any peace treaty negotiated with Japan. The Post-Intelligencer editorial follows:

THE FISHING INDUSTRIES

The American State Department has indicated an intention to write a formal peace treaty with Japan at the earliest possible date, a commendable intention from the standpoint of the many vital American interests involved.

But the restoration of normal relations with Japan does not require or justify the renewal of Japanese economic and commercial practices which depleted and all but destroyed the American fishing industries in our own waters before the war.

It is a matter of bitter memory to the labor and management elements of the entire Pacific fishing enterprise of the United States that the Japanese veritably mined the great fisheries of the Northeast Pacific Ocean, extending from Alaska to Mexico, in the prewar years.

With total disregard of the program of conservation to which American and Canadian fishermen adhered, the notorious and infamous Japanese floating canneries were bringing one of the Western World's richest sources of food to the point of extinction when the Pacific war intervened.

One of the first of the many acts of wisdom by General MacArthur as administrator of occupied Japan after the war was the restriction of Japanese fishing activity to prevent resumption of the wasteful and ruinous violation of American and Canadian waters in a manner that had previously amounted to deliberate plunder.

Any peace treaty concluded with Japan should include a permanent agreement to make this safeguard of our own fisheries an irrevocable part of the understanding upon which the future peace and prosperity of the American people must be based.

The American fisheries in the Pacific constitute a combination of industries valued at more than one-third of a billion dollars.

They provide a means of livelihood for more than 50,000 men.

But above and beyond that, they are an indispensable source of food to all of the American people.

It would be a mockery if our victory over Japan in the Pacific war should be nullified by our failure to make the Pacific fisheries secure against Japanese invasion and despoliation.

It was of little avail for American and Canadian fishermen before the war to husband the Pacific fishery resources upon which they depended for employment, when the Japanese fishing fleets turned our conservation program to their own profit.

It would be of no avail whatever for the United States and Canada to practice conservation in the vast fishing grounds of the Northeast Pacific Ocean in the future if the Japanese once more had opportunity to exploit the waters without restraint.

The impending peace treaty offers a perfect occasion, and perhaps the only occasion, for binding the Japanese Government to an agreement to respect one of the most vital of American interests in the Pacific, and that agreement should be one of the inviolable conditions of permanent peace in the Pacific.

Proposed Removal of Secretary Acheson

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HERBERT H. LEHMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, December 18 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, a statement which I made yesterday, December 17, on the subject of the demand by the Republican caucuses in the Senate and House for the removal of Secretary Acheson.

I also ask consent to have inserted immediately following my statement the following editorials: Editorial from the New York Times, December 16; editorial from the New York Post, December 16; editorial from the Washington Post, December 17; editorial from the Washington Star, December 17; article by Anne O'Hare McCormick which appeared in the New York Times, December 18.

There being no objection, the statement and newspaper comments were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DECEMBER 17, 1950.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR HERBERT H. LEHMAN, OF NEW YORK, IN SUPPORT OF SECRETARY OF STATE DEAN ACHESON

The partisan resolution demanding the removal of Secretary Acheson which was adopted by the Republican caucuses of both Houses of Congress has done our country a great disservice.

It can serve only to disrupt and confuse our people and our allies in this critical hour when the need for unity and determination is absolutely essential if we are to survive.

As for our enemies, the attack on Secretary Acheson and on American foreign policy has played directly into the hands of the Communists who have long regarded the Secretary of State as the chief spokesman of our Government's policies which block the Kremlin's aim to enslave the free world.

Secretary Acheson has handled the world relationships of our country with great skill and determination in the face of an indescribably difficult situation. Full credit should go to him for executing the policies which have bulwarked the free nations in their quest for peace and security.

He successfully implemented the Greek-Turkish aid program. He was largely responsible for the acceptance of the Marshall plan, the Atlantic Pact, the principle of military aid to Western Europe, and the decision to combat aggression in Korea and elsewhere with all the power of our great human and material resources. Finally he has consistently led our efforts to strengthen the United Nations as a great agency of peace and security.

I hope that this latest partisan attack will not handicap him on his present mission and in his difficult task of welding the nations of Western Europe into an effective line of defense. Failure at this time would be tragic.

Last Tuesday night I made a Nation-wide plea for unity. I concluded my address with the following words:

"Unity not only can be achieved, it must be achieved. But it cannot be achieved if one group or another seeks to make political capital out of national danger. It cannot be achieved if we are asked to sacrifice the cause we fight for as the price of unity. It cannot be achieved by insisting on the sacrifice of this official or that official on the public block of unjust and undeserved attack.

"And so with all the earnestness of my heart and soul I call upon both the Republican Party and the Democratic Party to forget about 1952 and to think and act only in terms of the security of our country and the peace of the world."

I renew that plea with all my force and earnestness.

[From the New York Times of December 16, 1950]

THE ATTACK ON MR. ACHESON

At a moment when a grave international crisis imposes on this country a state of national emergency calling for the widest possible national unity, the Republican leadership in Congress has seen fit to serve on President Truman a formal demand for the removal of Secretary Acheson. This is a partisan maneuver as unprecedented as it is irresponsible. It can only disrupt the growing national solidarity on the measures necessary to meet the perils facing us, throw both this country and our allies into confusion regarding our policies, and thus provide aid and comfort to our enemies.

Like every mortal, Secretary Acheson is not without fault and has made his share of mistakes, especially in attempting to support a bankrupt far eastern policy for which his predecessors must bear the prime responsibility. But he is also one of the first in our Government who, in advance of many of his critics, recognized the real nature of the Soviet threat, warned against it, and helped achieve the revolutionary change in our foreign and defense policies in the direction of firm resistance to Communist aggression.

Mr. Acheson supported before Congress the first concrete step in such resistance—the Truman doctrine, which provided aid to Greece and Turkey. He was the first to expound the idea of foreign economic aid that grew into the Marshall plan, which saved Western Europe from the Communist tide. He was among the first to emphasize that a policy of resistance had to be backed by strength, and it was he who negotiated the revolutionary North Atlantic Pact and initiated the measures for the rearmament of Western Europe, including Western Germany. Finally, when the chips were down and Communist armies began to march in Korea, he was one of the first and stanchest advocates of resistance.

In these circumstances it is more than irony that the Republican leadership in Congress should have chosen to attack him with allegations of appeasement and softness toward communism.

[From the New York Post of December 16, 1950]

THE KNOW-NOTHINGS TAKE OVER

In our political annals December 15, 1950, will be remembered as one of the most wretched days of partisan infamy. On that day Republicans in both the Senate and House voted to plunge their knives into the back of America's Secretary of State at perhaps the gravest diplomatic moment in our history.

They didn't tell the country how they would have averted the present crisis if they had ruled our foreign policy; they could hardly pretend to do so because so many of them had voted against even minimum measures of military and economic defense in Korea and other places. Neither did they offer their formula for the solution of the problems we face; they could not do so because they could not agree among themselves as to where we should go from here. They neither urged that we declare war nor told us how to wage peace. All they could offer the Nation at this critical juncture was a demand for the execution of Dean Acheson. On this point the Communists abroad and at home have been way ahead of the Republicans. They have been crying for Acheson's head for many months and they will dance in the streets if the Grand Old Party succeeds in destroying him.

There were thoughtful Republicans in both Houses who refused to support this cynical and vindictive attack against the man who is laboring day and night to achieve an honorable peace. But they could not make their voices heard amid the clamor of the know-nothings. It was a tragic day for the country and for the GOP—the day on which the irresponsibles assumed full command of the party which calls itself the loyal opposition.

[From the Washington Post of December 17, 1950]

BLOW TO UNITY

The most critical aspect of the Republican call for the dismissal of Secretary Acheson is that it comes from a partisan source. It is undoubtedly true that a substantial segment of the American people would like to see Mr. Acheson replaced. The Republicans in Congress and many nonpartisan observers have lost no opportunity to let the President know their attitude, and it is reasonable to assume that the President has been weighing the question of whether a change of leadership in the State Department would do more harm than good. But this in no way excuses the Republicans from making a partisan issue of a matter that is vital to our security at this critical moment.

Of course, the President does not need to take any notice of this minority protest from Capitol Hill. The anti-Acheson resolutions were adopted only by the Republican caucuses of the House and Senate, not by Congress itself. And even if Congress had presumed to urge the dismissal of a Cabinet member, the President would be under no obligation to heed it. The entire executive power is vested in the President, and members of the Cabinet are responsible only to him. Mr. Truman is likely to respond to this pressure much as Lincoln did when congressional critics demanded the resignation of Secretary of State Seward during the Civil War.

In many respects the campaign against Seward is comparable to that against Mr. Acheson. Seward was resisting the demands of the extremists in Congress for immediate abolition of slavery and a purge of all Democratic generals from the Army. For this he was denounced as the evil genius of the administration—the mesmerist and the unseen hand who was preventing the President from doing his duty. When a group of New York Republicans waited on Lincoln to demand Seward's dismissal, he told them flatly: "There is not one of you who would not see the country ruined if you could turn out Seward."

In December 1862, shortly after the battle of Fredericksburg, the Republican Senators met secretly and adopted a resolution calling for partial reconstruction of the Cabinet. But instead of broadcasting their lack of confidence in the Secretary of State at a critical moment, a committee went to the White House to present the senatorial view to the President. Learning the nature of the mission, Seward hastily sent his resignation to Lincoln, but, after a skillful maneuver that brought in also the resignation of Secretary of the Treasury Chase, a favorite of the Senators, the President declined to accept either of them. Seward's critics had overplayed their hand, and the net result was to strengthen both his position and that of the President before the country.

Whatever may be the effect of the present Republican gesture on the future of Mr. Acheson, it has certainly rendered a disservice to the country. Senator ALEXANDER SMITH hit the nail on the head when he declared that the action his fellow Republicans in the Senate were rushing toward might mislead the world as to the fundamental unity of the American people. That demonstration of disunity was made worse by the fact that it came just before Secretary Acheson departs for Brussels to attend the meeting of the North Atlantic Council.

In a last-minute effort to avoid the inevitable interpretation that will be placed on the incident abroad, the Senate Republicans added to their resolution a paragraph by Senator TAFT pledging our fullest cooperation with the President and the administration in a united effort to meet by the most effective means the present, national crisis. If this stood by itself, it would be a commendable and patriotic expression. But as a postscript to the demand for the scalp of Mr. Acheson, who, of course, is part of the administration, it seems to be meaningless, insincere, and contradictory. An offer by the minority to cooperate with the party in power on condition that the minority be permitted to purge the President's Cabinet is not cooperation but the opposite. There is no way to disguise this blow to unity in a time of national peril, and it will be difficult indeed to undo the damage it has done.

[From the Washington Star of December 17, 1950]

A RECKLESS GESTURE

Republicans in Congress may be correct in saying that Secretary Acheson and the State Department have lost the confidence of Congress and of the American people.

If it is a fact that this is so, however, the reasons behind it are not those implied by the Republicans in their resolution calling for the dismissal of Mr. Acheson and a housecleaning of his Department.

The implication is that the policies pursued by Mr. Acheson and the personnel of the State Department are responsible for this alleged loss of confidence.

But the real explanation is the "get-Acheson" campaign which began as a preelection partisan maneuver and which was marked by a measure of distortion and falsehood which seldom has been equaled. Without doubt the campaign was effective. Without doubt it shook the confidence of many Americans and offered them a convenient scapegoat. It presented an easy method of rationalizing the accumulated fears, discomfitures, and disillusionments which have been a part of the postwar period.

If it were the Acheson policies which lost the confidence of the American people, the Republicans in Congress should have named them—spelled them out, as indictments of the man to be punished. But of course this could not be done. For Republicans in Congress, or most of them, have supported these policies, helped to implement them by the expenditure of billions of dollars approved by Congress. The Republicans leave unmentioned the specifications of their charges. They continue the tactic of the smear which supported the preelection campaign against Mr. Acheson and which culminated in the resolution.

What they have done now is apt to have a far more injurious effect on the country than on Mr. Acheson. Lacking the determination and integrity which are a part of his character, Mr. Acheson would doubtless welcome the personal release from heavy responsibility which his resignation would bring. It may be that the Republicans in Congress have made his position intolerable as it is and he may have to go.

But if he does have to go, the circumstances of his going will offend the conscience of the country. It will mean that an able public servant has been hounded out of office by accusations that for the most part are unnamed and unproved, accusations which are given color only by a dangerous sort of irresponsibility that suggests hysteria.

The action of the Republicans, taken on the eve of Mr. Acheson's departure for one of the most vital conferences in our history, ties his hands. His own strength and conviction may loosen those bonds. But the disservice which has been rendered the interests of our country in this critical period by the reckless action of the Republican minority is yet to be measured in full.

[From the New York Times of December 18, 1950]

ABROAD—ILL-TIMED BLOW TO AMERICAN DIPLOMACY

(By Anne O'Hare McCormick)

The Republican Members of Congress who assumed the grave responsibility of weakening the position of the United States in one of the most momentous conferences held since the war must have been so angry over our defeat in Asia that they lost all realization of the risk of defeat in Europe. They are reported to have debated whether to delay the demand for the resignation of Secretary Acheson until after the Brussels parleys, so evidently a few among them took some thought of the consequences of their action on the defense policy which today's meeting was expected to decide and set in motion. In spite of that consideration, however, they went ahead; in order to knife the Secretary of State they were ready to cut the ground from under American diplomacy in the most dangerous moment in our history.

Anybody who knows anything at all about the temper of Europe today trembles to think of the effect of this episode on governments that are already sorely beset by serious opposition to American leadership. All the continental regimes have to combat a popular aversion to arming and a keep-out-of-war-at-any-cost attitude. The Congressmen who advertise to the world their lack of confidence in Mr. Acheson, and by clear inference in the foreign policy of the United States, are most critical of Western Europe's reluctance to give full support to the American defense program. They forget that the Europeans feel, or try to feel, that we are going too far too fast—"pushing them toward war," or even "leading them into war," as many conservatives say in unconscious parroting of the Communists' line.

PROVIDING A GOOD EXCUSE

Now all these critics of our lead will find a good excuse for more delay. They will say that we are divided, that the course urged on them by Mr. Acheson is not all-American policy. They will plead the uncertainty of our course as a reason for moving more slowly. The crux of the European situation is that no country is able to defend itself without our help, and if there is strong doubt about our position the pull in the opposite direction, the tendency to give up the unequal fight, will grow and spread.

At present all that stands between Western Europe and Soviet aggression is a reservoir of confidence in American power. This confidence grows with every sign of strength on our part and is the point around which the armies will be rallied—are now being rallied, in fact—to protect Europe—and ourselves. The President's proclamation of emergency is a call to action intended to mobilize force abroad as well as at home. But when the official voice of the Republicans, or what will be interpreted as such in other countries, suggests at the same time that the country is divided, and that its spokesman at Brussels speaks only for one party, they play the game not only of the Russians but of all the waverers and defeatists on the other side.

In a moment of mounting peril in the west, there is something dangerously childish in the attempt to find a scapegoat for our reverses in the east. As far as China is concerned, the disaster was prepared for before he took office, and in Korea is largely due to a military weakness which he has been laboring to correct. And Korea is certainly no argument for scuttling allies because they are not doing enough to help us and themselves. The American dead on the beaches of Hungnam are a bitter warning that we cannot win alone. Victory in the fight against the terrible force ranged against us can be achieved only if the entire free world is armed and ready for the struggle.

The purpose of the Brussels Conference is to speed the arming. It was called to translate a paper organization into a real Atlantic defense force. Mr. Acheson is there to hurry up the process. His is the job of bridging the impasse that still exists on the terms of German rearmament. The decisions to be taken are of fateful importance for war or peace, and it is obvious that the American representative is severely handicapped by the vote of no-confidence that heralded his arrival.

IN DEBT TO VANDENBERG

The irresponsibly timed move of the Republicans, counteracted abroad in some degree by Governor Dewey's strong support of the Emergency Act, reveals how much the administration and the people of the country owe to Senator VANDENBERG. Since the war, thanks largely to his wise leadership, there has been no serious disunity on foreign policy. There is no real division now; the differences on China go deep, and the unreasonable feeling against Mr. Acheson grows out of it, but the people as a whole are ready to go as far as necessary in supporting the policy which the Secretary has developed. The emergency program is accepted with extraordinary unanimity.

If proof were needed of the value of this policy and this program it is furnished by the Soviet note accusing France and Britain of violating their treaties with Russia in moving to rearm Germany. Moscow is piling up threats of action if Western Germany is armed, and it is foolish to pretend they mean nothing; the thing Russia dreads most is the inclusion of Germany in a system of western defense. And the United States is certainly in weaker position than it was to push this program. It will not be surprising if developments in Washington and elsewhere strengthen the hand of those who favor a meeting with Stalin and desire to postpone the question of German armament until the Big Four makes one more attempt to negotiate a German settlement.

At Last We Face the Issue

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH P. O'HARA

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Fairmont Daily

Sentinel, of Fairmont, Minn., dated December 1, 1950:

AT LAST WE FACE THE ISSUE

With President Truman's firm stand, as expressed at a news conference in Washington Thursday, a matter of public record the entire Nation can present a united front from here on out in prosecuting the war to a successful close.

The President's statement Thursday was the first out-and-out admission that we are engaged in something more than a police action in Korea. It has been recognized for what it is, and what it has been since it started—war.

Now that the administration has publicly recognized it as such, the issues are no longer confused.

No longer can there be any excuse for temporizing.

No longer can there be any question on the part of our people whether or not we are for war. We are at war.

We will be called upon to pay more taxes. Let's pay them.

We will be called upon to buy war bonds. Let's buy them to the full extent of our ability.

We will be called upon to serve in the Army, the Navy, the Air Forces. Let us hope enough of us will be called, and in time, for time is of the essence.

We will be called to serve on the home front, to set up civilian defense, to sell bonds; to gather scrap iron and rubber. Let's not lag.

There will be bandages to sew.

There will be innumerable duties to perform to get the war effort under way, and all of these duties must be performed before the enemy can get ready—if possible, before he can strike.

Upon the degree and promptness of our response will depend whether or not the enemy will be able to bring war to our shores, to our cities and homes.

At last we squarely face the issue, recognize it for what it is, and we—all of us—will have a chance to do something to help. Let us not be too concerned about whether or not we will make peacetime profits for the duration of the war. Let us rather be concerned with hastening the day of victory—for without victory—it will not be a question of profit or loss, but one of survival.

Federal Assistance to Local and State Public Health Units

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, I have just received a letter from Dr. Ernest L. Stebbins, president of the National Health Council, which sums up the great need and support for H. R. 5865 to provide Federal assistance to local and State public-health units.

It is interesting to note that the American Medical Association—the only organization in opposition and the one which has successfully blocked the bill's being brought out on the floor—is a member of Dr. Stebbins' group.

Other members include practically every major health group in this country.

With permission to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD, I attach the communication from Dr. Stebbins, with his enclosures:

NATIONAL HEALTH COUNCIL,
New York, N. Y., December 13, 1950.

The Honorable ANDREW BIEMILLER,
Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BIEMILLER: Herewith are copies of Dr. Howard Rusk's column Civil Defense Plans Placed in Operation in Many Areas, and an editorial Another Defense Bill, both of which appeared in the New York Times of Sunday, December 10. Enclosed also is a copy of Another Health Bill, an editorial in the Washington Post of Monday, December 11. The views expressed point directly to the need for passage of the local health units bill, H. R. 5865, now awaiting action by the House Rules Committee.

The health protection aspects of the civil defense program add urgency to the long-standing need for such legislation. Public health workers and citizens throughout the country have been working to establish and maintain those community health services which only a local health department can provide. To date, the task is far from done; about one-third of our citizens are without this vital health protection. In H. R. 5865, Congress has the opportunity to supplement State and local resources with the limited assistance necessary to complete the job. In so doing it will make a significant contribution to national security.

As president of the National Health Council, I urge the immediate passage of this legislation. The board of directors of the council are on record in support of this bill. In addition, the following national agencies are supporting H. R. 5865 or the principles embodied in the bill: American Academy of Pediatrics; American Farm Bureau Federation; American Heart Association; American Parents Committee; American Public Health Association; American Social Hygiene Association; American Veterans' Committee; Association of State and Territorial Health Officers; General Federation of Women's Clubs; Midcentury White House Conference on Children and Youth; National Advisory Committee on Local Health Units; National Congress of Parents and Teachers; National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis; National Grange; National Health Assembly; National Organization for Public Health Nursing; National Tuberculosis Association; National Young Women's Christian Association; Spokesmen for Children; Young Men's Christian Association, International Council.

Again, I urge you in the public interest, and in view of the fact that this legislation has already been passed by the Senate as S. 522, to exert your influence to secure enactment of H. R. 5865 before adjournment of the Eighty-first Congress.

Sincerely yours,
ERNEST L. STEBBINS, M. D.,
President.

CIVIL DEFENSE PLANS PLACED IN OPERATION IN MANY AREAS—ONLY SIX STATES HAVE COMPLETE COVERAGE, BUT OTHERS SPEED HEALTH PROGRAMS

(By Howard A. Rusk, M. D.)

Paralleling the stepped-up tempo of military and industrial mobilization, steps have now been taken to move civil defense from a "standby basis" to an actual operating program. Since its organization in 1947 the National Security Resources Board has been responsible for developing plans for our civil defense in case of national emergency.

Now, in view of the present international tension President Truman has appointed Millard F. Caldwell, Jr., former Governor of Florida, as Civil Defense Administrator. In accordance with plans, the responsibility for civil defense will now be carried out by this new agency, as the Resources Board is a planning and coordinating rather than an operating agency.

Recognizing fully the all-important role of health and medical services in civil defense, the Board has been preparing a comprehensive official Federal guidebook of medical and health problems fundamental to civil defense. Leading authorities in all specialized aspects of health services have assisted in preparing the manual, which is now completed and in the Government Printing Office.

As W. Stuart Symington reported to the President in September, all planning done on the health and medical aspects of civil defense is based on using State commissioners of health as directors of civil defense health services, and local health officers as directors of local civil defense health services. This plan has been accepted as a most practical and effective administrative mechanism, but unfortunately nearly 30 percent of our citizens live in communities in which there are no full-time local health services.

COMPLETE COVERAGE IN SIX STATES

Only six States in the Nation now have complete local health services coverage in all counties. They are Maryland, Delaware, New Mexico, South Carolina, Alabama, and North Carolina, which added its final county recently.

There is almost complete coverage in California, Michigan, Florida, and Virginia. Kentucky, Louisiana, and Tennessee have organizations for nearly every county, but have many health officer vacancies.

In New York the State committee on Tuberculosis and Health of the State Charities Aid Association has announced a program to foster the development of county health departments next year, but at present there is no locally operated, full-time public health service in the rural areas, and even the smaller cities in 44 of New York's 57 up-State counties.

Steps toward remedying this situation were taken last year when the Senate, with bipartisan sponsorship and wide public support, unanimously adopted a bill authorizing Federal grants-in-aid specifically for local public health departments. The act provides Federal funds for at least six minimum functions of a local health department: Vital statistics, communicable disease control, maternity and child-hygiene services, environment sanitation, public-health laboratory services, and public-health education. Significantly, now there is the extra "bonus" in that it will provide the keystone for local civil defense planning for health services.

ACTION HELD UP BY WAR

Endorsed enthusiastically by 60 such groups as the National Congress of Parents and Teachers, American Medical Association, the National Grange, and the General Federation of Women's Clubs, an almost identical bill was passed by the House of Representatives during the Eightieth Congress. This year, when the bill reached the House, the Korean war had broken out, and it was shelved because of what were considered more pressing matters.

Events of the last few weeks, however, have shown clearly the need for all-out action in planning our civil defense, and that local public-health services will be the foundation of the medical hospitalization and health aspects of civil defense.

As Dr. William P. Shepard, president of the American Public Health Association, said recently, "Public-health services are the administrative backbone of civil defense. The immediate development of such services is not only requisite to the safeguarding of the health of the Nation in normal peacetime, but is given even greater urgency by the current demands for the establishment of adequate civilian defense against possible acts of aggression, including atomic, biological, chemical, and other devices of warfare directly affecting the civilian population."

That there is urgent necessity for immediate action by the House of Representatives is clear. One-third of the Nation is without the administrative organization for providing even normal local health services, let alone those necessary for civil defense. The provision of those services is as essential to our civil defense as weapons are to our fighting men.

ANOTHER DEFENSE BILL

Following the appointment last week of a new Civil Defense Administrator, the National Security Resources Board presented Congress with a $3,100,000,000 plan for civil defense. Listed by the President as a "must" for the present short session, prompt action will undoubtedly be taken on this measure.

As Dr. Howard A. Rusk points out elsewhere in this newspaper today, there is another bill currently in the House Rules Committee which is equally a "must" if we are to make full plans for medical and health services in civil defense. This is H. R. 5865, for Federal aid to establish local public health services. Its immediate passage is essential, for civil defense plans call for the administration of medical and health civil defense services by State and local public health officers. Added to the usual essential health services, there is need for special measures to enable civil defense organizations to deal with the problems arising from possible atomic, biological, and chemical warfare. These problems are primarily the responsibility of health and medical services, but today 40,000,000 of our citizens live in communities where there are no local full-time health services.

H. R. 5865 would help remedy this by giving Federal grants-in-aid for the development of local health services. Prior to the Korean war this bill was unanimously passed by the Senate on the basis of its peacetime merits. Today, the bill takes on a new significance if we are to be prepared to meet all the possible eventualities in civil defense.

[From the Washington Post of December 11, 1950]

HEALTH SERVICES

There was urgent need for Federal financial aid to State and local health departments long before the threat of a major war became acute; the need is now underscored and clarified by the importance of such departments in the mobilization of civil defense. They would be the country's principal refuge in case of atomic or biological warfare attack. We believe, therefore, that the House should act on the local public health services bill, which the Senate has already passed, during the present session. The bill has been reported favorably by the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and is now in the Rules Committee.

State and local health departments are woefully inadequate. Some 40,000,000 Americans live today in areas where no local full-time public health departments exist; and it is estimated that nearly a hundred million others have only inadequately staffed departments available. The cost to the country in time lost from productive effort and in the incidence of preventable or controllable diseases is much too high. The cost in lives and human suffering in the event of widespread aerial attacks on the United States would be incalculable.

The civil defense report of the National Security Resources Board recommended that "in each State, the State health officer should be placed in charge of all civil defense health and medical services; and cities should appoint local officers in the same manner." The report pointed out also that "special measures must be taken to enable civil defense organizations to deal with the problems arising from atomic, biological, and chemical warfare. The effects of these special weapons are of such a nature that defense against them becomes primarily the responsibility of the health and medical services."

But the plain fact is that in many areas there simply is no such defense at all. And it is highly possible that war production plants and other vital installations will be dispersed into just such areas, with large concentrations of war workers clustered around them. Many cities which might become bomb targets are lamentably lacking in health facilities. The problem is not one on which the country can afford to defer action.

Dependence of the People on Agriculture

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALLEN J. ELLENDER
OF LOUISIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, December 18 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address on the subject We Must Be Strong, delivered by me at Dallas, Tex., on December 13, 1950, before the annual convention of the American Farm Bureau Federation.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Members and guests of the American Farm Bureau Federation, I am delighted to be with you today and I feel highly honored at the privilege of speaking to you at your annual meeting here in Dallas. I appreciate the opportunity it gives me to exchange ideas with you.

These are grave days. They call for clear thinking and courageous action. They call for the best that is in every one of us. No one can say what the future holds for us, but we know that many vexing problems and uncertainties are crowding in upon us. With all the wisdom—with all prudence—with all the faith we have—we must face these extraordinary responsibilities and herculean duties.

We have faced dark days before, but even darker days lie ahead. In large areas of the world the light of freedom has been extinguished, and those who reap by such darkness now seek to cast the whole world in shadow by trampling everywhere the one sure light by which free men must guide their steps.

It will not happen. The light will continue to burn—the freedom-loving nations of the world will see to that, for they realize we cannot long endure in darkness. But to keep the torch of freedom burning, we must be prepared to defend and protect it. And when I say "We must be prepared," or "We must be strong," I am not thinking alone of cannons and cruisers, bombs and bombers, rockets and jets, tanks and half-tracks. Nor am I thinking alone of meeting military force with military force. Herman Goering is often quoted as having said "Guns will make us strong; butter will only make us fat," and where has this wisdom got Herr Goering today?

There are other fronts. We must be prepared, we must be strong on all fronts. First and foremost, we must have food. "The history of the world is the record of a man in quest of his daily bread and butter," said Van Loon in his Story of Mankind. If our Nation is to remain powerful, it must be supported with a healthy, progressive, and productive agriculture. A prosperous society cannot long exist on a depressed agriculture. It may think it gains temporarily, but a people cannot bleed farmers continually without themselves contracting the anemia which has been produced.

And how dependent we are on a strong agriculture in this country. When some 85 percent of our people live in towns and cities, it would be easy to wreck our whole economy by a short-sighted farm policy.

That some 15 percent of our population is able to produce an abundance for the 85, presents the most convincing proof that we are on the right track. Just stop and think. With practically no increase in the amount of land being tilled, farm production has been increased about 40 percent in the past 15 years. The total farm production in 1950—despite a poor cotton crop—is coming out only slightly below the 1948 all-time high. And it is 24 percent higher than the 1941 production.

In connection with modern farming, a constituent said to me one day, "You know, Senator, it used to be that anybody could farm—about all that was needed was a strong back and a weak mind, but nowadays to be a successful farmer a fellow must have a good head on his shoulders and a college education; first, so he can understand the advice given out to him everywhere he turns by the city men and the Government, and then so he can select and use that what'll do him the least damage."

Farm output per man-hour is now about twice what it was 40 years ago. Fewer people are required to produce the food and fiber we need. More people can do other things. Back in 1940 we had about 30,000,000 people living on farms. Now there are only about 27,000,000. During that same period our population has increased about 19,000,000.

Despite this reduction in the number of people on farms and the tremendous increase in population, the per-capita consumption of food is up some 10 to 12 percent over the 1935–39 levels.

Not only are we eating more but we are eating better. Our people are eating more meat, more eggs, more dairy products, more fruits and vegetables, and more fats and oils.

And as we face the uncertainties of the future most of our bins and cribs are full. Before the harvest of the 1950 crops we had more than 400,000,000 bushels of wheat in the carry-over, and approximately 850,000,000 bushels of corn. I wish I could say the same for cotton. I attribute our cotton shortage, in a large measure, to a law now on the books that made mandatory the allocation of 2,500,000 acres that were not planted, and that could not be made available to farmers who begged for larger acreage allotments. That law must be revised.

There are reserves in the soil for continued high production. Conservation programs made possible by provision of Congress have not only helped farmers step up their production, but have also aided them in building up their land for even greater production in the future.

Along with provisions for conservation, farmers have been given hope and faith in the future of agriculture through price-protection programs.

Ladies and gentlemen, I am proud of the part I have had in these contributions to better farming in this country. I have always been a strong and ardent advocate of the conservation of our natural resources, and in giving to farmers the price protection they must have if they are to continue to produce in abundance.

It is not an accident that our agriculture is in the strong position it is today. You, of the Farm Bureau, know that. It was the leaders of your organization—along with other farm leaders—who fought so long, and so valiantly, to keep our agriculture from sinking into the state of poverty and economic slavery prevalent in so many countries of the world.

It is a real source of gratification that I have been able to represent our farmers on the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and in the halls of Congress in that fight, and I intend to keep right on fighting. A sound agricultural economy is one of the best and strongest weapons we can forge against communism. A country that produces freely an abundance of food and fiber need not fear communism. We must carry on the fight and be vigilant.

Enemies of the farm program, who fought it because they said it would not work, are now using its success as the reason we should do away with it. Some argue that because conservation has given the Nation the assurance of continued abundance, and because farmers are not afraid to produce abundantly, we should now chuck the whole thing out the window. They say that farmers should stand on their own feet, little realizing that the American farmer is not only standing on his own feet, but is also contributing mightily to the continued strength and prosperity of our flourishing national economy.

Back in the days of Henry Clay, Daniel Webster, and John C. Calhoun, when 85 percent of the people lived on the farms, it was comparatively easy for a farmer to pretty well stand on his own feet. Food for the family was produced on the farm. The clothes were made from material spun and woven on the farm. Most of the simple tillage tools were made on the farm. Little left the farm. Little came back.

But today, when 85 percent of the people live in towns, well, who gains most from the help given farmers in conservation and price supports? The question would seem to answer itself—it is that 85 percent of our people—and yet, this very minute, when we need to step up production all along the line, there are some who would abandon the farm program.

Let us see who would be affected. Follow your cotton crop through from the producer to the consumer and see how many people depend on that commodity. Take it from the time the farmer hauls it to the ginner. Of course a whole new world of intricate and complex industry has developed for the use of the seed alone, but let us follow the fiber itself. There is baling with the burlap and ties. There is the machinery to press the cotton. There is the warehousing, trucking, sampling, grading, weighing, storing. The cotton market is a business in itself. Then there is the transportation, with all its many phases and complexities. There is the dyeing, the spinning, the weaving. There is the marketing of the cloth. Then there is the cutting, sewing, and buttons, and braid. And it does not end there. There is the wholesaling and retailing of the finished product. And there are so many products from cotton.

Then when we consider that cotton is just one of the crops—important, believe me, but just one of the many important farm crops—we begin to realize the vital interest everyone has in agriculture.

Some 65 percent of the new wealth created annually in this country has its origin in agricultural and forest production.

Back in the days of Daniel Boone, a farmer would wear out his land, go broke, move on west, or move to town, and the ripples from his action moved out only a little way from where the pebble touched the surface of his self-sufficient world.

Today, although the individual may be lost in the complicated exchange of interdependencies, what the boll weevil does to one man's crop will touch in some small way the lives of millions. And what the boll weevil does to many farmers affects the whole economy tremendously.

Yes, ladies and gentlemen, if we are to continue as a strong Nation, the guardian of the light of freedom and democracy, our agriculture must continue prosperous and strong.

And, now, when we are face to face with the stark realities of aggression, we must keep our farms productive and our farmers free from the fear that abundant production may be their undoing. If we ask farmers to increase production, it is no more than right that we give them assurance that the increases will not ruin their markets.

In stepping up the national wheat acreage allotment to 72,000,000 acres, and calling for a 16,000,000-bale cotton crop, and for increased acreage of corn, the Secretary of Agriculture is on the right track. In clearing the way for increased cotton production by removing allotments and marketing quotas he is recognizing the need to make sure there is enough food and fiber.

We need a big cotton crop next year. It was wise to waive any production controls which might have jeopardized our chances of getting it. When the time comes to reallot acreage, I wish to say, however, Congress and the Department of Agriculture, if they would prevent the upset of our agricultural crop distribution, must give full consideration to the interests and needs of the older production areas. These regions have produced cotton for many, many years, and in a lot of cases cotton is still the only crop which their farmers can depend on for income. The emergency must not be permitted to result in injustices for these people.

Right now farm production at the highest possible level, whether in cotton or other essential commodities, will do more than provide us enough of these essentials. It will help to hold down prices all along the line, for an abundant production is one of the most effective weapons we have with which to fight inflation.

Also adequate supplies of agricultural products will go a long way toward holding back the need for allocations and controls. It is when there is not enough to go around that strategic materials have to be allocated and their use controlled.

And, again, I would like to emphasize that there are no materials more essential—more strategic, if you please—than the food and fiber produced on our American farms. That we have on hand abundant supplies of most commodities, and our plant is in good shape to keep on producing them, makes them nonetheless strategic—even though this very condition may cause some to overlook their importance.

The production of food and fiber is paramount in the whole defense production program. That is why the farmer must be represented at the front table when such strategic materials as steel and rubber and gasoline are being considered. Food and fiber are essential, not only to those who man the guns, but also to those who make them, from the mines through the factories.

The Production and Marketing Administration of the Department of Agriculture has been given the job of looking after the interests of farmers in the national defense effort. Already an established and operating agency, the PMA includes practically all of the units and services which made up the War Food Administration in World War II. It has retained many of the same officials who handled emergency programs during that period. There was no need to create an entirely new administrative agency, as was necessary in a number of other Government departments. The assignment to PMA of basic food and agricultural responsibilities, under the Defense Production Act, was a natural and desirable step. It is a farm-minded agency which has shown itself to be efficient, and familiar with the farmers' problems.

The fact that the same commodity and functional branches which handle the normal farm program services are taking on the additional defense activities, means that farmers and industry groups can continue to work with the same units and the same men with whom they have been dealing right along. The same field offices and committees will be the ones to contact on defense problems.

PMA has set up a few coordinating offices and staffs to direct the over-all operations and to maintain working relations with other agencies and groups. These include an Office of Materials and Facilities, an Office of Requirements and Allocations, a price staff, and a group to watch the manpower situation. They are already working actively on the many special problems agriculture must face as our national mobilization goes forward.

The special job of those in charge of materials and facilities will be to act as a "claimant agency" for agriculture when any priorities are being established for the use of strategic materials and services. They are there to keep reminding everyone that farm production is defense production. If farmers are to hold production at the high levels needed, they must be assured, insofar as it is possible to do so, against crippling shortages of materials and facilities. They must also be given protection against the danger that the very production we are asking will not some day break farm prices to ruinous levels. This, of course, involves the question of sound price supports.

And right here I want to get one thing straight about our price-support operations. In handling price supports on the six basic commodities—cotton, corn, wheat, tobacco, peanuts, and rice—the Commodity Credit Corporation shows a net profit on the group as a whole from the beginning of operations in 1933 down to the present day. We should remember this when we hear indiscriminate criticism of farm programs.

When you consider the fact that not a penny has been lost on the basics in 17 years and then think about what the price-support programs have meant to farmers and to the country as a whole, you begin to realize just how important and useful the farm program has been, and still is. Accompanied by acreage allotments and marketing quotas when necessary, the supports on storable commodities have helped to give us the abundant and balanced production which today puts agriculture in one of the strongest positions of the entire national economy.

Price supports for the basic crops have proved themselves. They are sound and effective. I have advocated price-support legislation, and I shall continue to do so. The record speaks for itself.

However, when it comes to price supports for potatoes and eggs, and some of the other perishable crops, that is another story, and I think we need to take another look at our present methods and operations.

Our only serious problems in carrying out price supports have been with these perishable or semiperishable commodities. This has been the Achilles heel of the price-support program. Heavy losses in trying to support potatoes and some other commodities in this group have been the basis for almost all of the criticism which has been directed at the farm program.

Many proposals have been advanced to handle supports for perishables. One plan was presented by Secretary Brannan on behalf of the Department of Agriculture. Without question, insofar as concerns ultimate ends and purposes, the Secretary was on the right track. He was seeking a solution for a problem that we all admit is serious, and was striking directly at the great weakness of our recent operations. We must find some way of getting rid of surpluses which are acquired under the present type of support operations for perishables, or we must find some other method of support.

Personally, I do not think that the plan proposed by the Department would be practicable. The cost would be exorbitant. It would certainly tend to depress the price for the commodities involved. It would take away the incentive for farmers, like good businessmen, to seek the best possible market and price for their crops, and the loser would be the taxpayer. The Government, in other words, would make up the difference between the average market and the support level anyway. Unable to get a fair price in the market place, the farmer would instead be dependent upon uncertain annual appropriations for his income. If Congress should fail to provide the funds, the farmer would be left holding the bag.

But it is not enough to disagree with or challenge the proposed program. As Secretary Brannan himself has suggested, we should all try to develop a better program—a sounder approach. If we do not find a solution—and soon—there is real danger for the whole farm program. We cannot go on piling up surpluses when people are paying high prices for the very perishables which the Government is holding. As a way out, Congress might even decide to go back to the original farm support program—limiting price support to the basic storable commodities.

I do not presume to have a complete answer to this question today. I do think, however, that we should explore the possibilities for much wider distribution of surpluses to people who need and can use them. The school-lunch program has been a splendid outlet. But how about the thousands and thousands of people who are receiving old-age or other forms of direct financial assistance from the Government? Could they not be given nutritious, wholesome surplus foods in place of some of the cash they are now receiving? Further, have we pushed vigorously the opportunity to barter some of our surpluses for strategic materials which are available abroad? When I and other Members of the Congress took the lead in granting Government agencies special barter authority, we had high hopes that important outlets for United States' surplus crops would be developed. Government agencies are not prone to cooperate one with the other. Some seem to do their job with the least effort, no matter what the cost.

When we have done all we can to find ways of moving surplus stocks, we should also study other methods of giving the producer of perishable commodities the protection of sound programs. Marketing agreement and order programs give farmers an opportunity to stabilize their markets by limiting the quantity and quality which will move to market during any period. The advantages of these types of programs, and the opportunities for broadening their now limited application for different commodities should be fully explored. We must not be content with a merely "critical" approach. We must find the answers lest our whole farm program hit the rocks.

Getting back to protecting our soil, the uncertainties we face for the future serve to emphasize the importance of conservation—of taking care of our tillable land. There is only so much. And, unless we do take care of it, this land will be an expendable resource the same as coal and oil and steel. When the current supply is used up, we will run out.

Back when 85 percent of our people lived on the land, we have this comment from one of the early conservationists:

"When our forefathers settled here, they entered a land which probably never had been ploughed since the creation; the land being new, they depended upon the natural fertility of the ground, which served their purpose very well, and when they had worn out one piece they cleared another, without concern to amend their land, except a little help by the fold and cart dung."

Today, when the land gives out, we cannot very well load our belongings in a covered wagon and go out and take up another tract of land. The land we have—from which must come the food and fiber for now and for the future—is under our feet.

Jarred to consciousness by a tragic depression and also floods and a dust bowl, our farmers have made progress toward safeguarding the future of this country by cooperating with one another in carrying out conservation measures. But we are not doing nearly enough.

Every year floods come down our rivers and destroy our crops—our property—and our people. We have found a way to control these floods and at the same time provide hydroelectric power to improve the living standards of our people, and to provide water for parched land. Let us continue to harness these forces further and put them to work.

Back on the watersheds our farmers and ranchers can do much to alleviate our flood loss by carrying out conservation practices that help to keep the soil and water from going down the river.

Congress appropriates funds to assist farmers in carrying out conservation practices because it is felt that such a program is in the best interest of the entire Nation. The terraces the farmer constructs, the cover crops he grows, the dams he builds, the pastures he improves, all contribute to making our agriculture stronger. They add to our soil and water resources. They build our food production potential. They give the Nation a greater assurance that there will always be enough to eat.

But, as I said a moment ago, we may be misled by the abundant harvests of the past few years into thinking we no longer need to keep these programs of conservation going.

That mistake could be fatal. A short time ago I traveled through most of the countries of Europe and Asia which are outside the iron curtain. And I assure you this lesson of conservation was brought home to me in some of these areas.

Much of the danger threatening us today stems from the desperation of peoples suffering from lack of the basic necessities of life, and the fear of losing those basic needs. They accept the hazards and hardships of war because they fear something worse than war. Hunger, and fear of hunger make people desperate.

We must never let our land go as some of these countries have done. In Persia I saw the ruins of ancient civilizations—the ruins of nations whose rulers professed to have all the answers. There, where the twin rivers—the Tigris and Euphrates—once brought wealth and power to the people who farmed and built their cities, there now are only silt-choked canals and desolation.

It is estimated that this valley known as Mesopotamia once supported a population of some twenty-five or thirty millions. Now a scant 3,000,000 eke out a meager existence. The whole of ancient Persia at one time could support 105,000,000 according to some historians, now a bare 15,000,000 can exist.

This warning comes from one of our leading soil scientists. Observing what happened in Rome, he says:

"A few (too few) Romans began to see that if the great Roman Empire was to last their agriculture must thrive. These men tried to get their countrymen to see the need for more careful treatment of their farms so that Rome might continue to have strong country folk at home. But apparently it was too late. Roman farms had become country estates, worked by slaves who had little interest in the land, and owned by city dwellers who rarely saw them except to collect the rents."

Nor must we lose sight of the fact that conservation is good business. Every dollar our Government spends on conservation and conservation practices comes home to roost in the Federal Treasury, and with interest. I mean hard dollars and cents interest, not just the benefits that accrue to our country as a whole or a region or section containing a conservation project.

Let me give you a few examples. There are seven western projects—the Salt River in Arizona, the Yuma project area in Arizona and California, the Boise project in Idaho, the Yakima project in the State of Washington, the Shoshone project in Wyoming, the Sun River project in Montana, and the Lower Yellowstone developments in Montana and North Dakota. The total cost of these was in the neighborhood of $134,000,000,000, yet during 1948 alone these seven projects produced to the Treasury tax revenues in excess of $80,000,000. Since 1916 these seven have contributed more than $400,000,000 to Uncle Sam. Would any of you like to get in on the ground floor of investments like that?

It is gratifying to see the changes that are taking place in this country. Terraces curving across the fields are holding back the moisture—keeping the soil on the farm—and increasing production. Contour strips are cutting down the ravages of sheet erosion.

Grassland farming is doing much to heal the gullies of farms that have been cottoned, corned, and wheated to death.

There is not enough of it yet, but we have made a start. We must keep going. Erosion must be checked. Our lands must be kept fertile and productive.

Nearly 3,000,000 farmers are cooperating in the agricultural conservation program. More than three-fourths of our farms are in soil conservation districts.

Since 1936, farmers cooperating in the agricultural conservation program have seeded 51,000,000 acres of soil-conserving pasture; built a million dams; used 250,000,000 tons of lime, 24,000,000 tons of superphosphate; established and turned under 255,000,000 acres of green manure crops; contoured 130,000,000 acres; and planted 825,000 acres of trees.

That has helped to give us that 40 percent increase in farm production. It wasn't that alone, any more than it was hybrid corn or improved insecticides. It was all these things working together in a sound farm program. And most of all it was the faith of our farmers. With price supports and assistance in conservation, our farmers have had the incentive to forge ahead.

Our agriculture is strong because we have been working together to make it strong. I think you can be justifiably proud of the part your organization has had in developing this strength. Your leaders were at the forefront in developing a national farm program. I am doubly proud of the part I played. When I first came to the Senate in 1937 I was on a Senate agriculture subcommittee that held hearings throughout the country. Those hearings formed the basis for our present program. Ten years later, I again served on a similar committee and I can assure you it was music to my ears when I heard farmer after farmer say: "Senator, we are satisfied with the program. Do not change it unless you can devise something better."

The continued support and cooperation of farmers and farm organizations is necessary to keep these farm programs working and our agriculture strong.

Before closing my remarks, I want to emphasize that farmers have a direct responsibility in making price support and other farm programs a success. This means that they must be ready to make adjustments in production when these are clearly needed. When the Department of Agriculture recently announced that price supports on eggs were being discontinued for 1951, it did so because action a year ago to lower the support price and call for lower production had not worked. Production went up, instead of down. Egg producers should have realized that it does not pay to produce for Uncle Sam. There will be no support for Irish potatoes in 1951, and for the same general reasons. Too little production adjustment; too many potatoes. The Government could not go on indefinitely providing the only market for a big percentage of our annual potato crop. Please let me stress here that the same fate awaits those who insist on pursuing a similar course. Farmers should know that they themselves must do a little policing of their own activities. They cannot hope to have price supports unless they are willing to accept Government regulations.

These cut-backs in price-support programs were necessary under the circumstances, but they point to a lesson which we should all learn. I repeat, responsibilities must be accepted. Solutions must be found for our more troublesome price-support problems, if we want to keep the farm program itself intact.

These are grave days. There is no escape from the future that is bearing in upon us. But with courage, with wisdom, and with untiring efforts we can solve not only our farm problems but also those broader issues which challenge us today.

Let me conclude with this little prayer I have picked up somewhere:

"O Lord, grant me the serenity to accept the things I cannot change; the courage to change the things I can—that should be changed; and the wisdom to know the difference."

Heavy-Handed Diplomacy Miffs Latin UN Delegates

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DENNIS CHAVEZ
OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, December 18 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Heavy-Handed Diplomacy Miffs Latin UN Delegates," published in the Washington Star of yesterday. I do this because I believe that the article itself speaks of something which should be corrected; and it is also in order that the people of the United States may know that, as of this moment, and at this particular time, we have at the head of the Inter-American Section of the State Department, Mr. Edward G. Miller, who in my opinion does not believe in all of the things of which the article speaks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HEAVY-HANDED DIPLOMACY MIFFS LATIN UN DELEGATES—UNITED STATES IS LOSING PRESTIGE WITH NEIGHBORS BY FAILING TO ACCORD PROPER CONSIDERATION

(By Edward Tomlinson)

NEW YORK.—Along with all of our other international misfortunes, we have been gradually losing prestige among some of our Latin American neighbors in the United Nations, if not yet their vital support. This is at a time when every single one of their 20 votes in the General Assembly (nearly one-third of all the votes in that now powerful body) is of great value and importance.

In this critical time some of the most powerful of the Western European countries have faltered in the face of Communist aggression. Behind the scenes, if not openly, several of them have actually advocated appeasement of the Chinese Reds in Korea.

Although in the beginning of the Asiatic conflict, the Latin-American governments presented an unwavering united front with us, today delegates from several of the larger southern republics fail to give us enthusiastic aid in our diplomatic battles at Lake Success. While none has openly voted with our enemies on major issues, several have joined with certain south Asiatic countries in taking the middle road. At least one of the principal South American nations, Argentina, has often refused to take a stand or has abstained from voting on controversial measures.

After talking with a large number of people on the scene, it appears that this regrettable situation is due to a number of causes.

First of all there is a general lack of appreciation on the part of the American public of the strategic importance of the vast world to the south. Even many high officials in Washington itself seem unaware of the weight of these 20 nations and 150,000,000 people in world affairs. There is no question about the concern of Assistant Secretary of State Edward G. Miller and his staff in the Bureau of Inter-American Affairs in the State Department. But here at the United Nations, there is apparently a sad neglect of the Latin delegations, if not an outright ineptness of many of our diplomats in dealing with them.

INDIFFERENCE CHARGED

Even one of our own representatives expressed to me the greatest anxiety over this new development. "Lately," he said, "a large number of the Latin Americans here seem to find themselves more at home in company with their colleagues of the Arab States, India, and the countries of southeastern Asia, than they do with representatives of the United States."

The head of one South American delegation which has always stood stanchly with us in every debate told me that this is not only true, but it is unfortunately largely your own fault. "Your leaders here," he said, "seldom take us seriously. They are indifferent to our views or the most important questions, even when they ask us for our support of their position." He went on to explain that when voting time approaches they often send out runners calling us to action, and we are supposed to jump through the hoop like good little boys and go down the line with Uncle Sam.

"Of course," he admitted, "we have to be on your side against armed aggression. We are not only pledged to do so, in the Hemisphere Defense Pact, in the Charter of the Organization of American States and other inter-American documents, but our faith is bound up with yours. We live on the same continents with you. But," he added, "we wish you would not always make it so evident that we have to be with you."

AN ILLUSTRATION

The entire Latin-American contingent in the United Nations is still talking about one recent incident in which our representatives failed to show proper deference toward our neighbors. It was an incident that played directly into the hands of the Russians, and one which the Soviet propagandists have exploited to the fullest.

On the evening of December 4 the chief of the Colombian delegation to the General Assembly, Dr. Roberto Urdaneta Arbelaez, his country's Minister of War and chairman of the important Committee Number One or the Political Committee of the General Assembly, gave an important dinner to his fellow delegates at a fashionable Fifth Avenue hotel. It has become a tradition for each delegation to tend such a dinner sometime during the Assembly meetings. The Colombians were giving one of the very last dinners of the present Assembly. On this occasion everybody showed up except the representatives of the United States. Naturally the 20 Latin-American delegates attached considerable importance to it.

VISHINSKY GETS IN A BLOW

Unfortunately the Colombian dinner happened to fall on one of the first critical days of the Korean crisis and at the last minute our people sent regrets saying in effect that they were too occupied with the fate of our armies in the Far East and they could not attend. But Andrei Y. Vishinsky attended, flanked by the most prominent members of his staff. When the guests were seated the garrulous Russian looked around and expressed surprise that no North Americans were present. He even displayed a knowledge of the fact that the peoples to the south of us usually refer to us as North Americans, instead of using the all-inclusive term "Americans," as we do. At any rate, the Colombians explained that unfortunately the United States delegation was desperately busy with the disastrous problem which had just arisen in Korea.

"We, too, are very busy," Vishinsky trumpeted, "but we take time to accept and show our appreciation of the friendly hospitality of our fellow delegates from so important a Latin-American Republic."

Significantly enough, the Colombian Government is one of the several in Latin-America which does not maintain diplomatic relations with Moscow. Indeed, it is one of the most anti-Communist of all the regimes on the South American Continent. It is the one country next door which has ordered a large contingent of troops and its newest and largest warship to the Korean front. Naturally, none of these facts had been overlooked by the Russians.

MORE THAN SOCIAL FUNCTION

Our Latin neighbors do not understand how we overlook the fine points of diplomacy and hand our enemies such splendid opportunities for their propagandists.

Maybe large dinners should be dispensed with in such times, but they are not. In fact, these gatherings are important adjuncts of the United Nations. Furthermore, it is interesting that these spokesmen for the various governments usually get together at private dinners to exchange opinions free of heated debate and away from the glaring spotlight of publicity. Often some of the most important problems are ironed out on these occasions. Such gatherings are also important listening posts.

From the standpoint of pure self-interest, even in the midst of tragedy and disaster, we can well afford to keep in mind the importance of our relations with the people whose friendship, and whose vast resources of minerals, metals, and other raw materials, we shall desperately need in the near future, if we are to maintain the power and prestige of the Western Hemisphere against communism.

Socialized Medicine Is No Bargain

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH P. O'HARA
OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by William L. Hutcheson, general president, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, and vice president of the American Federation of Labor, before the joint session of the House of Delegates of the American Medical Association and the third annual conference of the AMA National Education Campaign, in Cleveland, Ohio, on December 7, 1950:

SOCIALIZED MEDICINE IS NO BARGAIN

(By William L. Hutcheson)

(NOTE.—Mr. Hutcheson, due to illness, authorized the reading of his address to the convention by his assistant, Mr. Peter E. Terzick, editor of the Carpenter.)

I am against socialized medicine. So is the organization which I have the honor of heading. At the twenty-sixth general convention of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, held in Cincinnati last September 1, 300 delegates, representing better than 54 percent of the total membership, voted down a resolution to support the national health program. This probably does not jibe with the feelings of a good deal of the rest of the labor movement because much of the pressure for "free" medical care is coming from labor organizations. But it does reflect my sentiments and the sentiments of our recent convention.

Saving a dollar has never been distasteful to me. In fact, I like to get as much for my money as the next man. That is one of the reasons why I oppose socialized medicine. It is no bargain. It looks cheap the way the backers present it, but when you dig down under the fancy layer of propaganda frosting you find that it can be mighty expensive. The British people have already discovered this fact. The July issue of International Labour Office contains some very interesting data on the operation of the National Health Service in Britain. I quote a few lines of that report:

"The total (gross) cost of the National Health Service in 1948–49, the first year of operation, greatly exceeded the original estimate. This was £265,000,000, as against a revised estimate of £368,000,000, with a net cost to the taxpayer of £278,000,000. The revised estimate for the year 1949–50 was £450,000,000 as against an original estimate of £352,000,000. For 1950–51 the cost is estimated at £484,000,000; in 1946 when the bill was passed, the service was believed to cost £167,000,000 a year."

In case you don't understand what the International Labor Office is, I can best explain its functions by quoting a bit from its preamble:

"The International Labor Office is an association of nations, financed by governments and democratically controlled by representatives of governments, of management, and of labor organizations.

"Its purpose is to promote social justice in all countries of the world. To this end it collects facts about labor and social conditions, formulates minimum international standards, and supervises their national application."

The ILO's publication, International Labor Review, is published in the United Kingdom. As an international organization, ILO's findings are supposed to be strictly impartial.

Getting back to the report: if I read it correctly, service that was supposed to cost £167,000,000 per year when the plan was set up in 1946, costs £484,000,000 per year, and the end is not yet in sight. By my old-fashioned kind of arithmetic that is an increase of better than 345 percent and I am sure my poor old mother, who always made a dime do the work of a quarter, would not consider that kind of proposition any bargain.

I know! I know! The Socialists claim that money is of no consequence in the matter of national health—getting the poor the same quality and quantity of medical care as the rich can get under private enterprise is the advertised objective of the national health program. That sounds fine, too; but on page 57 of the ILO report, I find the following sentences:

"Survey of the distribution of doctors by boroughs shows that certain wealthier districts (of London) have an average of one doctor for 1,261 patients, while in the inner East End there are 2,472, or twice as many patients, per doctor. For a group of southern boroughs, the average is 2,897."

If that isn't the "one horse and one rabbit" recipe transferred from the meat-pie maker's kitchen to the national health program, then I need new reading glasses. I have tried to figure it from all angles but the answer I always come up with is that the lumbago, shingles, and bellyaches of London's South Siders get only half the attention that similar ailments get in the swankier districts. For all the planning that has been done, there is still an uneven distribution of doctors in London. If the backers of the national health program are to achieve their objective of equal health protection for all, the next step must be to tell doctors when and where and how they are to practice. Therein lies my greatest fear of socialization.

Socialization and death have one thing in common: you cannot be either a little bit socialized or a little bit dead. It is whole hog or nothing. After 2 years of the national health program, London doctors still have preferences as to where they want to practice. By compulsion of one kind or another, somebody is going to have to shoo doctors away from the fancy neighborhoods into the tenement districts or the program will wind up where it started. When the government is given authority to tell one group or one profession where and how its members are to work, no other group or profession can be safe for long.

If the day ever comes to America when Uncle Sam usurps the power to dictate to doctors under a health plan, it will be a sad day for carpenters. Adequate housing is still an unsolved problem in this country, especially for the poor. If it is logical to nationalize the medical profession to get more medical service for the poor, it is equally logical to nationalize the home-construction industry to get roofs over the heads of the lower-income groups.

I do not know much about doctors, but I know quite a bit about carpenters. They are an independent lot. They want to work where and how they please. The first bureaucrat who told a carpenter he had to work in Little Rock when he wanted to work in Lancaster would be gumming his food for lack of teeth. Carpenters want to be free agents; free to work where they want to; free to negotiate the terms of their wages and working conditions through collective bargaining; yes, even free to leave the industry and try their luck at something else if the spirit moves them.

They will retain these freedoms only so long as all other groups retain theirs. Socialization is like a wolf with a tapeworm; once it starts gnawing, it never can stop. Socialized medicine would only be the first bite out of our free enterprise system; it would not be many years before the carpenters would be feeling the teeth of socialization on the seats of their overalls. Any way you look at it, socialized medicine is no bargain and the carpenters want none of it.

I know that the backers of the national health plan in this country resent the term "socialized medicine." They have all sorts of arguments to prove that doctors and patients will remain free as the air under their program. They make a strong case. Perhaps if human nature were less ornery and less avaricious, an idealistic health program might work out all right. But so long as people have preferences, so long as Park Avenue has more appeal than Hell's Kitchen there will be an uneven distribution of doctors under any plan that does not contain compulsion. And once compulsion enters the picture, the rights and freedoms of all citizens stand in jeopardy. To me, it is as simple as that. For 40 years, I have fought communism tooth and toenail because I do not want anyone pushing me around. I certainly do not want to put my head into a socialization noose voluntarily when the results can be as undesirable as communism.

I have always respected the medical profession for the fine contribution American medicine has made to human welfare. As I watched your battle against regimentation during the past 2 years, I have added to that respect. The physicians of this country have shown that they are willing to fight for their conviction. I salute you today not only as doctors but as crusading citizens as well. We in the labor movement have our own cross of regimentation to bear. The fight you are making is part of the same war. It is a war against concentration of authority in a few hands in Washington. As a veteran of 40 years in the labor movement, I know what it is to fight for human rights. I am happy to take my stand beside you.

Sale of War Goods to Communist China by British Firms

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR

OF MARYLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, December 18 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, in the midst of the desperate struggle of United States and United Nations armed forces in Korea, it will shock our people to learn that Great Britain has been selling war materials to Communist China in large quantities as recently as 6 weeks ago.

The sordid details of the efforts of our supposed major ally to profit by a war in which its own soldiers had suffered some casualties, and United States forces had suffered tragically, are revealed at first hand from London in a dispatch from Howard Norton, of the London bureau of the Sun, published in the Baltimore Sunday Sun of yesterday, December 17.

As an instance of British failure to cooperate in keeping strategic products from Communist China, for instance, the Norton article tells of October shipments of copper to China from the United Kingdom nearly 3 months after Hong Kong had stopped such shipments and more than 7 weeks after the British Government itself had invoked a ban.

In simple justice to our beleagured fighting forces in Korea, and in order that the Senate and our people may be fully informed of the facts of the situation, I ask unanimous consent that the article from the Baltimore Sun of yesterday be included in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

It indicates, more clearly than any arguments here could do, the necessity for the inquiry asked for in my resolution, S. 365, of recent date, that would include investigations as to shipments from anti-

Communist countries, as a basis for renewed negotiations looking toward complete stoppage of such indefensible aid to the Communist nations which are intent on destroying not only the United States but all free nations.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Baltimore Sun of December 17, 1950]

WAR GOODS SOLD TO RED CHINA BY BRITISH FIRMS DESPITE BAN

(By Howard Norton)

LONDON, December 16.—The latest figures available here reveal that Britain was still selling war materials to Red China in large quantities as recently as the end of October.

One of the most important items needed for war—copper—was being sold to China in big amounts more than 50 days after such sales were banned by the British Government, these figures show.

Whether British exporters continued their apparent defiance of the copper-export ban after the end of October will be a secret of the board of trade until the November trade figures are released later this month.

EXPORT PICTURE

But in the meantime, here is the picture of what Britain has been sending to China as revealed in figures already available:

Since January 1, the United Kingdom exports to Red China have amounted to $7,054,000.

Copper shipments alone account for more than half of that total, or $3,676,000.

Sales of copper to China became so heavy as the war grew hotter in Korea that the Hong Kong government finally put its foot down. It banned all copper shipments from that colony to Red China on August 8. Then on September 11 the British Government in London imposed a similar ban.

Yet, in the month of October, United Kingdom exporters sent $182,000 worth of copper to the Chinese.

That was more copper than the British had sold to China in the entire first 10 months of 1949.

And the October shipments of copper were still being shipped from the United Kingdom 84 days after Hong Kong had stopped such shipments, and 51 days after the British Government itself had invoked a ban.

An official of the British Board of Trade said tonight he could not think of any explanation for this situation.

ONE OF FIVE CATEGORIES

Copper, however, was only one of five categories of war goods which Britain sent to China in large amounts in October. Others were:

1. Machinery, including transformers and other electrical machinery, textile machinery, and various kinds of instruments. October machinery exports came to $126,000, bringing the year's total in this category to $1,055,000.

2. Chemicals: October exports alone totaled $170,800, or nearly half of the year's total chemical exports to China, which amounted to $401,200.

3. Iron and steel manufacturers: October exports came to $184,800, or about 25 percent of the year's total exports in this category.

AIRPLANES SHIPPED

4. Vehicles, including airplanes: October shipments totaled $25,200, and the first 10 months' shipment $249,200.

The British Board of Trade insists that Britain now has placed China under the same trade restrictions as those on Russia and her satellites.

Yet in the month of October Britain's exports to China amounted to a total of $702,800.

And more than one-fourth of that total consisted of copper—one of the most vital war materials.

VALUABLE IN WAR PLANS

All of the remainder, except for $14,800, represented goods that might easily have great value in preparations for war.

Though the United Kingdom's exports to China in October amounted to only one-third of the September exports, they were still eight times larger than her exports to China in October of last year.

But the United Kingdom is not the only part of the Empire carrying on a relatively heavy trade in war goods with Communist China.

MALAYA SENDS RUBBER

Malaya, in 9 months through September, sent Chinese $7,101,000 worth of rubber.

And Malaya's total trade with China for that period came to more than $8,300,000.

Figures on Malaya's October trade with China are not yet available here.

Between January and the end of September, Australia sold $40,000 worth of wool to China and about $500,000 worth of assorted exports.

CANADA SENT MATERIAL

Canada in September of this year sold Chinese $38,000 worth of brass bars, $5,000 worth of copper wire, and $6,000 worth of chemicals.

But Canada's trade with China dropped from $12,000,000 in the first 9 months of 1949 to less than $2,000,000 in the same period this year.

Of all units of the British Empire, Hong Kong has closest ties with China and does most extensive trade. And records show that a large portion of this trade is in war materials.

FIGURES ON HONG KONG

Between January 1 and the end of September this year—the latest figures available—Hong Kong sent the following amounts of war goods to Red China: $13,000,000 in rubber; $6,000,000 in copper and copper products; $7,000,000 in iron and steel; $4,300,000 in machinery; $1,700,000 in electrical machinery and appliances; $2,300,000 in vehicles and transport equipment; $9,500,000 in petroleum products; $14,000,000 in chemicals and pharmaceutical products.

It should be noted, however, that all of these exports were sent before China began to show signs of entering the Korean war.

Figures for trade since September have not reached London. But the Hong Kong commissioner here reports that on August 8 Hong Kong put a ban on export to China on most kinds of machinery, big Diesel engines, petroleum, chemicals for making high explosives, any steel-hardening material, arms, and ammunition, airplane parts, heavy vehicles, copper, radio tubes, and machines for making radar equipment, and cables.

British officials here admit privately, however, that it is politically impossible to embargo trade between Hong Kong and China.

They take the realistic view that Hong Kong's 2,000,000 people have got to live, and the only way they can live is by trading with China, and the only way they can trade with China is to sell China commodities she wants.

Therefore, inevitably a lot of Hong Kong's trade with China is going to be in war goods.

COULDN'T MAKE LIVING

To restrict too severely exports of war goods from Hong Kong to China would cut the colony's exports below the point where its people could make a living, the British believe.

And to do that would be inviting revolution among the vast Chinese population of Hong Kong.

Moreover, if Hong Kong ceased to be of value to the Chinese Reds as a source of war materials from the western nations, the British believe it is likely the Communists might decide to take the island over.

Thus, to the British mind, Hong Kong's shipments of certain war materials to Red China are simply part of the cost of defending the colony.

And those shipments are likely to continue on a limited scale.

Truman Doctrine Forcing an Armed Isolationism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the Truman-Acheson policies have brought the United States to an impossible situation. Is this the kind of leadership that instills unity and confidence? It has failed miserably and those who are responsible should resign in the civilian and military departments as well.

Mr. Walter Lippmann, in his column today, points out the weaknesses in the Truman doctrine. I am including it as part of my remarks:

THE CRISIS OF CONFIDENCE

(By Walter Lippmann)

The feeling of being in great peril, which in Washington at any rate is so general, is primarily, it seems to me, a crisis of confidence. The country has long been divided approximately along party lines on the fundamental question of where are its vital interests and how are they to be protected and promoted. This division has brought an unprecedented violence into our public life. And it has subjected our strategical decisions and our diplomatic actions to the vagaries of private emotion and to the pressures and the intoxications of mass movements.

Thus the Nation has been denied the guidance and the comfort which come only from an accepted doctrine, from a common conviction, and from fraternal agreement on the first and last things of the Nation's existence and its destiny. In place of a national doctrine of American security we have had the Truman doctrine. And so, contrary to the considered judgment of every American soldier and statesman who ever studied the question and was competent to judge it, virtually all of the American Army and all of its reserves were sucked into a peninsula of Asia in the presence and in defiance of overwhelmingly superior forces.

Our people have been shaken by this demonstration of misinformation, miscalculation, and misjudgment at the highest levels of decision and command. Deep in their souls there is the question, which will have to be answered, as to what is being done, what can be done about that. The young men will come forward. The weapons will be turned out. The people will work and they will pay and they will go without. But what they must know is that their biggest efforts will be directed ultimately by men who will not sacrifice their better judgment to their impulses, or to appease their domestic critics, or to be applauded in the next day's newspapers, or because they are bewitched by slogans, or because they are too timid to be rational.

Confidence and unity cannot be restored merely by allowing or inviting a few men to resign. Nevertheless I think that after a defeat of this kind there should be some resignations, not to make scapegoats of honorable men but, as in the case when a captain runs his ship aground, in order to remind all who come after how serious it is to err when the stakes are life and death.

But those who come after will continue to err unless the country can reach by general agreement a strategical doctrine which fits its geography, its resources and its limitations, its genius and its traditions. I do not think myself that our ablest strategists and experts in foreign affairs would find it difficult to formulate a national doctrine—were they undisturbed by the clamor of lobbyists and of propagandists and of the ideologists. Nor is there much doubt, I believe, that their doctrine would be in harmony with what the great mass of the people believe intuitively and by common sense.

The central principle of the doctrine would be that North America is an island, a continental island to be sure, but still in relation to the Old World an island. The people of North America can never meet on even terms the armed masses of the Eurasian Continent. It is nonsense to suppose that the smaller number can encircle and contain the larger and that this can be done across two oceans.

The true American doctrine—both in defense and in offense—is to recognize the limitations of and to exploit the advantages of our island character—our inferiority in manpower, our superiority in technology and in production, the oceans of sea and air around us which offer us the means of a flexible defense and of a highly mobile offense.

If what I am told by men who have been out in the country is correct, and what, as nearly as I can judge from some good samples the letters pouring into Washington signify, it is this: After Korea, what the people want is to increase the military power of the United States and to get out of entanglements like Korea. There is little doubt, I think, that the main tide is running in the direction of an armed isolation.

It has not yet run all the way or nearly all the way to that. The lessons learned in the two world wars are not forgotten. But the tide will, in my opinion, run even stronger and stronger toward armed isolation if the inflated globalism of the Truman-Acheson policy is not deflated. The movement toward armed isolation could take the form either of a demand for withdrawal from Europe and Asia—which is, of course, what the Kremlin wants more than anything else on earth—or it could take the form of a preventive war waged without the support of any of our allies and, in fact, in the belief that, while our allies would be overrun and would perish, they can be treated as expendable.

Our allies abroad will be well-advised, therefore, for their own security as well as for our own, to work with and not against an American withdrawal from the overextended commitments of the Truman doctrine.

Is the UN Prayer Room Vetoed?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following article from the Christian Science Monitor:

IS THE UN PRAYER ROOM VETOED?

(By Carlyle Morgan)

At a time when millions of Americans are turning to prayer in order to find the poise and the wisdom with which to meet one of the world's most portentous crises, perhaps no stranger question could be asked than this:

Should the United Nations headquarters now rising over the East River in New York City include a room for prayer and meditation?

Most people thought the answer had already been given, and that it was a resounding yes, uttered by peoples who by experience had learned the true relation of prayer and freedom, prayer and peace.

But is the answer to be yes? Or has it, ironically just in time for Christmas, been changed in the last few days to a veto? If it has not been so changed there is apparent danger that it will be. In that danger lies a challenge to all the peoples of the UN.

But perhaps the challenge is sharper to some than to others and lays a heavier responsibility upon them to state their views clearly and loudly enough to be heard.

A prayer room was already planned for the UN buildings. The general architectural idea of the room has been sketched out. It looks a bit grim on paper but might easily be relieved by a few alterations, and maybe it wouldn't be grim at all when completed. On the contrary, the design might well prove to be inspiring and as forward-looking as the UN buildings themselves.

But it isn't the shape, size, or any physical concept of the room that now appears in question, but whether there should be a prayer room at all. The obstacle is understood to be a clash of religious concepts—and not as between the religious communities of the world on the one hand and the Soviet Union on the other, but a conflict between religious groups professing Christianity.

Those who recall how the United Nations Conference at San Francisco opened with some moments of meditation, accommodating all faiths, and rallying to the UN the deepest feelings of most of mankind, will surely be astonished that the same sort of accommodation cannot be worked out in the vast headquarters of the UN.

Almost nothing is being said, so far, about the reasons for the disagreement over the prayer room. And unless those objecting to the room wish to make their position clear it might be difficult for anyone else to do so satisfactorily. But it need not be difficult at all for those who favor the inclusion of a prayer room in the UN buildings to make their voices heard. Perhaps they cannot do this through the national delegations to the UN, or through the official groups responsible for the building of the UN headquarters. But they could do it through the press, in articles or letters to editors and writers, through radio discussion, in statements from pulpits and wherever men speak their minds freely and fearlessly.

If the UN buildings cannot have one prayer room, then should they not contain two? To speak of more than two seems unnecessary. If that is the case, a separate room for the dissidents ought to meet any legitimate objections.

There is no place in the discussion of this question for bigotry, for recrimination, or for condemnation. There should be the largest-hearted, willingness all round to find a means of embodying in the UN buildings a testimonial of most of the world's reliance on prayer for freedom, for justice, and for peace.

Only recently at the order of UN Secretary-General Trygve Lie a meditation room was opened at Lake Success in answer to pleas from numerous religious organizations whose members felt the need for prayer in the present world crisis. Reports that a similar room, long planned and supposedly agreed upon, may not be provided in the new UN buildings must be all but unbelievable for many, many people.

It may be that the voices of these very people can clarify the confused situation behind the reports. If there is some misunderstanding it will melt away under open discussion. But the prayer room planned for the UN headquarters should not be lost through ignorance of existing disagreement over it—in a word, through sheer default on the part of those who want it.

Happy Talk on a Silent Campus

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE P. MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, a great educational institution located in Washington is quite often lost among the ponderous governmental agencies that go to make our Nation's Capital. Gallaudet College holds a unique position in the educational field in that it is the only college for the deaf in the world.

I commend an article that appeared recently in Collier's magazine for December 23, 1950, titled "Happy Talk on a Silent Campus" to the consideration of my colleagues.

HAPPY TALK ON A SILENT CAMPUS

(By Gordon Schendel)

COURAGE IS A COMMON CHARACTERISTIC AT GALLAUDET, THE WORLD'S ONLY COLLEGE FOR THE DEAF

The Blues had the ball; it was fourth down, 8 yards to go. In their huddle, the players gesticulated swiftly; then they trotted back to position. The quarterback signaled, his hands flashing. But when the sprawling players had untangled, the outweighed Blues were short of the mark.

As the players surrendered the ball, three blue-sweatered girls spun to their feet and motioned to their fellow students in the bleachers. As one, the spectators stood. And following the cheerleaders' graceful gestures, they responded in unison—not with yells, but with sweeping, rhythmic motions of their hands. The Blues and their subs on the side lines grinned at the encouragment, though no sound had been uttered.

They would not have heard sounds. For the team, the cheerleaders, and the enthusiastic rooters all were students at Gallaudet College in Washington, D. C.—the only college in the world for the deaf.

Dr. Leonard M. Elstad, Gallaudet's president, turned to me and commented: "Few people realize it, but the football huddle was invented at Gallaudet in 1880. From necessity, of course. And, incidentally, at indoor games like basketball the students give regular shouted cheers. Indoors, the team can feel sound vibrations through the floor."

Gallaudet was beaten that day by Wilson Teachers College, also Washington. But by any standards it did well to hold the score to 18–0. For Gallaudet, with an annual enrollment of some 200, is the smallest of the 15 colleges in the Mason-Dixon Intercollegiate Conference; it usually has barely enough men available to form a second team for practice.

While it is outranked by the other conference schools in size, Gallaudet is far from being the youngest in tradition. It was founded in 1864 as the National Deaf-Mute College, through an act of Congress signed by Abraham Lincoln. Some time later, its name was changed to honor the man who started the first free public school for the deaf in this country: the Reverend Thomas Hopkins Gallaudet. It was the Reverend Thomas Gallaudet who started this Nation toward its present world leadership in the education of the deaf; the school named after him has brought such education to its highest peak. For, since its first class met, Gallaudet College has turned out a steady procession of graduates who—despite their handicap—have been highly useful citizens, not only of this country, but of others as well.

One reason for this is the rigidity of its entrance requirements. The bulk of Gallaudet's students represent the top graduates of American State schools for the deaf, selected through a stiff competitive examination. Except for foreign students and about 70 others who pay $700 annual tuition, all are awarded Federal scholarships, which include dormitory space and food.

Congressmen as directors

Gallaudet is a Government-subsidized institution of learning—like Howard University for Negroes, also located in Washington. The President of the United States signs all diplomas; a United States Senator and two Members of the House of Representatives are always on its board of directors. (Representative HOMER THORNBERRY, a Texas Democrat who is one of the present directors, is himself the son of deaf parents.)

The college shares its 100-acre elm-shaded campus—and its president—with the Kendall School, which trains deaf children from preschool age through high school, and serves as the college's practice-teaching laboratory. All classes are held in a cluster of Victorian buildings, dominated by the clock tower on the ivy-hung chapel.

Upon my arrival at the school, Dr. Elstad suggested meeting some of the students before attending their classes. On the way, he discussed the principles on which Galludet operates.

"The public may wonder," he began, "why the deaf need a special college when the blind have none."

He pointed out that blind students can attend any college because they can hear lectures, engage in class discussion, and have texts read to them. But those deaf students who are dependent on sign language can get nothing from lectures or discussions; even those expert at lip reading have great difficulty.

"Instructors forget they must face such students while speaking. Even then," Dr. Elstad emphasized, "lip reading is 50 percent guesswork. Many words have identical lip movements, and some have virtually none."

In other respects too, he said, deafness is a greater handicap in getting an education than blindness—as was recently stated by Helen Keller, blind and deaf from infancy.

This is because deafness involves more than just a lack of hearing. A child born deaf not only is cut off from hearing any words and—unless specially trained—from speaking them, but also from knowing words and thinking in words. Therefore, he is largely isolated from the world. On entering a school for the deaf at the age of 5, he is 4 years behind a child with normal hearing in both language and everyday knowledge. It takes years to bridge this gap, no matter how bright he is, for he must be taught the mechanics of lip reading and speech, and he must acquire a vocabulary before he can begin to study regular school subjects.

Naturally, the situation may be somewhat different for deaf children whose hearing was normal at birth. About two-thirds of the deaf, Doctor Elstad told me, are victims of such things as scarlet fever, meningitis, measles, typhoid, whooping cough, mastoids, falls and blows, and the high temperatures which sometimes accompany a few other childhood diseases.

I got some idea of what may be accomplished by education when we reached the college-operated snack bar, the main between-classes gathering spot for the students. There, two pretty girls were selling drinks. In a row of booths, a score of youngsters were conversing animatedly in sign language. A jukebox was thundering away, and three young men stood with their hands pressed to it, obviously enjoying the music. They were "hearing" through vibrations; Doctor Elstad said couples often danced to the music, feeling its rhythm in the wooden floor.

He called over several students, in turn. In talking with them, he used the combined method which is the accepted language of the college: that is, he spoke in a normal voice and simultaneously "said" the same thing in sign language.

Although the students at Gallaudet prefer to use sign language among themselves, all are able to speak. (The terms "deaf-mute" and "deaf and dumb," I learned, date from a time when the deaf used only sign language—not because their vocal cords were defective, but simply because they hadn't been taught to speak.)

Among those with whom we chatted was Victor Galloway, 22, a tall, good-looking senior from Atlanta, and president of the Student Self-Government Association. He watched my face intently as I spoke, and said that while he often met persons whose lips were hard to read, the difficulty decreased after he knew them better. Victor was planning to become an industrial chemist—a field described by Dr. Elstad as particularly suited to the deaf, since it requires concentrated work rather than much conversation.

We also spoke to Victor's attractive fiancée, Gertrude Scott, of Washington, D. C., and to Dorothy Busch, a blue-eyed blond senior from Alexandria, Minn. Gertrude, who had recently been chosen Gallaudet's most popular coed, was majoring in education and hoped to teach in a State school for the deaf. She told us that she, her sister, and her brother were also born deaf, as were their parents. All three children had attended the Kendall School; nothing but sign language was used in their home.

I found that all the students took their handicap in stride and could laugh at consequent complications. Dorothy Busch, who was studying to be an interior decorator, told about being nearly run down by a taxicab in Washington. She hadn't heard the driver's horn, and he'd been forced to slam on his brakes. She said he was very rude—she read his lips—and, after cursing her roundly demanded sarcastically: "What's the matter, are you deaf?"

"It was a pleasure for once," she said, "to reply, 'Yes, I am!' "

After Dorothy left, Dr. Elstad told me she was among the less than 5 percent at Gallaudet who benefit slightly from a hearing aid, but that she, like those few other borderline cases between deaf and hard-of-hearing, prefers not to wear it at college. (By definition, the deaf, of whom there are 100,000 in the United States, are people whose hearing is nonfunctional for the ordinary purposes of life; the hard-of-hearing, numbering an estimated 15,000,000, are those whose hearing, although defective, is still functional with or without a hearing aid.)

How teachers are trained

Dr. Elstad suggested the college's normal department—which operates in conjunction with the Kendall School—as our next stop. Here prospective instructors of the deaf, most of whom can hear perfectly well themselves, learn while teaching the Kendall children.

A majority of those who instruct the deaf in this country and Canada are graduates of the Gallaudet normal department—including Dr. Elstad, who took the course after getting a degree from St. Olaf College in his native Minnesota. The department enrolls 10 potential teachers annually for its 1-year course. All must have bachelor of arts degrees; they attend Gallaudet under a Federal scholarship, and receive a master's degree for the year's work. (Deaf students wishing to teach are not required to take the normal course; their bachelor of arts from Gallaudet qualifies them.)

As we approached the department, Dr. Elstad explained the instruction techniques taught there. Beginners in Kendall School, he said, like those in other schools for the deaf, are taught lip reading and speech exclusively; the supplementary sign language is used only after the pupils reach high school, to speed up the education process.

As a matter of fact, he added, educators of the deaf have long disagreed over whether "finger-talking" has any place in the classroom at all. In some places it isn't used even in high school, on the theory that it does little to prepare deaf children for a world of hearing people. At one time Dr. Elstad was an exponent of this theory. He changed his mind after noticing that even at schools with strict bans on sign language, the youngsters picked it up outside—indicating their emotional need for this clearer and quicker means of communication.

In the normal department, Dr. Elstad turned me over to Hugo Schunhoff, head of the department and principal of the Kendall School, who joined the Gallaudet faculty this year. He previously had served on the faculties of the Minnesota, Illinois, and Texas State schools for the deaf, and had taught lip reading and speech in various Army hospitals. Like Dr. Elstad, he has normal hearing.

Professor Schunhoff took me first to the preschool class, composed of 15 3- and 4-year-olds brought from home for 2 hours a day to learn the beginning principles of lip reading and speech. Among other things, all the children are exhaustively tested to see if they retain enough hearing to profit from the use of an electric amplifier. In one corner of the classroom a small redhead wearing earphones was taking such instruction.

Across the room, a tiny, elfin girl was being taught basic vocabulary words with visual-aid cards. As the student teacher showed her a card picturing a ball and spoke the word, she had the little girl watch her lips; then she placed the child's hand alternately on her throat and lips to feel the muscular movements made in speaking. Over and over this was repeated, until the child succeeded in making the correct lip and throat movements for "ball." But as she was unable to hear her teacher's voice, she made no sound.

The teacher then worked to get her to use more force. Finally, after many earnest attempts, the tot managed a barely audible, whispered "baah."

SLOW BUT STEADY PROGRESS

The rest of the class, seated at a table, was encouraged by the other two teachers to name objects shown on cards. Responses were discouragingly few. However, the children had been attending school only 5 weeks. Professor Schunhoff said that at the end of the school year the average 3 or 4 year old will have learned to lip read about 50 words, and to speak 20.

The next class, consisting of 5 year olds who spend the full day in school, could speak and write short sentences. The teacher told a small boy to run across the room, to fall, to pretend to cry. To prove he understood entirely through lip reading, she moved her lips silently. Then, as the boy acted out his part, a little girl wrote on the blackboard: "He ran. He fell. He cried."

The class couldn't have been this advanced without preschool training. Lacking such training, many deaf children entering school at 5 or 6 don't even know they have a name; nor do they know that other people or things have names. Even children whose education is well begun sometimes have odd misconceptions.

One boy was 7 before he learned animals couldn't talk. No one had thought to tell him—he'd seen people talk to their pets, and his storybooks teemed with "talking" animals.

From the age of 5 up, Kendall children sleep on campus, except over week ends. I asked whether such early separation from parents didn't entail difficult adjustments, and Professor Schunhoff smiled.

"Adjustments are harder on the parents. In fact, one mother was considerably hurt when she found her small son, home for the week end, happily packing his bag to return to school—on Saturday night."

Classes were changing again as I returned to college hall. However, the noisy bedlam usually heard in corridors at such a time was completely lacking. Many students were conversing—but through sign language and lip movements. I had the momentary illusion that I was deaf, not they.

Gallaudet's curriculum is broad for an institution of its size. Courses are offered in five basic fields. Education, home economics, literature and languages, mathematics and science, and social studies. There also are courses in library science, drafting, and journalism.

A course in modern poetry, taught by Robert Panara, himself deaf, was my first stop. Panara seated me in the semicircle of 20 students before him and explained that they were currently studying Robert Frost's poems. He then read selections while the class watched his lips and occasionally checked a line in their open texts. When Panara called for interpretations of passages, the students volunteered eagerly.

"In general," Panara explained after class, "the deaf are much more fond of poetry than the average hearing person. You see, poetry, with its rhythms, is their substitute for music."

Debating a marriage problem

Next I visited a class in sociology, taught by Dr. Powrie Doctor. Dr. Doctor, who has normal hearing, is highly enthusiastic about his work. For my benefit, he directed class discussion to the question: Are there social pressures involved in marriages between deaf persons and persons with normal hearing?

Richard Babb, of Huntington Park, Calif., opened the discussion by saying he believed such marriages were unfair to the deaf mate. "When a deaf and a hearing person marry," Babb argued, "each already has his own friends. These groups won't mix well. Each partner will want to mingle with his own, causing friction."

Jerome Freeman, of Indianapolis, Ind., suggested that the deaf partner in such a marriage might command less respect from his offspring. "If the father were deaf," he explained, "the children would know they could 'get away with more' with him."

Then blond Peggy Stack, of Sullivan, Mo., advanced the view—speaking, and also using the sign language and manual alphabet, as had the others—that while a marriage between a deaf boy and a hearing girl wouldn't be good, she thought one between a deaf girl and a hearing boy all right.

"For," she explained soberly, "the boy should be the boss."

The class howled with laughter.

Another interesting class was that on sign language. This is a required course for normal department students, who—not being deaf—usually have no previous knowledge of the subject. It was taught by Dr. Elizabeth Peet, a tiny lady who is considered the world's leading authority on sign language. Dr. Peet represents the third generation of a family of famous educators of the deaf. Seventy-six years old, she retired shortly after my visit, having taught at Gallaudet for half a century. (In recognition of her long and distinguished service at the college, Dr. Peet, who also had been Gallaudet's dean of women, was chosen "Dean of the Year" last summer by the Association of Deans of Women in American Colleges and Universities.)

She told me that the sign language as used today was largely developed in France. However, Egyptian hieroglyphics and even cavemen's picture writing were forms of it. American Indian tribes used a sign language for intertribal communication.

Once, when a group of Indians visited Gallaudet, they and their deaf hosts found their respective sign languages sufficiently similar to converse easily. In fact, the sign language of the deaf is an international language. This was demonstrated at the "Deaf Olympics"—the Sixth International Games for the Deaf, held in the summer of 1949 in Copenhagen, Denmark. Results of each event were announced in several languages for hearing fans, and also relayed in sign language. And the deaf of all countries understood, regardless of the nationality of the individual who did the "signing."

Sign language is near universal, Dr. Peet says, because it is so logical. Most of its symbols, therefore, are easily understood by hearing people. For example, the idea of "a baby" is expressed by cradling one folded arm on the other, as if you were rocking a baby to sleep. And "to think" is expressed by touching your temple, while maintaining a thoughtful expression. The gesture of "washing" one hand with the other, done slowly with a pleased expression, means "I'm content." The same gesture made rapidly means "Brrr, it's cold."

Some signs date from centuries ago, like that for "woman"—which is a thumb drawn down the right cheek, denoting a bonnet string. The sign for "man" is made by raising the right hand to grasp the brim of an imaginary hat. For "boy" or "girl" you very logically make the sign for "man" or "woman," then with outstretched hand indicate a person of small stature.

Double talk in sign language

Certain signs are humorous in their ingenious suggestion of what is meant: The sign for "monkey" is made by scratching your ribs with both hands, as a monkey scratches for fleas. There is, also, some unintended humor: For "insane," a finger is pointed at one's temple and revolved in a circle; and virtually the same sign means "government."

There is slang, too, in sign language, and students at Gallaudet constantly develop snappy additions to their campus argot. One day Dr. Peet saw a boy make a strange gesture to a friend in the corridor, and asked its meaning. After marked hesitation, he said it was slang for "good morning." So, a few minutes later the dignified Dr. Peet playfully greeted her class with the new expression—made by abruptly pointing the index finger like a pistol.

"Everyone looked startled," Dr. Peet recalled, smiling, "then burst into laughter. The grinning culprit confessed the sign really meant 'phooey on you.'"

Next, I called on Prof. Elizabeth Benson, who teaches speech and lip reading and who this year succeeded Dr. Peet as dean of women. During the war Miss Benson, who has normal hearing, served in the WACs, teaching speech and lip reading at the Army hospital for deafened soldiers at Chickasha, Okla.

At the moment she was tutoring Albert Bedard, of Baltimore, who had lost his hearing at 12. Losing it at that age, theoretically he should have been able to speak quite well in later life. However, as often happens, Albert's speech had deteriorated somewhat during the 10 years he had been unable to hear his voice. Specifically, he had fallen into the habit of dropping the letter "d." Miss Benson, therefore, had him speak words like "dart," "day," and "deed" after her, while watching her lips.

Outside the classroom, students at Gallaudet are strong on extracurricular activities. They publish an excellent newspaper, the Buff and Blue; a quarterly literary magazine, the Clerc Issue; and an impressive yearbook, the Tower Clock. Sports include football, basketball, wrestling, track and cross-country racing, baseball, tennis, archery, volley ball, and golf.

Despite the school's small enrollment, it has won several conference championships in basketball, track, and wrestling.

These athletic triumphs have been won despite an additional little-known handicap suffered by many of its athletes. In most cases of deafness the sense of equilibrium, lodged in the semicircular canals of the ear, is defective. Deaf athletes compensate by "orienting" themselves with the ground—as long as they can watch it. Obviously, when they must look up at a ball they are at a disadvantage.

The college has the usual student organizations—including fraternities (nonresidential; all students live in dormitories—where, incidentally, they are awakened mornings not by bells but by the lights being switched on), sororities, YWCA, and similar groups.

The dramatics club, coached by Prof. Frederick Hughes, himself deaf, puts on at least one three-act play each season, and has presented several Gilbert and Sullivan operettas sung in sign language. Its 1942 production of Arsenic and Old Lace so impressed Howard Lindsay and Russel Crouse, famous producers of the hit, that they invited the club to present its sign-language version on Broadway, substituting for the professional cast. New York critics were highly complimentary.

Sunday evening chapel sessions are addressed by visiting clergymen—Catholic, Protestant, or Jewish. The session I attended was conducted by the Reverend James Fortune of Durham, N. C., and Episcopal missionary to the deaf, adept at using the sign language while speaking.

The largest share of Gallaudet graduates wind up in the teaching profession. The next largest field is publishing and printing; quite a few alumni own newspapers. Many become industrial chemists. Others go into Government work, as statisticians.

Graduates who have won fame

Among the successful alumni are the famed etcher-engraver, Cadwallader Washburn, George T. Dougherty, chief chemist and metallurgist for United States Steel, and Charles Neillie, scientist credited with devising the plan to use planes to dust forest areas with insecticides.

Dr. Elstad, president of the school since 1945, has ambitious plans for a bigger and better Gallaudet—one capable of accommodating 500 to 700 students. There are approximately 25,000 boys and girls in schools for the deaf in the United States, and hundreds of those eligible for a college education will be barred by the limited capacity of Gallaudet.

When Dr. Elstad says this year's record enrollment of 224 taxes existing facilities, he isn't exaggerating. He and his wife have turned over the third floor of their home to four students, two fellows and an instructor. The student roomers all are deaf boys from foreign countries — Sweden, Transjordan, Israel, and China. The Government's Office of Education—a part of the Federal Security Agency, which supervises Gallaudet, has approved plans for an entire new college plant. As Dr. Elstad points out, Gallaudet's campus encompasses far more ground than is needed. Under the plan the school would sell its 100 acres of valuable real estate and build on perhaps 35 acres elsewhere in the city. The Korean war, however, has postponed congressional action on the project.

Dr. Elstad also has other projects in mind. He would like to inaugurate a daily television program for the deaf in sign language. And he would like to make a "movie dictionary" of sign language, to be shown at schools for hearing students, to create a better understanding of the deaf.

It is important for the public to have the right attitude, Dr. Elstad emphasizes. The deaf already have. They admit they have some special problems, but they minimize them. They don't want sympathy or privileges. When, some time ago, Texas exempted the deaf from the State poll tax, they agitated to have the measure rescinded—they wanted to pay like other people.

Rather than being morose about their lot, the deaf frequently will tell you lack of hearing is at times a blessing. It enables them, for instance, to work in noisy surroundings without the distraction that lowers the efficiency of hearing people. They suggest Thomas Edison may have achieved greater success because of his deafness, which left him free for complete concentration on his inventions.

Typical of the attitude of Gallaudet is that of the freshman who wrote in the yearbook:

"Deafness isn't a handicap. It's just an obstacle. And everybody has an obstacle to overcome—that's life."

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, December 18 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a speech entitled "The War We Are Losing" by Dr. George Gallup. His speech is particularly pertinent to our information program, and I think it will be of interest to the Senate.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

If one were to make a careful study of the opinions of the inhabitants of this globe, I am sure that he would come inevitably to the conclusion that, in the present war of ideas, the United States is losing badly.

Only the famous remark of Vinegar Joe Stilwell adequately describes the situation. In the world-wide struggle to sell our ideals and ideas we've taken a hell of a beating.

Compare our position today with Russia's. How many nations of the world are willing to send their troops into a war against Russia or her satellites merely at our bidding and without the support of our own Armed Forces? How many millions of fanatics do we have on our side—ready and willing to die to advance our cause in all nations of the world? How many hundreds of millions of people in Asia and in Europe passionately tie their hopes of a better life to democracy?

The most important struggle during the next 50 to 100 years will be the struggle to win the minds of men throughout the world.

Even the greatest victories on the battlefield will mean nothing unless we win the war of ideas.

Suppose the present war in Korea should develop into world war III. Have you any conception of the problem we would face at the end of this war if we had to police hundreds of millions of hostile people—unless we had first won over to our point of view a large segment of the population of these lands?

Suppose we were to succeed in liberating the satellite nations, and, as a consequence, insisted upon their setting up democratic election machinery. What do we do if the people of these nations take full advantage of our democratic processes and promptly vote in a Communist regime?

Or, take still another situation. A nation like Korea emerges from war in a state of economic ruin. Demands on the United States for money and goods cannot be easily disregarded because of the ever-present threat of communism.

Think of the nasty situation we might find ourselves in some day if governments of many nations important to us manage to stay in office only by means of the economic aid which we provide. What a temptation to demand help on every conceivable occasion—with the constant threat that unless we do give and give generously these nations will surely go Communist.

The worst folly is to assume that everywhere in the world the superiority of our system of government and our way of life have been clearly established. The truth is that many people in countries allied to us in Western Europe see little advantage in democracy as opposed to communism—certainly not enough to warrant fighting to save their homelands from Communist domination.

An American reporter, in a dispatch from Korea, told this story. One Korean had asked another about the importance of a United Nations' victory in his country. The reply was that if you are a blade of grass it makes little difference whether you are eaten by a cow or a horse. In this Korean's mind, and in the minds of millions more, it makes little difference who wins.

Another type of self-delusion is that the world judges us solely by our actions. Since actions are supposed to speak louder than words, followers of this theory hold that we need do little more to win the support of mankind than to carry on in our accustomed way.

Perhaps in an ideal world, a world in which every person is well educated, a world in which the press and radio are absolutely free to report fully and objectively all sides of every case to all people, a world in which men search constantly for truth, this would be the case. Unfortunately, this kind of world seems pretty far off and meanwhile we find that even such simple and generous acts as the Marshall aid plan become so distorted by Russian propaganda that even many of our European friends think that we were glad to appropriate this money for the purely selfish reason of building up and monopolizing foreign trade.

What do we do about this situation? First, we must develop a wholly new concept of the vital importance of this goal of winning the minds of men.

Prime Minister Nehru, of India, in a recent interview, singled out one of our basic weaknesses. He said that in dealing with world problems, people of the United States were inclined to think only in terms of armed force, or in terms of money. To put it more bluntly and less diplomatically, we try to get our way by threats or bribes. In Nehru's opinion, we have overlooked the natural aspirations of people in other areas of the world, and we have neglected to give them a better understanding of our own point of view. In short, we have neglected the route of reason and persuasion.

It is true that this country has begun to recognize the necessity of selling our point of view to the world and, in fact, the last Congress increased the appropriation for our international information program to $100,000,000.

That sum may seem like a lot of money but, in my opinion, no successful businessman in this country would undertake to carry out such a program as is needed to offset Russian efforts with an appropriation of less than $5,000,000,000.

Do you know anyone in this country who would contract to tell hundreds of millions of people in Europe and Asia the story of democracy as often and as effectively as the Communists tell their story—for a lesser amount?

Is there anyone in this country who, for a lesser sum, would agree to reach the millions of people of Western Europe who are either Communists or Communist inclined, with a daily message effective enough to offset the missionary efforts of five to ten million party workers, and to conteract the influence of scores of Communist owned and controlled newspapers?

I have no criticism whatsoever to make of our present information program, and specifically of the Voice of America. In fact, I know of no department of our Government which has spent its funds more intelligently and frugally. Edward Barrett is doing a fine job.

The trouble is that we have given our information section an assignment which is impossible with the funds available. Figuratively speaking, we have asked this Department to convert millions of people to our point of view by sending out penny postcards of the Brooklyn Bridge. We have sent our forces into this new type of warfare armed only with pea-shooters and BB guns.

If the job could be done as easily and as inexpensively as we have assumed, then a lot of hard-boiled American business leaders have been squandering hundreds of millions of dollars on advertising. If any person in this Nation can sell products or ideas anywhere in the world for substantially less than the great companies of this country have been spending, then fame and fortune await him.

In the field of military operations we try to equal or to excel the fire power of the enemy. That is the safest formula, in my opinion, for winning the war of ideas. We must equal and excel the efforts of the Communists. We must reach more people, more often, and more persuasively, than our enemies.

At this point, you—and a few Senators—may well say: "Yes; but where do wet get the $5,000,000,000? The taxpayers of the Nation are already overburdened, and the worst is yet to come."

There is certainly no denying this fact. Yet, I should like to be so bold as to suggest that the $5,000,000,000 should come out of our present economic aid program and from our defense budget.

I believe that after certain minimum requirements are met in our defense program the safety and future of this Nation can be insured to a greater extent by winning converts to our way of thinking than by adding to our stock of arms.

By the same line of reasoning, I believe that after we have given a certain minimum of economic aid to other nations additional amounts will not return the same increment of good will to us or strengthen our cause as much as the same amount of money spent in winning the minds of the people of these nations.

I am not here advocating direct help or subsidies. Give a Hottentot a quart of milk, and the first day he is grateful. The second day he begins to question your motives. The third day he says you are stingy and should give him two quarts. The fourth day—or the fortieth—when you can no longer afford to give him any milk, he says you are a liar and a welsher because you promised to give him milk the rest of his life.

Certain help in the way of machinery, tools, and technological information may be absolutely essential to bolster up a flagging economy, or food may be required in a period of famine, but nothing more should be given or promised in the way of economic subsidies.

Proof that this is not necessary is to be found in Russia's policies today. Russia has sold millions of people her doctrines—yet Russia usually takes away goods and products from nations she overwhelms. Certainly Russia does not follow the policy of giving substantial aid to those nations which come under her domination.

How should the $5,000,000,000 be spent?

May I repeat that the colossal task of winning over the world to our way of thinking is so important—and will require so many years and so much effort—that a new department in our defense set-up should be created. It might be called the Department of World Relations and it should be staffed with the best brains of the country, drawn from the fields of publishing, broadcasting, public relations, and advertising.

Our program must be based upon truth. Herr Goebbels and his many imitators in Russia today have shown that big lies constantly repeated eventually come to be accepted. But truth, repeated as constantly, can be even more convincing and devastating.

The art of persuasion has never changed. Success grows out of a complete understanding of the hopes and aspirations of the people one tries to influence and the sympathetic desire to aid these people in reaching these goals.

Nothing is more boring than to talk about one's self—a sin which we have committed too often in our information program in recent years. The typical person, be he an illiterate peasant or a member of the intelligentsia, has usually one question only to ask—"What's in it for me?"

And, gentlemen, that is the question which we must answer.

Here is a peasant in Italy, a farm worker in France, an impoverished and hungry native of China—all of whom have been offered land and a better way of life if they turn Communist.

How do we win in this competition? Certainly we won't get very far by telling these poverty-stricken people and the hundreds of millions like them, that life in America is wonderful; that workers here own cars, homes, refrigerators, television sets, and everything else.

Their answer is likely to be, "So what? How do we get to America, and what do we do to get these things when we get there?"

No; our problem is to show how democracy and our form of economy actually will raise the standard of living in their own country; and how, along with a higher standard of living, they can enjoy the freedoms which man has fought to gain over the centuries, and which would be denied under communism.

To tell this story to the great masses of people of the world we must use every means of communication. Especially we must use those media which are best suited to reach the illiterate, because it is this group which has proved to be the most susceptible to Communist propaganda the world over.

A friend of mine who was stationed in Iran during the war told me this stock of Russian propaganda efforts in that country. He told about Russian mobile motion-picture units which toured the country showing the peasants how Russia would improve their standard of living. The motion pictures showed how agricultural practices in Iran could be improved, how the wonderful farm machinery made in Russia would reduce the labor of the farmer, how the building of dams would increase greatly the areas of the country which could be put into crops.

Can you imagine an approach more effective than this in winning converts to communism?

Motion pictures obviously should play a great part in our own selling program. We should produce pictures to show how the advances made in this country can be utilized in other nations. More important still, pictures can show how the aspirations of other nations parallel our own.

The Garibaldis, Masaryks, the Sun Yat-sens, all get their inspiration from this land of ours. The revolution that began in the early days of this country is the only real and lasting one in the world. Communism, as is often pointed out, is merely a counter-revolution.

Motion pictures are needed to counteract Communist propaganda. People need to know what the technique of the big lie is and what a world dominated by the Russians would really be like.

I believe that we should provide picture books, and many of the textbooks for the children of the world—not only to make certain that the youth of all nations is not indoctrinated by Russian philosophy but to share our knowledge with the people of the world, and to make certain that our ideals are known to everyone. If the Chinese Communists have found that comic books are effective in spreading Russian propaganda, then we should make certain that we distribute far more, and far better comic strips to tell our story.

We should support newspapers throughout the world which daily give the truth about world events and which present our point of view. How else can the people of many countries ever achieve any understanding of our point of view in world affairs. The Communists have scores of newspapers in the highly populated areas of the world. Can we afford to overlook their influence on large segments of the population of these areas?

We should encircle the globe with a radio network which will give everyone who chooses to listen—even the people inside Russia and the satellite nations—an opportunity to hear our side of the case. And if the people do not own receiving sets, then we should do everything we can to see that they have them.

We must bring students and leaders to this country by the tens of thousands to let them see for themselves what we think and how we live. Likewise we must send thousands of teachers and technologists abroad to make certain that people have first-hand evidence of our willingness to help them help themselves.

All of this may sound like a very ambitious program. But dare we undertake less?

Do we dare let Russia continue to tell the world that she alone wants peace and that we want war?

Do we dare let Russia continue to parade as the sole protector and friend of the masses of people of the world?

Do we dare let Russia claim that only through communism can the lot of the common people be improved in Asia, Africa, and South America?

Do we dare let Russia continue to picture us to hundreds of millions of people as imperialists—as the great exploiters of mankind?

If your answer is "No," then we must face up to the job that has to be done—the hardest, toughest selling job that any nation of the world has ever faced—against the greatest odds—and for the greatest stakes.

Victories in Korea—or anywhere else in the world—will be completely empty, in fact dangerous, unless first we have won a victory over the minds of men.

United States of America Against State of Louisiana

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALLEN J. ELLENDER
OF LOUISIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, December 18 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the reply by defendant to plaintiff's memorandum on proposed decree in the case of United States of America versus State of Louisiana, pending in the Supreme Court of the United States.

There being no objection, the reply was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Supreme Court of the United States, October term, 1950. No. 12, original]

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, PLAINTIFF, v. STATE OF LOUISIANA, DEFENDANT

REPLY TO PLAINTIFF'S MEMORANDUM ON PROPOSED DECREE

The memorandum filed by the plaintiff "in regard to Louisiana's objections to the proposed decree," portrays a complete absence of any legal basis whatever for the position in which the United States now finds itself. Said memorandum further shows that the proponents are on the defensive and are at a loss to justify their proposed decree under the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States. We submit that it compels the conclusion that there is now no case or controversy before this Court and that the complaint should be dismissed.

Point 1. The issue of fee simple title has been eliminated by the Court from this case

The Solicitor General states that there is no basis for Louisiana's objection to including in the proposed decree the sentence that, "the State of Louisiana has no title thereto or property interest therein." But his assertions, we submit, are fully answered by the fact that this Court in its decision herein on June 5, 1950, definitely stated that this litigation "does not turn on title or ownership in the conventional sense."

That the issue of title to Louisiana's submerged lands and resources was not decided by the Court in this case is further shown by the Court's refusal to grant Louisiana a trial on the issue of title to its marginal seabed and the lands and resources therein, after the Court had stated that (1) Louisiana in her answer had denied that the United States has fee simple title to the lands, minerals, or other things underlying the Gulf of Mexico within her boundaries; (2) had set up affirmative defenses that she is the holder of fee simple title to all said lands, minerals, and other things; and (3) that Louisiana had also moved for trial by jury on the ground that this action is essentially one to recover possession of real property, that is, the soil and resources of the marginal sea off Louisiana and so is essentially an action at law in which the State is entitled to a jury trial under the Constitution and laws of the United States.

So, the Court eliminated the issue of title.

Point 2. Moreover, plaintiff has now specifically abandoned all claims to fee simple title

The plaintiff has now actually abandoned, in its proposed decree, the very claim to fee simple title to Louisiana's tidelands and mineral resources—the marginal seabed of Louisiana—which plaintiff made in its complaint.

Paragraph II of its complaint alleged as follows:

"At all times herein material, plaintiff was and now is the owner in fee simple of, or possessed of paramount rights in, and full dominion and power over, the lands, minerals, and other things underlying the Gulf of Mexico."

But paragraph 1 of the decree proposed by plaintiff carefully omits the claim to fee simple title disjunctively made in the complaint merely asking that this Court decree that—

"The United States is now, and has been at all times pertinent hereto, possessed of paramount rights in, and full dominion and power over, the lands, minerals, and other things underlying the Gulf of Mexico."

So the plaintiff, having now abandoned its claim to fee simple title, the question of who has fee simple title is not before the Court in any respect whatever, and cannot be the basis of any decree.

Point 3. The California decree is no precedent whatever in this case

The California decree is no precedent whatever for the decree in this case, because there, California, in effect, consented to the entry of a decree which was proposed by the United States as plaintiff which stated that California had no title to the property. The decree in the California case was to that extent, therefore, a judgment by consent.

We submit that whatever the effect of that decree may be for California, it does not bind Louisiana at all. Louisiana has never consented to any such stipulation. She has always stood, and will ever stand, ready to submit evidence of the widest character portraying her fee simple title to and right to possession of the area involved, undisputed for more than 136 years.

Point 4. There is no case or controversy regarding the constitutional paramount rights, powers, and dominion of the United States over the marginal sea within Louisiana's boundaries

There is no possible controversy over anything in this case except fee simple title. Even the Solicitor General himself said so, specifically, in his testimony before the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, on October 4, 1949.

He then stated that the Government's claim to the tidelands and their mineral resources was based on the claim of title, and that if the United States did not have title, it was not entitled to them. See Hearings before said committee, pages 56, 180.

The Court's decision in this case definitely eliminated the question of fee simple title by holding that this litigation did not turn on title or ownership of the property in question. Necessarily, therefore, the question of title cannot be revived by the suggestion on page 5 of memorandum in support of the proposed decree that the United States should have fee-title and ownership or proprietorship to the lands under navigable waters within Louisiana's boundaries.

And there never has been any controversy over the constitutional paramount rights, powers, dominion, etc., of plaintiff over the marginal sea off Louisiana; for Louisiana has never denied them, and she has specifically admitted them in this litigation. Hence there are no conflicting claims of governmental powers here, as there were with California (332 U. S. 1, 25); here there simply is no case or controversy whatever before this Court which could be used as the basis for a decree; and the complaint should be dismissed.

The supreme or paramount character of the rights, powers, and dominion of the United States within its delegated governmental sphere has been the recognized law and jurisprudence in this country since at least 1819, when this Court, through Chief Justice Marshall, in McCullough v. Maryland (4 Wheat. 403) held:

"If any one proposition could command the universal assent of mankind, we might expect it would be this—that the government of the union, though limited in its powers, is supreme within its sphere of action."

It is not amiss to point out that, so far as we have been able to ascertain, the phrase "paramount right" arose in the leading case of McCready v. Virginia ((1.76) 9. U. S. 391). In that case the Court held:

"The principle has long been settled in this Court that each State owns the beds of all tidewaters within its jurisdiction, * * * (cases cited). The title thus held is subject to the paramount right of navigation, the regulation of which, in respect to foreign and interstate commerce, has been granted to the United States" (pp. 394, 395).

However, if a case or controversy could now be manufactured in this case with respect to paramount rights, power, or dominion of the United States, where none exists because of the fact that Louisiana has never denied them, but to the contrary has consistently admitted them; then, in that event, Louisiana's objections to paragraph 1 of the proposed decree would be appropriate. Louisiana's objection was merely that the following words should be added to the proposed paragraph: "To the extent of all governmental powers existing under the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States."

Unless the executive branch of the Government is arguing that this court should decree its powers over and beyond those conferred by the Constitution, we submit that the words of constitutional limits, quoted above, would be essential. But again, we must point out that there is no issue before this Court as to paramount rights, power, dominion, etc., of the plaintiff over the seabed within Louisiana's boundaries, and hence there is no basis for a decree on that subject, either.

Point 5. Plaintiff now asks this Court to clothe it with the very power that Congress has specifically refused to grant, and thus to extinguish the separation of powers embodied in the Constitution

Plaintiff now asks this Court to empower what Congress has specifically refused to grant. The effect of the argument is to seek to extinguish the separation of powers embodied in the Constitution.

Plaintiff's position in its proposed decree insofar as it seeks an injunction is necessarily based on an assumption that plaintiff has fee simple title to lands under navigable waters within Louisiana's boundaries. We have shown above that that issue was eliminated by the Court; that plaintiff has now specifically abandoned, in its proposed decree, all claim to fee simple title; and that the issue of fee simple title is not now before the Court to become the subject of any decree.

From a different approach, however, perhaps nothing portrays plaintiff's utter lack of right to an injunction, accounting, etc., and the fact that it does not have fee simple title, than the action of Congress. For Congress has specifically refused to grant the plaintiff power to explore, lease, etc., the area involved. And from this we must infer that even Congress has firmly recognized that plaintiff does not have fee simple title to the area involved.

Further, plaintiff, having applied to Congress for the necessary legislative authority to lease, explore, take out, etc., the minerals in the marginal sea, and having been specifically refused such authority only 3 years ago, now asserts that the judicial power, through this Court, may do what the legislative branch of the Government has specifically refused to do. It needs no argument to demonstrate that this Court does not possess the legislative power assigned by the Constitution to Congress.

We may point out that plaintiff has placed itself in this feeble position through its own efforts. Not having fee simple title to the marginal sea bed, and having now even abandoned all claims to fee simple title, plaintiff nevertheless wants to stop the oil-drilling operations of Louisiana and its lessees. That such a cessation of operations would be disastrous to the national economy and the present grave emergency is something of which this Court may take judicial notice. In an effort to avoid these catastrophic consequences plaintiff now grandiosely asserts that the Secretary of Interior will permit the oil-drilling operations to continue on such terms and provisions as he may see fit to grant, and that he should be considered by this Court, therefore, to possess the very authority to explore, lease, operate, etc., which Congress refused to purport to grant to him.

Thus, plaintiff nonchalantly asserts that, to be sure, Congress has enacted no such legislation, and that it has been held that the Mineral Leasing Act of February 12, 1920 (41 Stat. 437), as amended, does not apply to submerged lands of the type here involved,[1] but that regardless of the absence of any act of Congress, the Secretary of the Interior stands ready to authorize continued production of minerals from the States' tidelands and has full power to make "interim arrangements" to protect and preserve the lands and resources "adjudged" to the United States, and he points to an Executive order, No. 9633.

[1] "After the Supreme Court decision in the California case, the question whether the Mineral Leasing Act applied to those areas became material. On August 8 and 28, 1947, the Solicitor of the Department of the Interior and the Attorney General, respectively, held that the act did not apply to the submerged coastal areas. Accordingly, on September 8, 1947, the Director of the Bureau of Land Management denied the applications pending in that Bureau, and on October 6, 1947, the Secretary of the Interior denied the applications pending in his office.

"There is no reason to think that the legal conclusions of the Solicitor and the Attorney General, and the consequent administrative actions denying all the then pending applications can be successfully challenged in the courts."

Oil and Gas (act of February 25, 1920), secs. 13 and 14, 30 U. S. C. 221–236; oil shale, 30 U. S. C. 241; phosphate, 30 U. S. C. 211–214; sodium, 30 U. S. C. 261–263; potash, 30 U. S. C. 281–287; sulphur, 30 U. S. C. 271–276.

By act August 7, 1947, 30 U. S. C. 352, the Secretary of Interior was authorized to lease for oil and other minerals "acquired lands of the United States," to which the mineral leasing laws had not been extended; but it was provided: "That nothing in this chapter is intended, or shall be construed, to apply to or in any manner affect any mineral rights, exploration permits, leases, or conveyances nor minerals that are or may be in any tidelands, or submerged lands, or in lands underlying the 3-mile zone or belt involved in the case of the United States of America against the State of California now pending on application for rehearing in the Supreme Court of the United States; or in lands underlying such 3-mile zone or belt, or the Continental Shelf, adjacent or littoral to any part of the land within the jurisdiction of the United States of America." The mineral leasing laws were not only not extended to the marginal sea, but Congress positively asserted that the Secretary of Interior should not exercise such authority under the law.

Parenthetically, plaintiff can point to no "adjudging" of the tidelands and their mineral resources to the United States, because that would imply a holding that the United States has fee simple title thereto, contrary to the decision of this Court that title was not the issue in this case and to the fact that plaintiff has now actually abandoned all claim to fee simple title. And it is contrary, by analogy, to the Court's decree in the California case, where the United States was specifically denied proprietary rights in the tidelands and their resources, and which is a legal adjudication that the United States does not have fee simple title to the California marginal sea area.

In apparent support of the Secretary of Interior's alleged power, the Solicitor General cites statements made to the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, by the Attorney General and Solicitor for the Department of the Interior during the committee's hearings on Senate Joint Resolution 195, Eighty-first Congress, which resolution proposed to purport to confer interim authority in the Secretary of the Interior to administer the mineral resources in the States' tidelands.

But Congress did not enact Senate Joint Resolution 195. It died aborning in the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs after a thorough hearing in August 1950. The Congress of the United States undoubtedly refused to enact such legislation because it would thereby have adopted a policy of nationalization and confiscation of property, wherever the constitutional paramount powers and dominion of the United States extend, and that is everywhere in the United States.

Plaintiff's argument that, Congress having specifically refused to grant the authority sought, the judicial power should decree it has far-reaching implications. Such a contention would destroy the separation of powers around which the Constitution is constructed, extinguish the role of Congress, and transfer the legislative power to the judicial branch of the Government.

The United States Constitution, article I, section 8 provides:

"The Congress shall have power * * * to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States * * * to define and punish * * * offense against the law of nations; and to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

The Supreme Court of the United States throughout its history on many occasions consistently has held that—

"In the United States, sovereignty resides in the people, who act through the organs established by the Constitution." Chisholm v. Georgia (2 Dall. 419, 471); Penhallow v. Doane's Administrators (3 Dall. 54, 93); McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat. 316, 404, 405); Yick Wo v. Hopkins (118 U. S. 356, 370).

And:

"But until Congress has acted, the courts of the United States cannot assume control over the subject as a matter of Federal cognizance. It is the Congress, and not the judicial department, to which the Constitution has given the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States. The courts can never take the initiative on this subject." Transportation Co. v. Parkersburg (107 U. S. 691, 700, 701).

And, again, in Manchester v. Massachusetts (139 U. S. 240), this Court held that there was no power over a natural resource in the Federal authorities which Congress "does not assert by affirmative legislation" (p. 266).

As against the suggestion of the Solicitor General that an executive order be given the force of legislation, to bypass Congress, it is well to refer to the statement made by an Associate Justice in Adamson v. California ((1947) 332 U. S. 46, 67 S. Ct. 1672, 1682) that—

"We must be particularly mindful that it is a Constitution we are expounding" and that the guidance of the past "bids us to be duly mindful of the heritage of the past, with its great lessons of how liberties are won and how they are lost."

Conclusion

Louisiana reiterates its pleas and supporting memoranda herein and submits that the complaint should be dismissed for the following reasons:

1. This Court refused to permit Louisiana to submit her evidence in proof of her fee simple title to and right to possession of the area involved, undisputed for more than 136 years. It eliminated the issue of fee simple title. Now, in its proposed decree, plaintiff has specifically abandoned the very claim to fee simple title which it made in its complaint. Accordingly, the whole matter of fee simple title is not now before this Court to become the basis of any decree at all.

2. There is not, and never has been, any case or controversy before this Court with respect to the constitutional paramount rights, dominion and power of the plaintiff over the area involved; and we defy the plaintiff to conjure up the slightest scintilla indicating any such thing. Indeed, we may say frankly that the hullabaloo raised by the plaintiff over its paramount rights in, power and dominion over the area involved is sheer nonsense, wholly without substance, and that there is no case or controversy between the United States and Louisiana to provide a basis for a decree on that subject.

3. In the face of the foregoing, by seeking, nevertheless, to have this Court clothe plaintiff with the very authority to explore, lease and take out the minerals in the area involved, which Congress specifically refused to grant to it, plaintiff raises a contention with vast implications. It would necessarily destroy the separation of powers and disrupt our system of government.

If this Court should now sustain the contention of the Solicitor General that an Executive order on judicial decree should be substituted for the constitutional legislative prerogative of Congress, then it might well follow that an Executive order might be written to abolish the Congress altogether. Or the Solicitor General could then ask for a judicial decree suspending the constitutional powers of Congress.

4. Finally, what plaintiff apparently seeks as a practical matter, if we are to be frank about it, is "nationalization"—confiscation by the Federal Government—of the lands, minerals, etc., underlying the navigable waters within Louisiana's boundaries. But that claim has no legal basis; we submit, therefore, that it has no standing within the walls of the Constitution and the tradition of this Court.

The pending petition for rehearing should be granted and the complaint should be dismissed; or the case should be restored to the docket for argument on the proposed decree and Louisiana's objections.

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following provisions of law which a preliminary study by the Department of Justice was indicated would become operative upon proclamation of a national emergency by the President:

I. PROVISIONS AS TO WHICH THE JOINT RESOLUTION OF JULY 25, 1947 (61 STAT. 449, 451-454) TERMINATED THE STATE OF WAR AND THE NATIONAL EMERGENCIES THEN EXISTING

Act of February 26, 1925 (43 Stat. 984): Provides that the Secretary of War, upon his sale thereof, shall attach such conditions as shall ensure use by the United States of the railroad of the Hoboken Manufacturers' Railroad Co. (owned by the Port of New York Authority) in the event of war or other national emergency.

Act of April 12, 1926 (44 Stat. pt. 2, p. 241): Government authorized to assume absolute control, for military purposes, of the municipal aviation field on land leased to Tucson, Ariz., in case of emergency, or in event it should be deemed advisable.

Act of May 29, 1926 (44 Stat. pt. 2, p. 677): Exchange of land is authorized on condition that other party agrees that Department of War may assume control of airfield near Yuma Ariz., in case of emergency, or in the event that it should be deemed advisable by the Secretary of War.

Subsection 2, page 1292, of act of May 15, 1936 (49 Stat. 1292): Secretary of War may transfer specified land to city of Little Rock, Ark., upon condition that the Secretary of War may require the city to turn over complete control of the Little Rock Municipal Airport to the United States in time of national emergency.

Act of May 27, 1936 (49 Stat. 1367), as amended by Public Law 97, Eighty-first Congress: Deed by United States to Charleston, S. C., of certain land shall provide for authority of President to take it for use of War Department in the event of a national emergency.

Section 3 of act of June 21, 1938 (52 Stat. 834): Deed shall provide the right of the President to take over Hoboken Pier Terminal property in event of a national emergency for use by the Department of the Army.

Act of November 21, 1941 (55 Stat. 781): Time for examination of accounts of Army disbursing officers is extended to 90 days in time of war or during any emergency declared by Congress or determined by the President and for a period of 18 months after such war or emergency (31 U. S. C. 80a).

Section 15 of act of February 2, 1901 (31 Stat. 752): Authority for the Surgeon General to appoint as many contract surgeons as necessary in emergencies (10 U. S. C. 107).

Act of December 26, 1941 (55 Stat. 862) as amended: Time for administrative examination of monthly accounts of disbursing officers of Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard is extended in time of war or national emergency (31 U. S. C. 80b).

Act of August 29, 1916 (39 Stat. 580): Navy enlisted men on furlough without pay for the unexpired portion of their enlistment are subject to recall to complete the enlistment period in time of war or national emergency (34 U. S. C. 191).

Act of August 18, 1941 (55 Stat. 629): Authorizes enlistments in the Navy or Marine Corps to be extended in time of war, or national emergency declared by the President (34 U. S. C. 181).

Act of March 22, 1943 (57 Stat. 41): Jurisdiction of naval courts extended to certain persons outside of the United States in time of war or national emergency (34 U. S. C. 1201).

NOTE.—Repealed by section 14 (s) of Public Law 506, Eighty-first Congress, effective May 31, 1951.

Act of August 29, 1916 (39 Stat. 591):

Authority of Secretary of the Navy to call retired enlisted men into active service in time of war or when a national emergency exists (34 U. S. C. 433).

In time of war or national emergency commissioned and warrant officers of the Coast Guard on the retired list may be called to active duty (14 U. S. C. 240, 310 (as enacted by Public Law 207, 81st Cong.))

Act of April 8, 1946 (60 Stat. 86): Concerning the rate of pay in certain circumstances of retired officers of the permanent grade or rank of rear admiral recalled to active duty in time of war or other national emergency (34 U. S. C. 428).

Article 65 of the AGN (40 Stat. 393), as amended by 40 Statutes 708, 43 Statutes 1088 and 52 Statutes 1175: Service on naval courts martial by reserves, etc., when actively serving under the Navy Department in time of war or during the existence of an emergency (34 U. S. C. 1200, art. 65).

NOTE: Repealed by section 14 (n) of Public Law 506, Eighty-first Congress, effective May 31, 1951.

Section 18 of act of August 2, 1946 (60 Stat. 853): Authorizes transportation and subsistence on naval vessels at Government expense of such persons as the Secretary of Navy may authorize during the existence of war or national emergency as declared by the President (34 U. S. C. 474).

Section 10 of the act of May 14, 1930 (46 Stat. 332): Authority to the Secretary of the Navy to revoke the lease of the floating drydock and water-front accessories at the New Orleans naval station in case of national emergency declared by the President.

Act of May 29, 1930 (46 Stat. 479): Authority of the Secretary of the Navy to revoke the lease of the United States naval destroyer and submarine base at Squantum, Mass., in case of a national emergency declared by the President.

Joint resolution of April 11, 1898 (30 Stat. 737): Permits the erection of temporary forts or fortifications in case of emergency when, in the opinion of the President, the immediate erection of any temporary fort or fortification is deemed important and urgent without complying with formalities and procedures ordinarily followed (50 U. S. C. 178).

Act of March 3, 1925 (43 Stat. 1109): Authority to close Fort McHenry Military Reservation in Maryland in case of a national emergency and use it for military purposes (16 U. S. C. 440).

Section 1 of the act of July 2, 1940 (54 Stat. 724): Suspension in event of declared national emergency of provision that natural features of Barro Colorado Island in Gatun Lake, C. Z., be left in their natural state for scientific observation and investigation (48 U. S. C. 1381).

Section 4 (b) of act of July 2, 1940 (54 Stat. 714), as amended: Regular working hours of laborers and mechanics employed by the War Department to be 8 hours per day or 40 hours per week during a national emergency declared by the President with authority in Secretary of War to prescribe regulations governing hours in excess of 40 to be compensated at not less than time and one-half (5 U. S. C. 189a).

Section 606 of the Communications Act of 1934 (48 Stat. 1104): Subsection (c) authorizes the President to suspend or amend rules and regulations of the FCC applicable to any or all stations in the United States, to cause the closing of any station and the removal of its equipment, or to authorize its use and control by the Government upon just compensation to the owners upon proclamation by the President that there exists war or a threat of war or a state of public peril or disaster or other national emergency or in order to preserve the neutrality of the United States (47 U. S. C. 606).

Section 4 of act of July 15, 1918 (40 Stat. 901), as amended: Makes unlawful without prior United States Maritime Commission approval various actions with respect to domestic shipping facilities including its transfer to foreign ownership or registry, when the United States is at war or during any national emergency, the existence of which is declared by proclamation of the President (46 U. S. C. 835).

Merchant Marine Act of 1936: During a national emergency as proclaimed by the President, he may suspend the provisions of this section (requirements as to United States citizenship of officers and crew and requirement that alien crew members be declarants) (46 U. S. C. 1132 (h) (a) sec. 302, 49 Stat. 1992).

Authorizes the Maritime Commission to terminate charters of public vessels whenever the President shall proclaim that the security of the national defense makes it advisable, or during any national emergency declared by proclamation of the President (46 U. S. C. 1202 (d) (b) sec. 712 (49 Stat. 2010)).

Authorizes Maritime Commission to requisition or purchase vessels whenever the President shall proclaim that the security of the national defense makes it advisable or during any national emergency declared by proclamation of the President (46 U. S. C. 1242 (a) (c) sec. 902 (49 Stat. 2015)).

Section 1 of title II of act of June 15, 1917 (40 Stat. 220): Whenever the President by proclamation or Executive order declares a national emergency to exist by reason of actual or threatened war, or disturbance or threatened disturbance of the international relations of the United States the Secretary of the Treasury may make rules and regulations, governing the anchorage and movement of vessels, foreign and domestic, in United States waters, and may inspect and in certain contingencies take possession and control of such vessels. Within the Canal Zone, the Governor of the Panama Canal is delegated similar powers (50 U. S. C. 191).

Act of August 4, 1949 (63 Stat. 551): (a) The Coast Guard Reserve may be called or continued on active duty in time of war or national emergency declared by the President (14 U. S. C. 753).

Act of March 4, 1917 (39 Stat. 1192): In case of national emergency the President may suspend provisions of the 8-hour law as to contracts with the United States subject to provision for the payment of overtime (40 U. S. C. 326).

Section 6 of act of August 30, 1935 (49 Stat. 1011): Authorizes the President to suspend the provisions of the act which relate to the rate of wages for laborers and mechanics employed by contractor and subcontractor on public buildings in event of a national emergency (40 U. S. C. 276a-5).

II. PROVISIONS ENACTED LATER THAN THOSE DEALT WITH IN PART I, ABOVE

Act of June 28, 1947 (61 Stat. 191): The Secretary of the Army may refuse to accept resignations of enlisted men in time of war or national emergency declared by the President or Congress (10 U. S. C. 628).

Section 13 (g) (2) (E) of the Surplus Property Act of 1944, as amended by section 2 of the act of July 30, 1947 (61 Stat. 679): Disposition of all surplus airports, airport facilities and equipment, disposed of under the Surplus Property Act, must in general be made subject to the condition that the United States shall have the right to use, control and possess them during any national emergency declared by the President or by the Congress (50 U. S. C. App. 1622 (g) (2) (E), 50 U. S. C. App. 1622 (g) (3)).

Section 1 of the act of August 5, 1947 (61 Stat. 774): The Secretary of the Air Force, the Secretary of the Army, and the Secretary of the Navy may each lease nonsurplus property under their control respectively, but, irrespective of the terms of the lease, it shall be revokable by the Secretary of the department concerned during a national emergency declared by the President (5 U. S. C. 626a-3, 10 U. S. C. 1270, 34 U. S. C. 522a).

Sections 103 (a) and (b), 114 (b) and (c), 203 (a), of the Officer Personnel Act of 1947 (61 Stat. 799, 811, 816): Limitations on the number of admirals of the line of the Navy, generals in the Marine Corps, and admirals of the Staff Corps of the Navy do not apply in time of war or national emergency declared after the effective date of this act (34 U. S. C. 4 (a) and (b), 34 U. S. C. 626 (b) and (c), 34 U. S. C. 5).

Section 304 (n) of the Officer Personnel Act of 1947 (61 Stat. 840): The termination by this provision of the authority to make temporary naval appointments under the act of July 24, 1941 (55 Stat. 603) shall not be held to impair the authority to make temporary appointments under that act during any future war or national emergency (34 U. S. C. 211a (n)).

Sections 413 (a) and (b), 415 (a) and (b) of the same act (61 Stat. 876): Statutory limitations on the number of naval and marine officers, respectively, are removed in time of war or national emergency declared after the effective date of this act, and such designations in time of war or national emergency may be made down to the rank of captain or colonel, respectively (34 U. S. C. 211d (a) and (b), 34 U. S. C. 623b (a) and (b)).

Section 424 of the same act (61 Stat. 879): The statutory limitation on the number of temporary commissions which the President may issue in the Navy Medical Corps do not apply in time of war or (sic) declared national emergency (34 U. S. C. 21).

Section 430 of the same act (61 Stat. 881): The statutory limitation on the number of retired admirals who may be serving on active duty does not apply in time of war or national emergency declared after the date of approval of this act (34 U. S. C. 211e).

Sections 503 (a), 504 (b), and 515 (b) of the same act (61 Stat. 885, 887, 907): The statutory limitation on the number of Army officers above the grade of major general applies until a national emergency is declared [after July 1, 1948] (10 U. S. C. 506a (a), 10 U. S. C. 506b (b), 10 U. S. C. 506d (b)).

Section 514 (f) of the same act (61 Stat. 906): The operation of any statutory provisions prescribing mandatory retirement or separation of Regular Army officers may be suspended by the President in time of emergency declared by the President or by the Congress and in time of war (10 U. S. C. 941a (f)).

Section 515 (e) of the same act (61 Stat. 907): The President is authorized to issue temporary commissions in the Army of the United States, to continue during the emergency or war in which the appointment was made and for 6 months thereafter, in time of emergency declared by the President, or by the Congress, and in time of war (10 U. S. C. 506d (e)).

Joint resolution of August 8, 1947 (61 Stat. 921): The Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System shall not exercise consumer credit controls pursuant to Executive Order 8843 except during the time of war beginning after the date of enactment of this joint resolution or any national emergency declared by the President after the date of enactment of this joint resolution (12 U. S. C. 248 note).

Section 2 (c) (1) and (e) of the Armed Services Procurement Act of 1947 (62 Stat. 21), Section 3 (a) of the Central Intelligence Agency Act of 1949, Public Law 110, Eighty-first Congress: Purchases and contracts for supplies and services made by the Department of the Army, the Department of the Navy, the Department of the Air Force, the United States Coast Guard, the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, and the Central Intelligence Agency, need not be made by advertising if determined to be necessary in the public interest during the period of a national emergency declared by the President or by the Congress (41 U. S. C. 151 (c) (1) and (e)) (50 U. S. C. 403c).

Section 6 of the act of February 28, 1948, amending section 210 (k) of the Public Health Service Act, as amended (62 Stat. 44): Any commissioned officer of a professional category of the regular corps of the Public Health Service may be recommended to the President for promotion to any higher grade in that category, whether or not a vacancy exists in that grade, in time of war, or of national emergency proclaimed by the President (42 U. S. C. 211 (k)).

Section 10 (b) of the Coast and Geodetic Survey Commission Officers' Act of 1948 (62 Stat. 299): The President may suspend the operation of any statutory provisions relating to promotion of officers in the Coast and Geodetic Survey in time of emergency declared by the President or by the Congress, and in time of war (33 U. S. C. 853i (b)).

The act of June 19, 1948, amending paragraph 5 of section 3A of the Civil Service Retirement Act of May 29, 1930 (62 Stat. 504): Any Member of Congress who, during any war or time of national emergency as proclaimed by the President or declared by the Congress, leaves his office to enter the Armed Forces, shall for the purpose of this provision, be deemed to continue as a Member of Congress during such military service (5 U. S. C. 693-1 (5)).

Section 6 of the act of June 28, 1948 (62 Stat. 1065): The right, title, and interest of any lands, together with improvements thereon, which are conveyed under section 5 of this act (authorizing the Defense Homes Corporation to convey certain real estate in the District of Columbia to Howard University), shall revert to the United States upon a written finding made by the President prior to July 1, 1963, that the property is needed by the United States in connection with a national defense emergency (42 U. S. C. 1575, note).

Section 1e of the act of July 2, 1948 (62 Stat. 1230): The Secretary of the Army is authorized to convey a certain part of Santa Rosa Island, Fla., to Okaloosa County, Fla., for recreational purposes, subject to a condition that in the event of a national emergency the Secretary shall have the right to take over that property in his discretion for such use and for such length of time as the emergency shall require (not codified).

Section 507 (b) of the Officer Personnel Act of 1947 (61 Stat. 893): The President may suspend the operation of any provision of law pertaining to promotion in time of emergency declared by the President or by the Congress and in time of war (10 U. S. C. 559a (b)).

Section 1 of the act of May 28, 1948 (62 Stat. 276): Personnel whose transportation the Secretary of one of the military departments may assure in accordance with the authority of this act include during any period of war or national emergency declared by the Congress or the President, personnel working with private plants engaged in the manufacture of material for those departments (5 U. S. C. 189c, 5 U. S. C. 415d, 5 U. S. C. 626n).

Section 302 (c) (1) and (e) of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, Public Law No. 152, Eighty-first Congress:

Purchases and contracts for supplies and services may be negotiated by the heads of executive departments and agencies without the advertising required by section 303 of this act if determined to be necessary in the public interest during the period of a national emergency declared by the President or by the Congress (41 U. S. C. 252 (c)).

The Secretary of the Department in which the Coast Guard is operating may order any retired Coast Guard commissioned officer or warrant officer to active duty in time of war or national emergency. Enlisted men may be so ordered by the Commandant of the Coast Guard (14 U. S. C. 240, 310, 359 (Public Law No. 207, 81st Cong.)).

Under regulations prescribed by the Secretary, an enlisted man may be detained in the Coast Guard beyond the term of his enlistment during a period of war or national emergency as proclaimed by the President, and, in the interest of national defense, for a period not to exceed 6 months after the end of the war or the termination of the emergency (14 U. S. C. 367 (a) (4) (Public Law No. 207, 81st Cong.).)

Any law removing for the duration of a war or national emergency proclaimed by the President any restriction contained in any then-existing law as applied to the Navy, shall, in the same manner and to the same extent, remove such restrictions as applied to the Coast Guard (14 U. S. C. 652 (Public Law No. 207, 81st Cong.)

Any member of the Coast Guard Reserve may be ordered to active duty, in time of war or national emergency declared by the President to exist, for the duration of the war or until the termination of the emergency as declared by the President, and may be continued on such active duty for such duration and 6 months thereafter, notwithstanding that the term of appointment or enlistment may have expired (14 U. S. C. 752, 753 (a) (Public Law No. 207, 81st Cong.).).

The sum of $150 for the purchase of uniforms, in addition to the normal uniform allowance, may be paid to Coast Guard Reserve officers upon first reporting for active duty, in times of war or national emergency. Enlisted personnel of the Coast Guard Reserve may be issued articles additional to the normal Reserve issue, upon first reporting for active duty in time of war or national emergency (14 U. S. C. 759 (Public Law 207, 81st Cong.)).

Section 8 of the same act (Public Law 207, 81st Cong.), amending section 7 of the act of July 1, 1918 (40 Stat. 717): Any commissioned or warrant officer on the retired list of the Navy or Marine Corps may be ordered to active duty during the existence of war or of a national emergency declared by the President to exist, and he shall be entitled to promotion on the retired list as if such services had been rendered continuously on the active list.

Section 402 (a) of the Career Compensation Act of 1949, Public Law 351, Eighty-first Congress: For the purposes of disability retirement in the uniformed services, any disability incurred in line of duty during the serviceman's active services in time of war or national emergency shall be considered to be the proximate result of the performance of active duty (37 U. S. C. 272 (a)).

Section 3 (b) of the joint resolution of March 7, 1947, (61 Stat. 10) as amended by the joint resolution of July 1, 1948 (62 Stat. 1212):

The Maritime Commission (now succeeded by the Maritime Board and the Maritime Administration, Reorganization Plan No. 21 of 1950) may terminate any arrangement into which it has entered, pursuant to this resolution, regarding ocean transportation service to Alaska, whenever the President shall proclaim that the security of the national defense makes it advisable, or during any national emergency declared by proclamation of the President (46 U. S. C., 866, note).

Article 71 (b) of the Uniform Code of Military Justice, act of May 5, 1950 (not in effect until May 31, 1951 (sec. 5 of the act)): The Secretary of the military department concerned may commute a court-martial sentence of dismissal of an officer, to reduction to any enlisted grade in time of war or national emergency (50 U. S. C. 658).

Section 3 of the act of June 30, 1950, Public Law 593, Eighty-first Congress: The conveyance of a specified part of Camp Joseph T. Robinson, Ark., to the State of Arkansas, shall contain the provision that the United States shall have the right of reentry upon and use of that property, whenever the Congress of the United States shall declare a state of war or other national emergency, or the President declares a state of emergency to exist.

Section 1206 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, as amended by the act of September 7, 1950, Public Law 763, Eighty-first Congress: The Secretary of Commerce is authorized to provide war-risk insurance to appropriate persons during any time the United States is at war or during any period of emergency declared to exist by the President (46 U. S. C. 1286).

Section 4 (c) and (e) of the National Defense Facilities Act of 1950, Public Law 783, Eighty-first Congress: The Secretary of Defense shall not permit property, acquired under this act and permitted by him in accordance with the act to be used by persons or organizations, to be used in any way which will interfere with their use for the administration and training of Reserve components of the Armed Forces, or in time of war or national emergency by other units of the Armed Forces of the United States or any other use by the Federal Government. The same requirement shall apply to facilities acquired or improved by any State with funds contributed by the Secretary of Defense in accordance with section 3 (b) or (c) of the act (50 U. S. C. 783).

The Rosenberg Inquiry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, December 18 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have incorporated in the Appendix of the RECORD an important article entitled "The Rosenberg Inquiry," written by Joseph and Stewart Alsop and published in the New York Herald Tribune of yesterday. The subheading of the article is "The Alsops show how 'Red' cry can serve to blackmail Senators."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE ROSENBERG INQUIRY—THE ALSOPS SHOW HOW RED CRY CAN SERVE TO BLACKMAIL SENATORS

(By Joseph and Stewart Alsop)

WASHINGTON.—Although the Senate Armed Services Committee has now unanimously cleared Mrs. Anna M. Rosenberg of the charge of being a Communist, the incident should not end there. The Rosenberg case means, in fact, that a new sort of American underworld has now gained the power to trouble the policy and impede the Government of the United States of America. Something ought to be done about it, as any honorable American who reads the whole story will heartily agree.

To begin the story at the beginning, Anna Rosenberg, the victim of the charge of communism, is a splendid proof of the occasional truth of what used to be called the American dream.

A self-made woman, foreign-born, Anna Rosenberg has made for herself such a position that great corporations pay great sums for her advice, and leaders of America are proud to be her friends. One of these friends, Secretary of Defense George C. Marshall, asked her to serve as his Assistant Secretary in charge of manpower problems. Mrs. Rosenberg sacrificed a staggering income in order to accept, simply because she feels passionate loyalty and gratitude to the adopted country that has done so much for her.

The name of this remarkable woman, then, was sent by Secretary Marshall some weeks ago to the Senate Armed Services Committee. At this moment, when the appointment became known, subsequent testimony indicates that a meeting took place in Washington between the professional anti-Semite and tinpot amateur Fascist, Gerald L. K. Smith, and a certain friend of Smith's, Benjamin Freedman.

Freedman describes himself as an excommunicated Jew. His character may be best gaged by a suit for criminal libel which he rather inexplicably brought, a little while ago, against Bernard M. Baruch, Thomas J. Watson, of International Business Machines, and other well-known men. Before the astounded magistrate threw out his suit, Freedman had publicly, if somewhat irrelevantly, charged the prominent New York jurist, the leader of the Jewish community, Judge Joseph Proskauer, with conspiring with Cardinal Spellman to exclude him from the Catholic Church.

At their Washington meeting, Freedman and Gerald L. K. Smith discussed Mrs. Rosenberg's nomination as Assistant Secretary of Defense. Evidently spurred on by Smith, Freedman then sought out the New York lawyer, Hallomb Richardson, who has served as counsel for another tinpot amateur Fascist, Joe McWilliams. Richardson, in turn, put Freedman in touch with another character called Ralph De Sola.

De Sola is a former Communist living on the dim fringes of the public relations business. His last job was with an organization called the Society for the Preservation of Patriotic and Religious Music. Some indirect light is perhaps cast on De Sola by a suit his former employer, the society, brought against the Metropolitan Opera Co., the Texas Oil Co., and the American Broadcasting Co. In the course of this suit, the society charged the defendants with Communist leanings, because they were implicated in a broadcast of Giuseppe Verdi's opera, Don Carlo.

At Freedman's behest, De Sola prepared an affidavit stating that he and his former wife had sat next to Mrs. Rosenberg at a meeting of the John Reed Club in the late 1930's, and that fellow Communists had then told him she was a party member. A little later, Freedman handed over this affidavit and some other similar material to representatives of Senator JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY and the news commentator, Fulton Lewis, Jr. Freedman has testified that he did not know these men, but that their reliability was guaranteed to him before they called for the papers by Gerald L. K. Smith.

Somewhat later, Freedman returned to Washington, went to the office of Representative JOHN RANKIN, and there prepared a circular letter to the members of the Senate Armed Services Committee, repeating De Sola's and other charges. Thus the cry of "Communist" was raised. Although Freedman was utterly unknown to them at that time, the committee held up Mrs. Rosenberg's confirmation and began hearings.

A typical sample of the testimony against Mrs. Rosenberg was De Sola's claim that his former wife and a certain James Magraw, another public relations man, would fully corroborate his charge. When called to the stand, both Magraw and the ex-Mrs. De Sola denounced De Sola as totally undependable, and described his story about Mrs. Rosenberg as the purest fabrication. The general character of the attack on Mrs. Rosenberg was such, in fact, as to lead the extreme-conservative Republican, Senator HARRY CAIN, of Washington, to talk about perjury indictments.

All this may seem very comical. But in the first place some names that crop up in this extraordinary history belong to men whom many Americans regard as paladins of the free society. And in the second place this squalid business has occupied a great deal of the time of some of the most important men in Washington at a moment of dire national peril. The Senators were frankly afraid to let the matter drop, because of the power that the cry of "Communist" now has. The lesson is simple. Just because we caught a glimpse of the Communist lower depths in the Hiss case, we really need not yield to blackmail by the lower depths of the other end of the political spectrum.

The St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD J. THYE

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, December 18 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, there appeared in the Washington Sunday Star of yesterday, December 17, an article regarding the St. Lawrence seaway, written by Francis P. Douglas. I have read the article twice, because it contains much good, sound information relative to the St. Lawrence seaway. I ask that the article be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, in order that others may read it, because we need to take action relative to the St. Lawrence seaway project in the new Congress which convenes in January.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—SPONSORS OF PERENNIAL PROJECT BELIEVE IT MAY BE APPROVED AS STEP TOWARD DEFENSE

(By Francis P. Douglas)

The St. Lawrence seaway, first considered by Congress 55 years ago, will be before Congress again in the coming session and veteran supporters believe it has a better chance of success than ever before.

The reason is twofold: Dwindling iron ore reserves in the Mesabi Range at the head of Lake Superior. Steadily mounting dangers from Communist imperialism, to use President Truman's term.

American steel producers even now are importing iron ores from abroad—7,400,000 tons last year. They are developing sources in Venezuela and even across the Atlantic in Liberia. Those sources mean many perilous sea miles in case of attack by a nation with submarines.

The big source of the future is expected to be Labrador. Canadian ore would be loaded in vessels at Seven Islands, near the mouth of the St. Lawrence River. With the St. Lawrence seaway completed, the ships from Seven Islands could deliver the ore to the ports of the Great Lakes.

Alternatively the ore would go by ship to Baltimore and Philadelphia. But according to the National Security Resources Board, with the outbreak of hostilities it would become immediately imperative to start construction of a route which would avoid that 1,400-mile sea haul.

Without the St. Lawrence seaway completed, the most practical route in event of war, according to the NSRB, would be by water to Montreal, by the Canadian railway to Kingston, on the Canadian side of Lake Ontario, and thence through the lakes.

This development would involve the construction of unloaders at Montreal and of dock facilities for loading lake boats at Kingston. Even with wartime priorities the job would require 18 months or more.

A seaway reaching 2,300 miles from the ocean to Duluth seems a stupendous task. But the extraordinary part of the project is how much has been done gradually in past years. The main problem now is the bottleneck represented by the 114-mile stretch from Ogdensburg, N. Y., to Montreal. From Montreal to the sea there is a waterway 32.5 feet deep.

DOUBLE-BARRELED PROJECT

One of the long-time supporters of the project, Representative DINGELL, Democrat, of Michigan, said he will present again to the Eighty-second Congress a resolution to provide for carrying out the project. He introduced one of several measures for this purpose in the present Congress.

The present crisis in Korea makes the need of the seaway more apparent than ever, according to Mr. DINGELL.

"I think there's a good chance of it going through, but it's going to take a lot of work," Mr. DINGELL said. "The center of the problem is the necessity of defense and the decline in the iron ore at the head of the Lakes.

"Unless the St. Lawrence seaway is developed and there is a steady flow of iron ore to feed the maw of the steel mills, some of the Great Lakes cities are going to become ghost towns."

Representative DONDERO, Republican, of Michigan, who introduced a similar resolution in the Eighty-first Congress, also said he would present his measure again. Prospects of its adoption are brighter than before, he said.

The project, of course, is a double-barreled one of water transportation and hydroelectric power. The Army engineers have estimated the whole job would involve an outlay of $803,000,000 on the basis of 1948 costs; it would be more now. The navigation facilities would cost $429,000,000 and the power plants $374,000,000. The United States share of the total would be $573,000,000, the Canadian share $230,000,000.

The power project would be near Massena, N. Y., in the International Rapids section of the St. Lawrence. It would be the second largest single-dam power project in the world, exceeded in size only by Grand Coulee Dam. It would produce almost 13,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours of electricity a year.

The power would be distributed through New York and New England with the exception of Maine, in northern New Jersey and northeastern Pennsylvania. In emergency, power could be transmitted to Washington and Chicago.

The Security Resources Board said this about the importance of the seaway and power project to national security:

"It is needed to assure a high-grade, rapidly expansible iron ore supply from nearby foreign sources—ore which in an emergency could be moved to existing consuming centers over routes inside the continent. It is needed to supply substantial additional quantites of electric power and to augment the capacity and flexibility of our transportation system."

Much has been written and figures given without end on the ore situation in Minnesota. The NSRB report summarizes it this way:

SECURITY PROBLEM

"In recent years the Lake Superior region has supplied approximately 85 percent of the total iron-ore requirements of the United States. Since the beginning of 1940 we have shipped from the Lake Superior region a total of 770,000,000 tons of ore. Of this total nearly 600,000,000 tons came from open-pit mining operations, an amount which, by common agreement, is about equivalent to the entire remaining reserves of direct shipping and easily treated open-pit ores. * * * Twenty years from now production cannot be even half as large as at present.

"Steady production of ore from year to year over the remaining life of the Lake Superior reserves cannot, of course, be maintained. * * * Furthermore, as each year passes, the remaining reserves become more difficult to mine. * * * The rate and extent to which the country grows less and less able to supply its needs from domestic sources and thus becomes more and more dependent on foreign ores becomes a grave security problem."

Secretary of the Interior Chapman told a House committee last spring that the high-grade iron ore now being developed along the Quebec-Labrador border amounts to 400,000,000 tons.

The ore is held by the Iron Ore Co. of Canada. Its president is George M. Humphrey, president of the M. A. Hanna Co. of Cleveland. Associated with the Canadian interests and the Hanna company in the project are the Armco, National, Republic, and Wheeling Steel Corps., and the Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co.

Mr. Humphrey announced last month the completion of a $200,000,000 financing program and the letting of contracts for the building of a 260-mile railroad from the ore deposits to the port of Seven Islands. The ore, to become available in 1955, will move to American furnaces in the Youngstown and Pittsburgh areas by boat and rail via Montreal, with some to be shipped via Baltimore and Philadelphia. It is said the delivered prices will compare favorably with those for ores from the Lake Superior region.

MUCH DREDGING REQUIRED

How much already has been accomplished toward the goal of a 27-foot seaway is indicated by the fact there is at least a 25-foot channel all the way from Duluth to Ogdensburg.

In the channel between Lakes Superior and Huron the MacArthur lock was opened at Sault Ste. Marie in July 1943. It is 800 feet long, 80 feet wide, and has a depth of 31 feet. There is dredging to be done in the St. Marys River and also in the Straits of Mackinac, which connects Lakes Michigan and Huron, to increase it to 27 feet.

In the Detroit area dredging must be done to deepen the channel through the St. Clair River, Lake St. Clair, and the Detroit River, a distance of 88 miles.

Connecting Lakes Erie and Ontario is Canada's Welland Canal of 28 miles. It has a depth of 25 feet although the locks, 800 by 80 feet, provide a depth of 30 feet.

The St. Lawrence begins at the outlet to Lake Ontario. A Federal project already adopted by Congress provides for deepening the river to 27 feet for the 65 miles to Ogdensburg. This is the Thousand Islands section of the river.

The next stretch is the 46-mile International Rapids section from Ogdensburg to St. Regis on the New York side of the river and Cornwall on the Canadian side. Canada built a canal around the rapids in 1890, but it is only 14 feet deep and the locks are small. This would be kept, but the United States would build a new channel with three locks 800 by 30 feet and 30 feet deep.

Finally there is the 68-mile stretch from St. Regis to Montreal, entirely within Canada. Navigation now is through side canals with locks only 14 feet deep. Five new locks would be built of the same dimensions as those in the International Rapids section.

The project was approved by the House Rivers and Harbors Committee in 1941, just before Pearl Harbor. It never came to a vote in the House.

Since then a new feature has been added to make the whole subject more attractive—the seaway is planned as self-liquidating. The power development would pay for itself through the sale of electricity.

In the case of the seaway, tolls would be charged; and Commerce Department experts estimated potential traffic at between fifty-seven and eighty-four million tons of cargo a year with revenues between $36,000,000 and $49,000,000. Secretary of Commerce Sawyer estimated that with interest charges at 2½ percent the project could be paid in 53 years at $19,000,000 a year. Again this is on the basis of 1948 costs.

The St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE D. AIKEN
OF VERMONT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, December 18 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial pertaining to the St. Lawrence seaway, entitled "Should Delay No More," which appeared in the Suburban List. The Suburban List is a weekly newspaper published at Essex Junction, Vt. Its editor is Milo C. Reynolds, who for many years was a very courageous member of the Vermont Public Service Commission.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SHOULD DELAY NO MORE

The need of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project is becoming more and more apparent.

The other day Stanley Woodward, United States Ambassador to Canada, stated his Government recognizes the urgency of this project and plans to press for its adoption by Congress in 1951. Canada also recognizes the urgency of the St. Lawrence power project.

It is not only needed as an economical sea route into the heart of the continent but also to give lower costs and more abundant power for industrial development.

Certain interests have prevented the adoption of this project for many years. Their line of talk has usually been that it will come some day, but not now. If ever there was a time when more electric energy was needed, it is now.

Some of the opponents take the position that the St. Lawrence seaway would hurt their business. Those interests have got to recognize that projects in the interest of the public good cannot be held in abeyance in order to protect present concerns.

What business and industry have got to do is to grow up with the times, meet new conditions and adjust their policies to the needs of the public.

What a great cry went up when typesetting machines were introduced. It was said that thousands of printers would be put out of jobs. Just the contrary has resulted.

The typesetting machines have so advanced printing that thousands more printers are employed today than were ever thought of during the old times of hand-set composition.

That same principle must apply to improved conditions and the development of resources for the public good and a higher standard of living.

Projects like the St. Lawrence seaway cannot be held back in order to protect concerns which will not grow up with the country's progress.

Doing things today the way grandfather did is entirely out of the picture.

Let's Make It Clear to Youth

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON CANFIELD
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, it is tragic the number of our boys, classified as green troops, who had to lose their lives in Korea because they lacked the fundamentals of real military training.

Philip Saginario, of my home city of Paterson, was the first lad from my district to be returned home a casualty from Korea. He had been working as a clerk in an office in Tokyo when he was given a gun and rushed to Korea for immediate action. As I viewed his right arm, shattered beyond repair, he said:

Congressman, I never had any combat training and I was determined that if my capture appeared imminent, I was going to blow my brains out with my own gun. I had in mind, of course, what our fanatical foe had done to so many of our GI's and southern Koreans who believed in liberty.

This lad of 18 was graduated from Eastside High School 18 months ago.

I have before me a recent issue of a Camden, N. J., newspaper with a Korean casualty list. There is Pfc William L. Clifton, 19, who enlisted last March and joined the First Cavalry Division in Korea in August. There is Pvt. Elwood H. Graham, 17, who enlisted last May 15, later joining the same division. There is Pvt. Raymond W. Hamilton, 18, who left junior high school last April to go overseas and become a member of the First Cavalry Division. There is Pfc John McKeown, 21, who enlisted last April, going to Japan in September and soon thereafter joining the First Cavalry Division in Korea.

It was on June 1, 1945, that I first addressed the House on the necessity of some sound, sane, democratic form of universal military training for our American youth, a system which could be integrated with schooling and training for later use in civilian life. I recall the day I made my remarks I held in my hand a clipping from the San Francisco Chronicle referring to the program of the Soviet Union, then training millions of its youth, 15 and 16 years of age, in combat training.

I am impressed by the following editorial captioned "Let's make it clear to youth" in today's edition of the Newark Star-Ledger:

LET'S MAKE IT CLEAR TO YOUTH

It is admittedly difficult to foresee all the facets of the military manpower problem, but we should not defer too long a decision bearing upon youth's future in the emergency.

The draft age now begins at 19, but there is much talk of lowering it to 18. This would mean that high-school students could expect to enter the armed services immediately upon graduation.

If that action is necessary, then the drafted youths should be offered more than merely military training. Occupational and professional training should be open to such youths as can qualify. We should not make the costly mistake of unnecessarily stunting the development of a whole generation.

If fighting on a world scale breaks out, the youngsters will have to be denied such educational opportunities. But as long as we are merely in the preparedness stage, we should not allow recruitment to deprive youth of all educational opportunity.

If we are to protect the future of our country, we should devise our recruitment and manpower policies to do a minimum of harm to the training of youth for its peacetime future. Above all, we should strive to minimize youth's unrest and bewilderment by adopting a clear-cut policy and making its essentials speedily known and clearly understood.

For the Common Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR
OF MARYLAND
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, December 19 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, Communist aggression in Korea and the contempt towards the free nations of the world evidenced by the Communist terms for peace in Korea, can leave no question in the mind of anyone concerning communism's intentions towards the world. The only answer to such an attitude is force, and military force today, as always, must be based on a background of trained fighting men.

For this reason I believe it very timely to recall the report to the Nation by Secretary of Defense Marshall, made as he relinquished the Office of Chief of Staff on September 1, 1945, entitled "For the Common Defense."

It included a powerful appeal for universal military training, as to the necessity of which I am in hearty agreement.

I ask unanimous consent that relevant portions of General Marshall's report be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

FOR THE COMMON DEFENSE

To fulfill its responsibility for protecting this Nation against foreign enemies, the Army must project its planning beyond the immediate future. In this connection I feel that I have a duty, a responsibility, to present publicly at this time my conception, from a military point of view, of what is required to prevent another international catastrophe.

For years men have been concerned with individual security. Modern nations have given considerable study and effort to the establishment of social-security systems for those unable or unwise enough to provide for themselves. But effective insurance against the disasters which have slaughtered millions of people and leveled their homes is long overdue.

We finish each bloody war with a feeling of acute revulsion against this savage form of human behavior, and yet on each occasion we confuse military preparedness with the causes of war and then drift almost deliberately into another catastrophe. This error of judgment was defined long ago by Washington. He proposed to endow this Nation at the outset with a policy which should have been a reasonable guaranty of our security for centuries. The cost of refusing his guidance is recorded in the sacrifice of life and in the accumulation of mountainous debts. We have continued impractical. We have ignored the hard realities of world affairs. We have been purely idealistic.

We must start, I think, with a correction of the tragic misunderstanding that a security policy is a war policy. War has been defined by a people who have thought a lot about it—the Germans. They have started most of the recent ones. The German soldier-philosopher Clausewitz described war as a special violent form of political action. Frederick of Prussia, who left Germany the belligerent legacy which has now destroyed her, viewed war as a device to enforce his will whether he was right or wrong. He held that with an invincible offensive military force he could win any political argument. This is the doctrine Hitler carried to the verge of complete success. It is the doctrine of Japan. It is a criminal doctrine, and like other forms of crime, it has cropped up again and again since man began to live with his neighbors in communities and nations. There has long been an effort to outlaw war for exactly the same reason that man has outlawed murder. But the law prohibiting murder does not of itself prevent murder. It must be enforced. The enforcing power, however, must be maintained on a strictly democratic basis. There must not be a large standing army subject to the behest of a group of schemers. The citizen-soldier is the guaranty against such a misuse of power.

In order to establish an international system for preventing wars, peace-loving peoples of the world are demonstrating an eagerness to send their representatives to such conferences as those at Dumbarton Oaks and San Francisco with the fervent hope that they may find a practical solution. Yet, until it is proved that such a solution has been found to prevent wars, a rich nation which lays down its arms as we have done after every war in our history, will court disaster. The existence of the complex and fearful instruments of destruction now available make this a simple truth which is, in my opinion, undebatable.

So far as their ability to defend themselves and their institutions was concerned, the great democracies were sick nations when Hitler openly massed his forces to impose his will on the world. As sick as any was the United States of America. We had no field army. There were the bare skeletons of three and one-half divisions scattered in small pieces over the entire United States. It was impossible to train even these few combat troops as divisions because motor transportation and other facilities were lacking and funds for adequate maneuvers were not appropriated. The Air Forces consisted of a few partially equipped squadrons serving continental United States, Panama, Hawaii, and the Philippines; their planes were largely obsolescent and could hardly have survived a single day of modern aerial combat. We lacked modern arms and equipment. When President Roosevelt proclaimed, on September 8, 1939, that a limited emergency existed for the United States we were, in terms of available strength, not even a third-rate military power. Some collegians had been informing the world and evidently convincing the Japanese that the young men of America would refuse to fight in defense of their country.

The German armies swept over Europe at the very moment we sought to avoid war by assuring ourselves that there could be no war. The security of the United States of America was saved by sea distances, by allies, and by the errors of a prepared enemy. For probably the last time in the history of warfare those ocean distances were a vital factor in our defense. We may elect again to depend on others and the whim and error of potential enemies, but if we do we will be carrying the treasure and freedom of this great Nation in a paper bag.

Returning from France after the last war, with General Pershing, I participated in his endeavors to persuade the Nation to establish and maintain a sound defense policy. Had his recommendations been accepted, they might have saved this country the hundreds of billions of dollars and the more than a million casualties it has cost us again to restore the peace. We might even have been spared this present world tragedy. General Pershing was asked against whom do we prepare. Obviously that questions could not be answered specifically until nearly 20 years later when Adolf Hitler led the replenished armies of defeated Germany back into world conflict. Even as late as 1940 I was asked very much the same question before a committee of Congress. Not even then could I say definitely exactly where we might have to fight, but I did recall that in past wars the United States forces had fought in Latin America, in France, in Belgium, in Germany, in Russia, in Siberia, in Africa, in the Philippines, and in China, but I did not anticipate that in the near future American soldiers would fight in the heart of Burma and in the islands of the vast Pacific, and would be garrisoning areas across the entire land and water masses of the earth. From this lesson there is no alternative but that this Nation must be prepared to defend its interest against any nation or combination of nations which might sometime feel powerful enough to attempt the settlement of political arguments or gain resources or territory by force of arms.

Twice in recent history the factories and farms and people of the United States have foiled aggressor nations; conspirators against the peace would not give us a third opportunity.

Between Germany and America in 1914 and again in 1939 stood Great Britain and the U. S. S. R., France, Poland, and the other countries of Europe. Because the technique of destruction had not progressed to its present peak, these nations had to be eliminated and the Atlantic Ocean crossed by ships before our factories could be brought within the range of the enemy guns. At the close of the German War in Europe they were just on the outer fringes of the range of fire from an enemy in Europe. Goering stated after his capture that it was a certainty the eastern American cities would have been under rocket bombardment had Germany remained undefeated for two more years. The first attacks would have started much sooner. The technique of war has brought the United States, its homes and factories into the front line of world conflict. They escaped destructive bombardment in the second World War. They would not in a third.

It no longer appears practical to continue what we once conceived as hemispheric defense as a satisfactory basis for our security.

We are now concerned with the peace of the entire world. And the peace can only be maintained by the strong.

What then must we do to remain strong and still not bankrupt ourselves on military expenditures to maintain a prohibitively expensive professional Army even if one could be recruited? President Washington answered that question in recommendations to the first Congress to convene under the United States Constitution. He proposed a program for the peacetime training of a citizen army. At that time the conception of a large professional Regular Army was considered dangerous to the liberties of the Nation. It is still so today. But the determining factor in solving this problem will inevitably be the relation between the maintenance of military power and the cost in annual appropriations. No system, even if actually adopted in the near future, can survive the political pressure to reduce the military budget if the costs are high—and professional armies are very costly.

There is now another disadvantage to a large professional standing army. Wars in the twentieth century are fought with the total resources, economic, scientific, and human, of entire nations. Every specialized field of human knowledge is employed. Modern war requires the skills and knowledge of the individuals of a nation.

Obviously we cannot all put on uniforms and stand ready to repel invasion. The greatest energy in peacetime of any successful nation must be devoted to productive and gainful labor. But all Americans can, in the next generations, prepare themselves to serve their country in maintaining the peace or against the tragic hour when peace is broken, if such a misfortune again overtakes us. This is what is meant by universal military training. It is not universal military service—the actual induction of men into the combatant forces. Such forces would be composed during peacetime of volunteers. The trainees would be in separate organizations maintained for training purposes only. Once trained, young men would be freed from further connection with the Army unless they chose, as they now may, to enroll in the National Guard or an organized reserve unit, or to volunteer for service in the small professional army. When the Nation is in jeopardy they could be called, just as men are now called, by a committee of local neighbors, in an order of priority and under such conditions as directed at that time by the Congress.

The concept of universal military training is not founded, as some may believe, on the principle of a mass army. The Army has been accused of rigidly holding to this doctrine in the face of modern developments. Nothing, I think, could be further from the fact, as the record of the mobilization for this war demonstrates. Earlier in this report I explained how we had allocated manpower to exploit American technology. Out of our entire military mobilization of 14,000,000 men, the number of infantry troops was less than 1,500,000 Army and Marine.

The remainder of our Armed Forces, sea, air, and ground, was largely fighting a war of machinery. Counting those engaged in war production there were probably 75,000,000 to 80,000,000 Americans directly involved in prosecution of the war. To technological warfare we devoted 98 percent of our entire effort.

Nor is it proposed now to abandon this formula which has been so amazingly successful. The harnessing of the basic power of the universe will further spur our efforts to use brain for brawn in safeguarding the United States of America.

However, technology does not eliminate the need for men in war. The Air Forces, which were the highest developed technologically of any of our Armed Forces in this war, required millions of men to do their job. Every B–29 that winged over Japan was dependent on the efforts of 12 officers and 73 men in the immediate combat area alone.

The number of men that were involved in the delivery of the atomic bomb on Hiroshima was tremendous. First we had to have the base in the Marianas from which the plane took off. This first required preliminary operations across the vast Pacific, thousands of ships, millions of tons of supply, the heroic efforts of hundreds of thousands of men. Further, we needed the B–20's and their fighter escort which gave us control of the air over Japan. This was the result of thousands of hours of training and preparation in the United States and the energies of hundreds of thousands of men.

The effective technology on the military structure is identical to its effect on the national economy. Just as the automobile replaced the horse and made work for millions of Americans, the atomic explosives will require the services of millions of men if we are compelled to employ them in fighting our battles.

This war has made it clear that the security of the Nation, when challenged by an armed enemy, requires the services of virtually all able-bodied male citizens within the effective military-age group.

In war the Nation cannot depend on the numbers of men willing to volunteer for active service, nor can our security in peace.

In another national emergency the existence of a substantial portion of the Nation's young manpower already trained or in process of training would make it possible to fill out immediately the peacetime ranks of the Navy, the Regular Army, the National Guard, and the Organized Reserve. As a result our Armed Forces would be ready for almost immediate deployment to counter initial hostile moves, ready to prevent an enemy from gaining footholds from which he could launch destructive attacks against our industries and our homes. By this method we would establish for the generations to come a national military policy: (1) which is entirely within the financial capabilities of our peacetime economy and is absolutely democratic in its nature, and (2) which places the military world, and therefore the political world, on notice that this vast power, linked to our tremendous resources, wealth, and production, is immediately available. There can be no question that all the nations of the world will respect our views accordingly, creating at least a probability of peace on earth and of good will among men, rather than disaster upon disaster in a tormented world where the very processes of civilization itself are constantly threatened.

The decision in this matter is so grave in consequences that it demands complete frankness on my part. Therefore, I must say that many of the objections which have been made to universal military training appear to be influenced by ulterior motives or to ignore completely the tragedies of the past and present which we are seeking to avoid for the future. They often seem to give undue importance to restrictions on our freedom of life, trivial in comparison with the awful tragedies we are seeking to avoid, and the great blessings we hope to secure for succeeding generations.

The timing of our decision on the question of universal military training is urgent. The officials of the State Department have been strongly of the opinion that a decision in this matter prior to the final peace negotiations would greatly strengthen the hand of the United States in securing acceptance of a genuine organization to handle international differences.

The terms of the final peace settlement will provide a basis for determining the strength of the regular or permanent postwar military forces of the United States—air, ground, and naval—but they cannot, in my opinion, alter the necessity for a system of universal military training.

The yardstick by which the size of the permanent force must be measured is maximum security with minimum cost in men, matériel, and maintenance. So far as they can foresee world conditions a decade from now, War Department planners, who have taken every conceivable factor into consideration, believe that our position will be sound if we set up machinery which will permit the mobilization of an Army of 4,000,000 men within a period of 1 year following any international crisis resulting in a national emergency for the United States.

The Regular Army must be comprised largely of a strategic force, heavy in air power, partially deployed in the Pacific and the Caribbean, ready to protect the Nation against a sudden hostile thrust and immediately available for emergency action wherever required. It is obvious that another war would start with a lightning attack to take us unaware. The pace of the attack would be at supersonic speeds of rocket weapons, closely followed by a striking force which would seek to exploit the initial and critical advantage. We must be sufficiently prepared against such a threat to hold the enemy at a distance until we can rapidly mobilize our strength. The Regular Army and the National Guard must be prepared to meet such a crisis.

Another mission of the Regular Army is to provide the security garrisons for the outlying bases. We quickly lost the Philippines, Guam, and Wake Islands at the beginning of this war, and are still expending lives and wealth in recovering them.

The third mission of the permanent Army is to furnish the overhead, the higher headquarters which must keep the machine and the plans up to date for whatever national emergency we may face in the future. This overhead includes the War Department, the War College, the service schools, and the headquarters of the military areas into which continental United States is subdivided to facilitate decentralized command and coordination of the peacetime military machine. This was about all we had on the eve of this war, planners and a small number of men who had little to handle in practice but sound ideas on how to employ the wartime hosts that would be gathered in the storm. Had it not been for the time the British Empire and the Soviets bought us, those plans and ideas would have been of little use.

The fourth and probably the most important mission of the Regular Army is to provide the knowledge, the expert personnel, and the installations for training the citizen-soldier upon whom, in my view, the future peace of the world largely depends.

Of the citizen-Army, the National Guard is in the first category of importance. It must be healthy and strong, ready to take its place in the first line of defense in the first weeks of an emergency, and not dependent upon a year or more of training before it can be conditioned to take the field against a trained enemy. It is not feasible under the conditions of peace for the National Guard within itself to provide the basic, the fundamental training which is an imperative requirement for its mission. Therefore, in my opinion, based on a long and intimate experience with the Guard from 1907 until 1941, the essential requirement for such a system under modern conditions is universal military training from which to draw the volunteers for the ranks of the Guard. Without such a firm foundation, I am clearly of the opinion that a sufficiently dependable force for our postwar needs cannot be maintained.

The second important component of the citizen army is the Organized Reserve through which full mobilization of the Nation's resources to war footing is accomplished. At the start of the present war, the reserve was almost entirely an officer corps, the regimental and divisional groups lacking a practical basis for mobilization. The contribution of this component was therefore largely one of individuals, but of wide extent and great importance. The depleted officer ranks of the Regular Army were filled by the reserve, the countless new staffs and organizations were mainly composed of reserve officers, the great training camps for men inducted through the Selective Service System drew in the beginning on the officer strength of the Reserve Corps. The officer candidate schools from which our present Army acquired its vital small-unit leadership were staffed by reserve officers. These officers were largely veterans of World War I and graduates of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps. Pitifully small appropriations had limited training to a brief period once in every 3 or 4 years and so few numbers of troops that the limited training the reserve officers received had little relation to actual battle.

This lack of troops with which reserve officers could acquire practical experience in command and staff work was the most critical limitation. There was no enlisted strength in the reserve force. There was little connection and understanding between the Officers' Reserve Corps and the National Guard—which had an enlisted strength—and the number of enlisted men in the Regular Army was so small that it was impossible to qualify reserve officers by training with regulars. Especially in the dense centers of population there were few regular troops. Yet here were located the largest groups of reserve officers. Even had funds for transportation to the areas where regular troops were stationed been available, and they were not, the few troops on the regular rolls would have been completely submerged under a deluge of reserve officers. For example, the strength of the Officers' Reserve Corps in 1938 was more than double the number of regular soldiers in combat units in the continental United States.

Only by universal military training can full vigor and life be instilled into the reserve system. It creates a pool of well-trained men and officers from which the National Guard and the Organized Reserve can draw volunteers; it provides opportunities for the guard and reserve units to participate in corps and Army maneuvers, which are vital preparations to success in military campaigns. Without these trained men and officers, without such opportunities to develop skill through actual practice in realistic maneuvers, neither the Regular Army, the National Guard, nor the reserve can hope to bring high efficiency to their vital missions.

Though ROTC graduates composed 12 percent of the war officers, its most important contribution was the immediate availability of its product. Just what we could have done in the first phases of our mobilization and training without these men I do not know. I do know that our plans would have had to be greatly curtailed and the cessation of hostilities on the European front would have been delayed accordingly. We must enlarge and strengthen the system. It must be established on a higher level, comparable to the academic levels of college education in which the young men of the ROTC are engaged. All this is made easily possible if the student has participated in universal military training, and at the same time the length of the course can be shortened by 1 year. He would enter the ROTC as far advanced as his predecessors were after 2½ years of the original 3-year course. He would have completed his elementary training—the military equivalent of his grammar school and high-school courses—and would be prepared for college work, that is for training as an officer, a prospective leader of men. The product of such an ROTC would provide the National Guard and the Organized Reserve with an officer corps of exceptional character.

An unbroken period of 1 year's training appears essential to the success of a sound security plan based on the concept of a citizen army.

It is possible to train individual soldiers as replacements for veteran divisions and air groups as we now do in a comparatively short period of time. The training of the unit itself cannot be accomplished at best in less than a year; air units require even more time. The principle is identical to that of coaching a football team. A halfback can learn quickly how to run with the ball, but it takes time and much practice and long hours of team scrimmage before he is proficient at carrying the ball through an opposing team, utilizing the aid of the 10 other men on the team. So it is with an army division or combat air group. Men learn to fire a rifle or machine gun quickly, but it takes long hours of scrimmage, which the Army calls maneuver, before the firing of the rifle is coordinated with the activities of more than 14,000 other men on the team.

All men who might someday have to fight for their Nation must have this team training. The seasoned soldiers of our present superb divisions will have lived beyond the age of military usefulness. The situation will be similar in the peacetime army to that which obtained when we began to mobilize for this war and all men had to have at least a year of unit training before we had divisions even fit for shipment overseas.

The training program would be according to the standards which have made the American soldier in this war the equal of the finest fighting men. It would be kept abreast of technical developments and the resulting modifications of tactics.

Throughout the training a strenuous program of instruction would have to be followed, but it would not be possible in peace to carry on the work under the tremendous pressure we now follow in wartime. Athletics, recreational opportunities, short week ends, and other vacational opportunities such as at Christmastime, would, of course, be necessary. However, if the Government is to be justified in the expenditure of the funds involved, a vigorous schedule should be enforced; otherwise we would produce a half-baked product which would fail to command the respectful attention of the nations of the world, and therefore negate the primary purpose of the entire system.

To those who fear the Army might militarize our young men and indoctrinate them with dangerous conceptions, to those who express doubts of the Army's capacity to do the job, I submit the evidence of our present armies. The troops have been trained sufficiently to defeat a first-class enemy. Their minds have not been warped; quite the contrary. The American people are satisfied, I am confident, that their armies are, in fact, armies of democracy. They know that the men composing those armies are far better physically than they otherwise would have been; that their general health has been better than at home, except for these serving in the tropical jungles. The officers who trained our armies were largely citizen-soldiers. They did have the initial guidance of Regular officers, but only 2 percent of the entire officer corps was professional. Only slightly more were of the National Guard; 25 percent were products of the Officers' Reserve Corps; 12 percent more were men commissioned direct from civil life because of certain professional qualifications. The great majority of the officers came up from the ranks, 59 percent of the total, which guaranteed the democracy of the Army.

To those who consider the introduction of a system of universal military training an imposition on democracy, I would reply that in my opinion it would be the most democratic expression of our national life. Whatever my limitations may be in judging this matter, I submit the evidence of the proposal of our first President.

Washington's program provided for universal training of all men arriving at the age of 17. The citizen-militia was to be divided into three classes, men from 17 to 21, known as the advance corps, men 21 to 46, known as the main corps, and men from 46 to 61, known as the reserve corps. All of the peacetime training would have been concentrated in the advance corps, but eventually all members of main and reserve corps would have been graduates of the training program. The militia bill was first introduced in the third session of the First Congress. It was considered in the House on March 5, 1792, and as finally enacted contained no element of any of Washington's recommendations. It was so emasculated when finally adopted that the Representative who introduced the bill himself voted against its passage.

It appears probable that had the bill been approved by Congress, the United States might have avoided much of the war making that has filled its brief history. The impressment of American seamen would not have been regarded as a harmless pastime in the early 1800's, nor would the Kaiser have been so easily disposed to avenge the death of the Archduke Franz Ferdinand in 1914 with a world war, nor Adolf Hitler have been quite so quick to break the peace, if over these years the United States had been recognized by the warmongers as a nation immediately to be reckoned with.

The peacetime army must not only be prepared for immediate mobilization of an effective war army, but it must have in reserve the weapons needed for the first months of the fighting and clear-cut plans for immediately producing the tremendous additional quantities of matériel necessary in total war. We must never again face a great national crisis with ammunition lacking to serve our guns, few guns to fire, and no decisive procedures for procuring vital arms in sufficient quantities.

The necessity for continuous research into the military ramifications of man's scientific advance is now clear to all and it should not be too difficult to obtain the necessary appropriations for this purpose during peacetime. There is, however, always much reluctance to expenditure of funds for improvement of war-making instruments, particularly where there is no peacetime usefulness in the product.

The development of combat airplanes is closely allied with development of civil aeronautics; the prototypes of many of our present transport planes and those soon to come were originally bombers. Many of the aeronautical principles that helped give this Nation the greatest Air Force in the world grew out of commercial development and our production know-how at the start of this war was partially the fruit of peacetime commercial enterprise. Since many vital types of weapons have no commercial counterpart, the peacetime development of these weapons has been grossly neglected. Antiaircraft weapons are a good example. The highly efficient antiaircraft of today did not materialize until long after the fighting began. The consequent cost in time, life, and money of this failure to spend the necessary sums on such activity in peacetime has been appalling.

There is another phase of scientific research which I think has been somewhat ignored—the development of expeditious methods for the mass production of war matériel. This is of great importance since it determines how quickly we can mobilize our resources if war comes and how large and costly our reserve stocks of war matériel must be. Serious thought and planning along this line can save millions of tax dollars.

We can be certain that the next war, if there is one, will be even more total than this one. The nature of war is such that once it now begins it can end only as this one is ending, in the destruction of the vanquished, and it should be assumed that another reconversion from peace to war production will take place initially under enemy distant bombardment. Industrial mobilization plans must be founded on these assumptions and so organized that they will meet them and any other situation that may develop. Yet they must in no way retard or inhibit the course of peacetime production.

If this Nation is to remain great it must bear in mind now and in the future that war is not the choice of those who wish passionately for peace. It is the choice of those who are willing to resort to violence for political advantage. We can fortify ourselves against disaster, I am convinced, by the measures I have here outlined. In these protections we can face the future with a reasonable hope for the best and with quiet assurance that even though the worst may come, we are prepared for it.

As President Washington said in his message to Congress of December 3, 1793:

"I cannot recommend to your notice measures for the fulfillment of our duties to the rest of the world, without again pressing upon you the necessity of placing ourselves in a position of complete defense, and of exacting from them the fulfillment of the duties towards us. The United States ought not to indulge a persuasion, that contrary to the order of human efforts, they will forever keep at a distance those painful appeals to arms, with which the history of every other nation abounds. There is a rank due to the United States among nations, which will be withheld, if not absolutely lost, by the reputation of weakness—if we desire to avoid insult we must be ready to repel it; if we desire to secure peace, one of the most powerful institutions of our rising prosperity, it must be known that we are at all times ready for war."

Chief of Staff.

Our Burned Fingers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KENNETH S. WHERRY
OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, December 19 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Our Burned Fingers" from the Omaha Morning World-Herald of December 15.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

OUR BURNED FINGERS

If the official communique told the whole truth, the Messrs. Truman and Attlee, at their celebrated conference in Washington, confined themselves to an exchange of resounding platitudes and cliches.

There are those, however—and Senator KEM, of Missouri, is one of them—who contend that the communique was designed to conceal more than it revealed. Senator KEM relates that the Honorable Mr. Attlee later held a press conference at the British Embassy in Washington for British journalists only, and that from the published reports of this meeting he concludes that "Mr. Attlee got everything he came to the United States to get."

Specifically, Senator KEM has the impression that Mr. Attlee obtained from the President a number of side agreements. That is one of the reasons why the Senator is proposing a Senate resolution demanding that the President make a full report on the conference, and tell the Senate whether he made any agreements at all with the Prime Minister.

The framers of the Constitution thought they were quite explicit about the way such matters should be handled. They said treaties should be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

But long years afterward a President of the United States discovered that it was possible to make agreements with foreign powers without calling them treaties—and at Cairo, Tehran, Yalta, and on a warship in the Atlantic, he did so. Those agreements were not legal under the Constitution, but they were honored nevertheless. And they were in large measure responsible for the postwar troubles which have befallen the Republic.

President Truman's penchant for jotting down his thoughts is well known.

The fact that some of the things he jots down are quite irresponsible is also well known.

The conclusion is obvious:

The Senate should demand that any agreement or understanding of any sort reached by the President and the Prime Minister should be submitted for advice and consent.

And by the same action the Senate should make quite clear to His Majesty's government that the Republic of the United States will not consider itself bound by any side agreements which may have been reached.

Our American fingers have been burned once, badly. And once is enough.

Futility of Efforts To Buy Friendship of Foreign Countries

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES P. KEM
OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, December 19 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, it is becoming more evident each day that we have not succeeded in buying friendship abroad with our gifts of dollars. For some pointed thinking on that subject, I commend an article by Mr. George Sokolsky which appeared in the Washington Times-Herald of December 19. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

THESE DAYS

(By George Sokolsky)

Very late the Government has been forced to recognize that it is engaged in a war and that the Nation needs to be mobilized for its defense.

This should have been done on August 15, 1945, when our present troubles were already apparent. Instead, on that date, this country threw its strength to the winds and engaged in a round of palavers and of buying friendships which has wasted our heritage.

Invaluable equipment was dumped, sold, and permitted to be stolen, as in the Philippines, and now we have to start all over again.

The appointment of Charles E. Wilson of General Electric to the responsibility of the management of supply is an acknowledgment that more than paper planning is needed. Wilson is tough and will hold the economic line with hardihood, depending, of course, on how much effective authority is delegated to him. If he is in reality subordinated to the White House economists, his office will be decorative. No man can do a good job if his boss is everlastingly changing his mind about policy.

The mobilization of manpower and of production is, however, insufficient. That alone will not win.

It is necessary also to re-examine the policies of this Nation which brought us our present discredit and to remove from public office the bunglers.

The dismissal of Dean Acheson is essential. As long as he remains, most Americans will have no confidence in the conduct of our foreign relations. In no other country could a public servant survive Mr. Acheson's just unpopularity.

In a manner, Dean Acheson has become a symbol of the men of Yalta—those officials who participated in the arrangements for our defeat by Soviet Russia. It is unsound to question their loyalty; it is not unsound to impugn their judgment.

Men who over so long a period have always been grievously wrong have no place in the national leadership. They should go and forthwith. Their presence in the Government imperils the morale of the people.

Not only should Dean Acheson go, but Philip Jessup and Dean Rusk and any other architects of our misfortunes as are involved in this need for the deposit of policy in hands that are trusted. As long as they remain in the State Department, no pleas for unity, no matter by whom uttered, will have public support.

And we need to mobilize our friends and allies. We now know that money does not buy friends or allies. When they no longer need your money, they dislike you as a creditor. Machiavelli said what I have in mind so much better than I can:

"In general of men * * * they are ungrateful, fickle, false, cowards, covetous, and as long as you succeed they are yours entirely; they will offer you their blood, property, life, and children * * * when the need is far distant; but when it approaches they turn against you.

"And that prince who, relying entirely on their promises, has neglected other precautions, is ruined; because friendships that are obtained by payments, and not by greatness or nobility of mind, may indeed be earned, but they are not secured, and in time of need cannot be relied upon."

Precisely that has happened to us. Joseph P. Kennedy, in his recent speech, emphasized the fact that we hardly have a real ally in the world and he suggested that we get out of Europe and Asia and devote ourselves to our Latin American neighbors. It was too angry and limited a plan, but was nevertheless an inevitable response to the challenge of our isolation.

Certainly, those who once called such as Joe Kennedy, isolationists, now witness the spectacle of the United States as a country perforce isolated by her erstwhile allies to whose support she had twice come in war. They pleaded for aid and we gave it and now they flirt with our enemies.

But it is not good enough to admit such a failure of our policy. This country needs at this moment a Disraeli, a Talleyrand, to reverse its policy and to move back to the authority in the world to which our strength entitles us. Such a person is not in sight; yet he must exist among us who have been so rich in talent everywhere but in Government.

Earl Blasts CIO Leaders for Korean Policy Stand

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER NORBLAD
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 7, 1950

Mr. NORBLAD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herewith an account in the Oregon Farmer Union of a speech by Stanley Earl, former CIO Oregon executive secretary:

EARL BLASTS CIO LEADERS FOR KOREAN POLICY STAND

Stanley Earl, formerly executive secretary of the Oregon CIO, directed a bitter blast at the American labor movement for its policy of whitewashing the sins of the Truman administration's handling of the Nation's foreign affairs. Speaking before the Salem Farmer-Labor Council meeting at the Farmers Union Hall in Salem, November 27.

Earl resigned as executive secretary of the Oregon CIO to accept appointment as labor adviser with the ECA (Marshall plan) in Korea. He served 10½ months and was driven out by the North Korean invasion on June 25.

"One of the biggest disappointments to me," said Earl, "on my return to the United States was the reception I received by labor. If what I had to say about the rottenness of the Korean regime was true then I should have had support from the CIO and the American Federation of Labor. The CIO has just completed its national convention. Not a thing has appeared in the press except that the CIO will ask bold new steps from ECA. That is not enough. CIO leaders should go to Truman and demand a revaluation of our policies in accord with the original conception of the Marshall plan."

Earl revealed that on his return to the United States he was met by labor leaders who told him that even though what he had to say was true about conditions in Korea he should, nevertheless, "shut up" because "we are in a war." He went to Washington and was cold-shouldered by CIO leadership, which did everything it could to suppress the story he was trying to tell the American people about the collaboration of high American officials and the military government in Korea with the rotten regime of Syngman Rhee. Rhee, who had been repudiated by his own people in a free election on May 30, a few weeks before the invasion, has now been installed as dictator over all of Korea under the auspices of General MacArthur.

POLICE-STATE METHODS

Earl told about the police-state methods which he encountered in Korea.

Free trade-unions did not exist, newspapers which dared to criticize the government were suppressed, reporters were arrested. There were 9,000 prisoners in one Seoul prison; of these, 6,000 had been imprisoned a year and a half because of their political views.

The police attended all public meetings, and if any remarks were made critical of the Korean Government of Rhee the speaker was subject to "interrogation," which Earl said was a refined sort of torture. Several of his friends, all labor leaders, and all non-Communists were executed on the day of the Korean invasion merely because they were known as leftists. These leftists had been responsible for driving the Communists out of the labor movement in South Korea, Earl said. He declared that in his 10½ months of residence in Southern Korea he did not meet or know of a single Communist.

"It takes just so much suppression before communism begins to grow because of the people's dissatisfaction," he said. "It was not necessary for the Communists to produce any chaos in Korea. There was enough chaos produced by President Rhee.

"I sent a letter to Washington and to Dr. Bunce, chief of our Korean mission, pointing out some of these facts and urging that something be done about it. That letter was written May 24, 1950, a month before the invasion, but nothing happened. I think it is time now that the people of the United States knew some of these facts."

TIME TO WAKE UP

"The situation in Korea could have been prevented and the present war prevented. When I speak of the corrupt, rotten government of Syngman Rhee, I mean just that. The kind of government that we were supporting was known to everyone including our own Ambassador, Mr. Muccio. It was known to all Asiatics. It is time for our Government to wake up and decide that countries that we help with our dollars and manpower should be worthy of our support."

Earl declared that a similar situation is developing in Indochina and that if the American people do not watch out they will soon be asked to send manpower to support the same kind of a rotten regime in Indochina.

"In Korea it was our policy to support any group fighting communism. We are doing the same in supporting Franco in Spain," he said. "Of course, Franco is fighting communism, but as a Fascist he is creating the Communists. Hitler fought communism. So did Mussolini."

Earl predicted that arms given to police states like that we are now supporting in Korea will eventually fall into the hands of the Communists as the people have no place else to turn, since we have deserted them.

"We have a pretty hard row to hoe," he said, "trying to win back the confidence of the Asiatics. A lot of Koreans and a lot of Europeans, too, are coming to the conclusion that it is better to be occupied by Communists and live than be liberated by the United States and die."

Earl said that he had recently had a letter from Korea and that not a single factory is standing in Seoul. He also said that Korea cannot be defended militarily. It is a physical impossibility if the Chinese or the Soviet Union decide to make Korea untenable for us, he said.

INTERNAL REVOLUTION

Earl also declared that if the Communists had not invaded from North Korea there would have been an internal revolution in South Korea without any Communist invasion.

"I don't speak idly when I speak of police terrorisms," said Earl. "Don't you think it is time that our Government lifted its own iron curtain on countries where we are pouring in dollars and men. Isn't it time we started dealing with people instead of with Cabinet members, brass hats, big-land owners, and big-business men. Our Senators and John Foster Dulles should have walked down some of the side streets of Seoul where they could have seen babies dying from malnutrition at the same time that they were being entertained at a big state dinner by President Rhee. Rhee was exporting 100,000 tons of rice to Japan annually so he could get hold of fourteen million American dollars. While he was exporting this rice, thousands of Koreans were dying of starvation.

"When I returned to the United States," said Earl, "I was met by some high-place labor leaders who said, 'Maybe it's true but don't say it. It will aid the Communists.' But the people aiding the Communists are those at Washington, D. C., who are refusing to give the American people the facts. The people who should have done this and who should have forced exposure of these facts were the CIO and the A. F. of L."

Ireland and Atlantic Security

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 19, 1950

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following letter from the Washington Post of December 16, 1950, written by Eric Dorman O'Gowan:

IRELAND AND ATLANTIC SECURITY

On April 18 of this year I had the honor to address the Overseas Writers Press Club at Washington on the subject of Ireland's place in the North Atlantic defense scheme.

At that time I urged the vital necessity of a sound political background to military planning, indicating from recent history (World War II) the disasters inherent in the failure of politicians to provide the military command with a realistic basis for their plans and operations. On such occasions the overlooking of some political factor not readily apparent to the military mind causes military action to be based on faulty premises.

I fear this has once again proved true in Korea both when the North Koreans attacked initially and when the Chinese invasion completely altered the military basis. Absence of a sound political background to military operations normally causes initial deployment of unduly weak forces within effective striking distance of a superior enemy. In such circumstances, I suggested, a wise commander should have in mind the worst possible case as well as the best possible case.

Fortunately reverses in Korea do not directly threaten the safety of the powerhouse and main base of the free world, the United States, to the degree that a similar series of defeats in northwestern Europe, resulting in the overrunning of the British Isles, would compromise American security.

Whoever the American designated to command in the northeastern Atlantic theater, he must remember that he cannot afford to ignore the worst possible case; indeed he must initially face the fact that that case already obtains, since there is nothing to prevent Russia from reaching the Atlantic coast and the Channel within 3 weeks of his assuming command and, should that occur, Russia will not repeat Hitler's unpreparedness for a trans-Channel operation. Russia's object will be the expulsion of America from Europe.

Initially the best he can hope to achieve will be the retention of the eastern Atlantic islands, Iceland, Britain, Ireland, and the Breton and Iberian Peninsulas. It will be more important politically and strategically to arm and integrate Spain than to rebuild German forces. French national redoubts in Brittany and on the Garonne should have priority over a new Maginot line, and a united, reintegrated Ireland is vital to the over-all concept. Indeed his headquarters could better command from Limerick than from London or Paris.

Much as Americans will sympathize with those European nations in the Atlantic Pact for whom military security cannot at present be provided we must none of us sacrifice the substance for the shadow; for complete defense of the Western European zone must remain a shadow until there are at least 50 efficient combat divisions deployed in Germany.

The retention of Britain must be the keystone of our immediate planning. Britain is perfectly able to guard her own southern and eastern coastline, but her situation would be gravely weakened were Russia to secure a footing in central Ireland in conjunction with an invasion of Britain. Russia might well invade Ireland by air with impunity at the most critical moment for Britain. Free Ireland, outside the Atlantic Pact, and excluded from participation in the pact, because of her dispute with Britain over northern Ireland could not at present dispose of a Russian airborne invasion.

Thus a divided Ireland becomes the Achilles heel of Atlantic Pact strategy and will remain so for at least two more critical years. Alternatively, an integrated and reunited Ireland, defended by Irishmen in conjunction with the United States of America, provides an absolutely secure base for the defense of the Atlantic fringe of western Europe, which is all of Europe our means will allow us to defend with certainty.

In this context the defense of Ireland becomes of greater importance to the Atlantic community than the defense of London. It is the bounden duty of the high political chiefs to give their military chief a clear-cut political background against which he can plan realistic strategy. He must be free to deal with Ireland, Spain, Portugal, and France as well as with Britain without cramping political restrictions.

ERIC DORMAN O'GOWAN,
Brigadier, British Army (Retired).

Eulogy of Ensign Jesse L. Brown

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR
OF MARYLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, December 19 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, there was published in the Washington Times-Herald of Sunday, December 17, 1950, in the Untold Story, by Roscoe Simmons, an account of the death in Korea of Ensign Jesse L. Brown, of Mississippi, the first colored officer of the Navy to lose his life in any war of this Nation, and the only colored naval aviator to see action in Korea.

Ensign Brown met a heroic death. The circumstances attendant upon it should be recorded for the information of all our people throughout the country, it seems to me, as yet another indication of the part which Negro citizens of the United States are playing in the defense of their country today, and of the ready acceptance of their services by their compatriots, regardless of race or color.

I ask unanimous consent that the story from the Times-Herald be reprinted in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the eulogy was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE UNTOLD STORY
(By Roscoe Simmons)

The death of Ensign Jesse L. Brown of Hattiesburg, Miss., who died fighting in the air over Korea for his country, adds another name to the long and distinguished list of colored Mississippians who, for first one thing then another, achieved a place in the history of American freedom.

Also, Brown's is another picture on the walls of men of color, who, in life or death, proved worthy of the opportunities of their country and the friendship of their white countrymen.

In his heroic death Brown had the tender attention of a white fellow officer, Lt. (jg) Thomas J. Hudner, of Massachusetts. Flying a Navy fighter, Brown was hit over the Chosin area. Brown made an emergency landing known only to the elements. Hudner, flying and fighting on the same mission, saw Brown touch ground and began circling the field as protection against enemy attack.

Brown waved his arm as a sign of life but made no attempt to escape from his plane, although it had started burning. Hudner knew that Brown could not free himself and, chancing his own life, landed in the same field. He leaped from his plane and ran to the aid of Brown, but it was too late. Brown was dead.

BODY FLOWN OUT

Lieutenant Hudner radioed for a plane to come for Brown's body and stood by until its arrival and the lifeless form of a comrade was aloft and bound for a camp of friends and fellow warriors.

This is but the continuation of the story, which will never be completely told of the unbroken and fateful relations existing between two people, the great whites who invented the Union and their colored people, which is as old as the first page of American history.

A poet of the American scene wrote well when he said:

" 'Tis the heart and not the face
Where God His wondrous works doth trace."

The United States Navy feels that the bravery and loyalty of Ensign Brown adds to its long cherished glory. Not only was Brown the only colored naval aviator to fight in Korea, but also the first colored officer of the Navy to lose his life in any war fought by the Union.

Capt. Robert Smalls offered his life when he ran the ship Planter into the Federal lines at Charleston, but he was then only a seaman, a man seeking freedom. He lived to become a captain in the Navy and a Member of Congress, where for 20 years his heroic and modest qualities won the admiration of his countrymen.

While the records of the Army have been enriched by the exploits of colored soldiers, going back to Washington, Warren, and the Revolution, the Navy has long been tight as to its personnel. This has been due more to jealousy of its prowess than to simple prejudice. But when the Navy bars went down they fell all the way.

UNDER NATIONALITY ALONE

However, since 1813 colored men have figured in the Navy. In the beginning they were not enlisted under color, but went in under nationality alone. Under tough sailing and fighting they made a name.

In 1814 1 out of every 10 fighters on the fleet that crawled into the Great Lakes to back Croghan at Mackinac were colored men. Dr. Parsons, the noted Navy surgeon, was their historian in early years.

"There seemed to be an entire absence of prejudice against the blacks as messmates among the crew," he wrote when surgeon on the Guerriere.

In 1813 Commodore Perry—then captain—protested to Commodore Chauncel against "a motley set—blacks, soldiers, and boys," sent him by General Harrison, later President. Chauncel rebuked Perry.

"You will find," he wrote, "that color does not affect their qualification. They are not surpassed by any seamen we have in the fleet."

Soon Perry was exclaiming: "They seem to be absolutely insensible to danger." These men received the surrender of Barclay when he came aboard the Niagara. He looked at his conquerors and wept.

SPURRED BY WOUNDED MAN

Commander Nathan Sharler, of the Governor Tomkins, told the story of John Johnson, the colored sea fighter who uttered one of the great sayings of American gallantry. A 24-pounder struck Johnson full hip, taking away the lower part of his body, in a sea engagement January 1, 1813. John cried to his mates: "Fire away, my boys; no haul a color down."

Near Johnson lay another colored sea fighter, John Davis, torn to pieces himself. Commander Sharler wrote: "He fell near me, begging me to throw him overboard," so all hands might be devoted to the task. Look the world over but our colored people will find their greatest heroism under the Stars and Stripes.

UN Should Brand Reds

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAURIE C. BATTLE
OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 19, 1950

Mr. BATTLE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial entitled "UN Should Brand Reds," published in the Philadelphia Inquirer, and reprinted as a public service by the International Latex Corp. of Dover, Del., in the Washington Post of December 18, 1950:

UN SHOULD BRAND REDS

Belated action by the United Nations General Assembly to put on its agenda a resolution calling upon the Chinese Communists to get out of Korea spotlights the slow and hesitant way in which the UN has dealt with this threat to world peace.

It is more than a threat to world peace. It is a threat of complete failure of the United Nations as an organization and an idea, putting the world back many years in its search for a sensible, peaceable way of ordering affairs among nations.

Yet with such tremendous issues at stake, the United Nations has tried to keep up the pretense that aggression by Chinese Communists is different from aggression by North Korean Communists, and that it would be unwise to do anything that might annoy the Red government of Mao Tze-tung.

The wishful theory that Mao, or his bosses in Moscow, could be made to see reason by kid-glove handling in the United Nations should have been abandoned weeks ago. Certainly, now that Soviet delegate Andrei Vishinsky has blasted the latest proposal of 13 Asiatic nations for a halt at the thirty-eighth parallel, the delegates from the free nations ought to conclude that there's nothing to be gained by refusing to face the fact of Chinese Red aggression.

Even with upward of half a million Chinese troops in Northern Korea, and more pouring across the Manchurian border, Vishinsky sticks to the fantastic lie that the armed forces of Communist China are not fighting on the side of North Korea.

That shows what Russia and her stooges have been trying to do in the United Nations. By dealing in lies so stupendous as to defy all reason, they have eliminated any chance that a reasonable compromise could be reached.

It is a fact that the Chinese Communist troops have been fighting in Korea for more than a month. They have not been fighting simply against the United States, as they put it, but have been opposing a United Nations Army acting under United Nations orders.

But it was not until last week that the Security Council got around to voting on a resolution asking them to get out of Korea, and assuring them, at the same time, that their own legitimate interests would be safeguarded. It was obvious from the start that Russia would veto this move.

The delay in pressing for Security Council action was bad enough. It was worse that time was lost in presenting the same resolution to the General Assembly, where the veto cannot block it. But worst of all is the refusal, even now, to name the Chinese Communists as aggressors, and to demand firmly that they get out.

No realistic person expects the Reds to obey any UN mandate that they don't like. A strong resolution from the General Assembly at this late stage probably would have little effect on the fighting in Korea.

But the UN has to maintain the principles it stood up for so courageously at the beginning of the Korean war. It could survive a military defeat in Korea, if that should come, but it could never survive a compromise of the very principles on which the world organization was founded.

The 51 nations which voted recently to take up the question of Chinese intervention know that it is deliberate, naked aggression. They know that the Chinese Reds and their Russian backers are defying the will of a majority of the nations of the world. They know, too, that there will never be any collective security if the free nations refuse to take a stand on the principles that have brought them together.

It is time the members of the UN recognized that the fate of the world organization and its hopes for the future depend on how it meets the question of the Chinese in Korea. At least there should be no more delay in branding the Chinese Communists as aggressors, and telling them to get out.

America Girds for the Task Ahead

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. TOM B. FUGATE

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 19, 1950

Mr. FUGATE. Mr. Speaker, the Roanoke Times is published in Roanoke, Va., and circulates throughout my district. It has always been forthright in its editorial policy. In the Sunday issue of December 17 the Roanoke Times featured in its editorial column an article entitled "America Girds for the Task Ahead." Clearly, implicitly, and convincingly the proposition is presented.

On Friday night, December 15, the President of the United States had spoken to the people here and throughout the world on the gravity of the world crisis and the importance of preparing American defenses. The discussion of the subject is so illuminating that I believe it in the national interest that it be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The article is as follows:

AMERICA GIRDS FOR THE TASK AHEAD

Proclaiming a state of national emergency, the President of the United States yesterday called on individuals and communities alike to make whatever sacrifices are necessary for the welfare of the Nation.

The response should be enthusiastic, unanimous, wholehearted.

Only the extreme gravity of a world crisis and the imminence of a war for national survival would justify the drastic step taken yesterday. It means a radical change in our way of life and a lowering of living standards for the American people, not for just a few months but for years to come.

That is not pleasant or agreeable to contemplate. But far less pleasant and much more disagreeable would be existence in a world dominated by communism. And that is the grim alternative to paying the price that the administration asks the country to pay in order that America may become strong and remain free.

Realization of the distasteful and unacceptable alternative should impel the American people to accept cheerfully and without grumbling the inevitable sacrifices that lie ahead, sacrifices that must be made by all of us as our individual contribution to national safety and indeed national survival in a time of critical danger.

A third world war is not inevitable, and Mr. Truman was at pains to make that clear in his radio broadcast to the Nation Friday night. But a third world war, involving a death struggle between the two mightiest Nations on the globe, is a distinct possibility that has been brought unmistakably nearer by the events of the past month in Korea, where Chinese Communist hordes, undoubtedly at Moscow's instigation and with the Kremlin's connivance, are attempting to drive General MacArthur's forces into the sea.

With Russia's sinister purpose and inexorable determination to extend Communist rule throughout the world becoming clearer all the time, the only possible course for America to pursue consistent with national safety is to arm to the teeth and gear its economy to a scale which will make it possible to bear the heavy burden that must be borne by this country for an unforeseeable and undetermined period.

Accordingly we are entering an era of austerity that will call for a change in the habits of all of us. Taxes are going to be far heavier than ever before, civilian production for the most part is definitely out of the picture, wage and price controls are not far off, and more and more young men are going to be called up for military service in the months immediately ahead.

None of this is pleasant to contemplate. But all of it is vitally necessary if America is to survive. And because it is vitally necessary, the American people must accept resolutely and willingly the hard and disagreeable tasks ahead, tasks which are essential for their survival as a Nation under existing world conditions.

Higher taxes, longer hours of work for many, fewer civilian goods for all, military service for more than 3,000,000 young Americans who will be called away from their jobs or studies to don the uniform and submit to Army and Navy discipline for an indeterminate period—this is not a prospect to be viewed enthusiastically but it is one to be accepted cheerfully in the realization that the world crisis makes it absolutely necessary.

We must embark on this course, as the President pointed out Friday night, "not as a sacrifice, but as an opportunity to defend the best kind of life that men have ever devised on this earth." Viewed in that light, the job ahead becomes a challenge—a challenge to which the American people can be counted on to respond in a spirit worthy of their great forebears and glorious traditions.

It is not going to be easy, but neither is it going to be unendurable. And if preparedness pays off and another world conflict with all of its frightful cost in human slaughter, human suffering, human sorrow and human treasure is thereby avoided, the price we are being called on to pay will be small indeed. On the other hand, if war comes despite all our efforts to avert it, we shall be better prepared to defend our liberties and those of the free world—and for that reason, too, the price we are being called on to pay will be small indeed.

Realizing that "world conquest by Communist imperialism is the goal of the forces of aggression that have been loosed upon the world" and that "the increasing menace of the forces of Communist aggression requires that the national defense shall be strengthened as speedily as possible," the American people must meet the crucial test of their stamina and hardihood that is at hand. On how they meet it may well depend the answer to the question of whether this Nation is to survive or perish.

Resolution of Housing Authority of Breckenridge, Tex.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OMAR BURLESON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 19, 1950

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, the Housing Authority of the City of Breckenridge, Tex., has taken an action which I think should be of particular interest to Members of Congress. It is with considerable pride and great appreciation that I place in the RECORD, a resolution unanimously adopted by the housing authority, in which, I am informed, they were joined unanimously by the City Commission of Breckenridge.

Through its housing authority and city commission, these citizens have asked Federal officials to suspend the allocation of money heretofore approved and that the money be applied to training our citizens and arming our men to fight and protect our freedoms against world aggressors.

Mr. Speaker, this is the type of responsible citizenship necessary to cut out all nonessential expenditures not directly connected with the defense preparedness. The people should demand, and the Congress should have the courage, to review all authorized domestic commitments and drop everything, which under close scrutiny, fails to contribute to the war effort.

Conservatively, there must be at least $4,500,000,000 now authorized which can be canceled. As we look for new sources of revenue, these billions are at our fingertips. We need to review immediately past actions taken by this Congress in light of the circumstances which have developed. It would give a lot of people encouragement and greater confidence that the Congress of the United States will not spend one dime except in behalf of the tremendous efforts which all of us know lie ahead.

While we call upon people at home to retrench and prepare for sacrifices, the real place to start retrenchment is right here in Washington.

The housing authority and the City Commission of Breckenridge, Tex., have given us an example of a community which says that they are willing to forego their town's improvement by reason of the conditions the country faces and that the funds allotted to them be used to protect this Nation in order that they may continue their plans when they can do so in safety.

Would that other localities and citizens everywhere take this view and that this Congress and every agency of Government forget all else in order that our energies, our resources, and dollars be channeled directly into our national defense efforts.

Mr. Speaker, the resolution to which I refer is as follows:

Whereas the United States of America is today in greater danger than at any other time in the history of this democratic nation; and

Whereas the forces of communism and world aggression threaten to engulf the world and wipe out the fires of freedom; and

Whereas the American people will be required to give of their time and money to rebuild the protective barriers against this world threat; and

Whereas the economic stability of the United States is a factor in the defense of America and the world; and

Whereas a great amount of money has been allocated to the city of Breckenridge, Tex., for the building of needed low-rent houses; and

Whereas notwithstanding the great need for these houses, it is the belief of the citizens of Breckenridge, Tex., that social welfare projects are secondary to the loss of freedom for the people of the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Housing Authority of the city of Breckenridge, Tex., at this regular meeting of the Authority this 4th day of December 1950, when the forces of communism threatened our very life existence, That the Housing Authority of the city of Breckenridge, Tex., go on record as asking the Federal Public Housing Authority to suspend the allocation of money to be spent on peacetime housing and that this Federal money be applied to training our citizens and arming our men to fight and protect the freedoms of our people against communism and world aggression.

Iowa Leads

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. H. R. GROSS
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 19, 1950

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, the State of Iowa has long been the Nation's greatest single producer of corn and hogs.

To these firsts in productivity from the rich soil of Iowa, cultivated by the finest farmers in the world, there has been added in more recent years, the greatest single State production of chickens, eggs, oats, and popcorn as well as the greatest number of pounds of cattle marketed and the highest butterfat sales.

To this imposing list must now be added another first—Iowa now leads all other States of the Nation in the slaughter and packing of meat.

The Iowa Development Commission has just issued a bulletin which I believe my colleagues will find quite interesting, especially those from the State of Illinois, which has long been regarded as a great center of the meat-packing industry. The bulletin follows:

IOWA NOW LEADS THE NATION IN MEAT PACKING VOLUME

Iowa is now leading the meat packing field, the Iowa Development Commission pointed out today.

For the second straight year the volume of livestock slaughtered by Iowa packing plants is running larger than in any other State.

Federal estimates show that during the first 10 months of 1950 Iowa packers handled 11.7 percent (by live weight) of all the cattle, calves, hogs, sheep, and lambs processed in the Nation. (The estimates do not include farm butchering.)

Last year Iowa packing companies handled 11.5 percent of the meat processed in the Nation.

With the 1949 and 1950 reports, Iowa has stepped ahead of Illinois, which previously was the top meat packing State.

Illinois' meat packing operations have followed national trends very closely. When the United States volume of livestock slaughter dropped 10 percent between 1947 and 1948, so did Illinois'. It has accounted for 10.6 or 10.7 percent of the Nation's meat processing since the United States Department of Agriculture started to publish slaughter figures in 1946.

Iowa meat packers, although they took a bigger drop in the 1947–48 slump, have been coming back ever since at an impressive rate.

In 1949, for instance, Iowa packing plants increased their operations by 670,000,000 pounds, from 3,478,613,000 to 4,148,928,000 pounds of live weight. Iowa's share in United States livestock slaughter rose from 9.7 to 11.5 percent, and the Tall Corn State nosed Illinois out of the top standing.

This year Iowa's meat packers seem to be buzzing along at a similar rate. In the first 10 months of 1950 Iowa packers handled more meat than they did in the full year 1948, and they are 200,000,000 pounds ahead of the January-October period in 1949.

(The totals: 3,482,000,000 pounds in 10 months, 1950; 3,281,000,000 pounds in 10 months, 1949.)

Illinois' 10-month total is 2,000,000 pounds less than in 1949: 3,103,410,000 pounds this year; 3,105,393,000 pounds last year.

Illinois still has the largest beef kill in the country, but its margin over Iowa is becoming smaller. In 1948 Illinois packers killed 662,000,000 more pounds of beef than Iowa plants did. Last year Iowa was 340,000,000 pounds behind, and so far this year Illinois plants are only 290,000,000 pounds ahead in the beef department.

Iowa also has been gaining on her eastern neighbor in pork packing. In 1948 Iowa packers handled 417,000,000 more pounds of pork than Illinois plants did. In 1949 the Iowa total rose to 790,000,000 pounds more than the Illinois volume. So far this year Iowa packing plants are 701,000,000 pounds of pork in the lead.

Iowa now ranks first in hog slaughter, second in sheep and lamb slaughter, and third in cattle slaughter. Minnesota is the third ranking hog packing State, and California is second in cattle slaughter. In total meat packing operations, Minnesota habitually ranks third and California fourth.

Iowa has 20 federally inspected slaughter plants, 5 of them in Sioux City. Illinois has 28, of which 17 are in Chicago. Minnesota has 11 plants operating under Federal inspection, and California has 58, of which 19 are in Los Angeles.

Dr. H. Trendley Dean, Veteran in United States Public Health Service, Keyman in Program Raising Standards of Dental Health in America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 19, 1950

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, it is with much pleasure that I call attention of the Members of Congress to the remarkable achievements in the field of dental health in America and the world of an Illinoisan, a native East St. Louisan, Dr. H. Trendley Dean.

It is only natural that I should join my fellow townsmen in the great feeling of pride they share in Dr. Dean. His work has honored not only himself but the community in which he was born, its schools and its citizens.

No one man has contributed more to raising the standards of dental health than has Dr. Dean. As the keyman in research which has led to the use of the fluoride process, Dr. Dean may be responsible for future generations of Americans being free from dental troubles during most of their lifetime.

Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith a story of Dr. Dean's career which appeared in the East St. Louis (Ill.) Journal on Sunday, December 17, 1950. The article follows:

FORMER CITY RESIDENT IS DENTAL RESEARCH LEADER

WASHINGTON.—If your teeth and your children's teeth last longer, look better, and stay healthier you can thank a former East St. Louisan and the Federal agency that he directs, the National Institute of Dental Research, located in a suburb of Washington, D. C.

This contributor to the Nation's health is tall, friendly, pipe-smoking Dr. H. Trendley Dean, a member of one of the oldest East St. Louis families and a veteran of 30 years in the United States Public Health service.

Dr. Dean is the nephew of John M. Trendley, retired Illinois Central chief clerk who lives at 617 North Twenty-second Street. He is the grandson of the late Capt. Henry Trendley and the great-grandson of John Trendley, one of the founders of the old Wiggins Ferry that operated between East St. Louis and St. Louis long before the Eads Bridge was built.

Back in the days when Nineteenth Street was the city limits, Dr. Dean was born on the 160-acre Trendley farm which extended from Nineteenth to Twenty-fourth Street and from State Street to the L. & N. tracks. He was the son of William W. and Mrs. Rosalie Trendley Dean.

SERVED IN FRANCE

After attending St. Patrick, St. Joseph's, and Park Schools, Dr. Dean entered St. Louis Academy and then St. Louis University. He was graduated from the dental school in 1916 and licensed to practice in Illinois and Missouri. He entered private practice in Wood River but the following year left to enter the Army, serving as a dental officer from 1917 to 1919 in the United States and in France.

Dr. Dean then returned to Wood River and in 1920 was president of the Alton Dental Society and commander of the Wood River post of the American Legion. The following year he entered the United States Public Health Service and advanced in rank until in 1945 he was a dental director, the equivalent of a colonel in the Army. He served at various hospitals from New York to California but since 1931 has been assigned to the National Institute of Health at Bethesda, Md., near Washington. He has been Director of the National Institute of Dental Research since 1948.

The former East St. Louisan has written chapters in a number of books and also more than 50 articles in scientific, public health, dental, medical, and engineering journals. He also is prominent in professional organizations. He is a fellow of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, chairman of the Washington section of the American College of Dentists, an associate editor of the Journal of American College of Dentists, a member of the committee on research and standards of the American Public Health Association and for 2 years was secretary of the American Dental Association's committee on dental-health survey.

Dr. Dean also has served as president and a trustee of the International Association for Dental Research; president of the Association of Military Dental Surgeons of the United States and as the United States vice president of the Federation Dentaire Internationale.

GETS GORGAS MEDAL

During World War II he was assigned as a colonel to the European theater, where he served with the Office of Military Government. He has been a lecturer at both the Army and Navy Dental Schools and has received a number of awards, including the Gorgas Medal and Award of the Association of Military Surgeons in 1949, the John M. Godell prize, and the Jarvie Fellowship Medal, awarded by the Dental Society of the State of New York.

For his services in World War I Dr. Dean received the Army commendation ribbon and the Victory Medal with one clasp. During World War II he earned four ribbons.

Dr. Dean and his wife, the former Miss Ruth Martha McEvoy, will celebrate their thirtieth wedding anniversary next September. They have three daughters: Ruth Celestine, assistant woman's club editor of the Washington Evening Star; Dorothea Virginia, who teaches in the nursery school of Hull House, Chicago; and Mary Harriet, who is in library technical work in Texas.

PLAYED BASEBALL

Once a soccer and baseball player in East St. Louis, Dr. Dean now plays tennis and rides horseback for recreation. He and Mrs. Dean particularly like to ride in the hunt country of Fairfax County, south of their home in Arlington, Va. Dr. Dean learned to ride Army style while assigned to the cavalry at Fort Riley, Kans., during World War I.

A recent issue of a dental magazine devoted an article to Dr. Dean, referring to him as a "key man occupying a top position in this history-making program, and helping to make some of the history himself," and commenting that he is "unusually well equipped to guide the destiny of the new National Institute of Dental Research."

The magazine traces Dr. Dean's interest in public health to his World War I service, when he examined and treated thousands of American soldiers.

"Like all born researchers," the magazine stated, "Dean determined to learn all that he could about the basic causes of dental caries and periodontal disease. He had a professional's regard for treatment and care, but he also had a researcher's vital curiosity about the fundamental causative factors which produced so much poor dental health. And he wanted to play a part in striking at dental disease by coming to grips with it at its source."

Dr. Dean in his first meeting with the 12 national leaders who constitute the National Advisory Dental Research Council remarked:

"Our research institutions are devoting more than 100 times as much money to medical research as to dental research. That million-dollar figure for dental research represents about one-tenth of 1 percent of the amount paid to dentists for remedial services. But the one hundred and ten millions devoted to medical research represents more than 6 percent of the amount paid to physicians for medical services."

Dr. Dean now directs expenditures for intramural studies at the National Institute of Dental Research amounting to $212,000 a year. Research grants to 19 institutions are making possible 36 separate projects at a cost of about $200,000.

"All of these activities reflect the most comprehensive approach and the first coordinated attack yet made on dental disease," the magazine points out. "This realistic program makes it possible to use existing dental research facilities, to create needed new facilities, and to integrate these varied efforts."

Dr. Dean in discussing the program of the institute he directs said:

"We are making it possible for the total resources of dentistry to be applied to the tremendous problems of dental diseases on a scale never before possible. This is, in a very real sense, dentistry's own program, with dentists participating in policy making and in program planning; with dentists supervising and directing research projects; and with dentists doing actual research projects themselves.

"I'm no prophet, but I believe the institute's work will help to achieve a balance between the prevention phase of dentistry and the care and treatment phase, an imbalance which has too long been the profession's chief weakness as a medical science. Only during the last 10 or 15 years has dentistry felt the impact and stimulation of basic research. Development of this neglected field—fundamental to a successful control program—may, and in all probability will, markedly change the practice of dentistry a generation hence, and perhaps before."

Dr. Dean's contributions to dentistry were summarized as follows in the dental magazine article:

"Here is an excellent example of a man who is not a prisoner of professionalism but, through a breadth of vision and sound understanding, is able to relate the separate interests of several groups to the larger interests of the whole community, and to join all of these several interests in a democratic partnership of public and private endeavor whose fruitful efforts promise to make history for both dentistry and public health by raising the standards of dental health in America."

Quite a career for a boy born on a farm at the East St. Louis city limits, isn't it?

Let Us Not Forget the Old Folks

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. TOBY MORRIS
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 19, 1950

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Speaker, with the mind of the Congress so engrossed in our pressing national emergency, I trust the Members of the House will not overlook entirely the issues that are so important to many of us with regard to the problems of our elder citizens. I speak with particular reference to the subject of reasonable security for them.

Perhaps the question of social security and pensions has progressed further, both in the Congress and throughout the Nation during the interim of the Eighty-first Congress than it has during any similar period of our history. I believe this is true, and for this we are truly grateful. I believe also that this Eighty-first Congress, in addition to giving more thought and study to this subject, has also provided more improvements in our legislation to provide security for our elder citizens than any previous Congress since the Social Security Act was passed way back in 1935. For this, too, we are happy and thankful.

THERE IS MUCH YET TO BE DONE

In spite of all we have accomplished, and regardless of the fact that we have given months of time and study to this subject during this session, our work in this field is far from complete. Instead of fully correcting the faults of our system, Mr. Speaker, we stand today face to face with the same inherent weaknesses in our social-security system that existed when this session of Congress began. We started out with high hopes that the job this time would be complete. We expected that Congress would delve into this subject with such thoroughness and determination as to remake the entire system into a system that would fully provide adequate, equitable social security. The faults of the system, at least many of them, had been long recognized. Years of actual experience had developed great inequities and discriminations. The plain fact that even where the best application of the system was being made its inadequacy still stood out in shocking relief. And, Mr. Speaker, that which concerns me most today is, these same inequalities and inequities still exist. There is no uniformity of application. Citizens in one State do not receive the same amounts in benefits, under public assistance, as citizens of another State. In fact, in many States there is a wide variation in amounts being paid in different parts of the same State. The same humiliating property qualifications, often referred to as needs tests are still indulged in. In fact, I fear that most of the primary objectionable features that existed in our system to provide for our deserving and needy elders, at the time this Congress opened, are still in the system as we face the days leading to our adjournment. I do not propose to enter into a technical analysis or discussion of this subject here. In fact, I feel that no useful purpose would be served if I should attempt to do so. But, Mr. Speaker, I do want the record to show that we are not through with this subject. That those of us, Members of the House of Representatives, who have been working in this field through the years, are still alive, interested, and working. The objectives for which we have sought during these years are still live issues both in Congress and throughout the Nation. We are still convinced, Mr. Speaker, and let me say more than ever convinced:

First. That this Nation can well afford to provide a reasonable pension for every citizen old enough to retire.

Second. It should be a Federal pension paid by the National Government direct to the citizen, equal in all the States.

Third. Citizens owning property should share in the benefits with those who have no property.

Fourth. A reasonable pension would not seriously contribute to inflation. Persons whose incomes are as little as twenty to thirty dollars per week do not seriously contribute to inflation.

Fifth. There is great need among our deserving elder citizens for adequate legislation to provide such a pension.

Sixth. The work of our joint, or bipartisan, voluntary committee, working for these objectives should be continued in the forthcoming Eighty-second Congress. We shall welcome the cooperation and assistance of every Member of the House, regardless of party and regardless of the stand or views that may be held on any other subject, to join hands with us if you concur in our objectives.

Permit me also to say for the record, Mr. Speaker, that many of us have made some very sacred commitments to our constituents on this issue. How many times have many of us promised our people we would favor and support legislation of this nature? Perhaps the recent campaign was a new high record when it comes to campaign promises for pensions. I believe it was. I believe, too, the American people favor a reasonable, uniform, and honorable old-age pension to take the place of what we call old-age assistance. I feel they expect us to enact such a pension law. I am sure many of us, myself included, have solemnly and sincerely promised to work for the enactment of such a pension law. I for one, and I am sure there are many others, Members of this House, meant it when we made those promises. I want the record to show before this session concludes that I am conscious of my commitments, and that I mean to carry out to the letter the commitments I have made. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the volunteer committee that has worked so well together during this session will be reformed immediately when the new Congress convenes, and our studies and work will continue to go forward. Members will be notified of the first meeting, and I trust that everyone who is interested and who can possibly arrange to do so will unite with us in the very beginning and stay right with us until our work is finish.

I should also at this time, Mr. Speaker, extend to every Member of the House who worked with us so well in this session, my grateful and sincere appreciation. I know Representative VAN ZANDT, chairman for the minority, joins me in sincerely thanking each and every one who has worked so untiringly and with such full cooperation during the many meetings and conferences that we have held on this subject during the 2 years of this session that is now coming to a close. We acknowledge and thank the Committee on Ways and Means for the months of careful study and analysis that they have given to this subject. As I stated before, Mr. Speaker, the Eighty-first Congress has been outstanding in the time, thought, work, and consideration that it has given this subject. I say also, that the amounts of the benefits that have been provided have also been substantial. For all of these things we are truly thankful. But in spite of it all, Mr. Speaker, certain facts remain. They must continue to engage our thoughts and attention. The great study, work, and attention we have given have brought many of us to these very important conclusions. One is that we do have certain inherent weaknesses in our system. Two, that these weaknesses have not been corrected. They are still with us. Three, we should continue our work until we do have operating in the United States of America the kind of a system to provide security for our elder citizens that will do the job and do it correctly; a system of which all citizens, both old and young, can accept as adequate, honorable, and fair. It is to this end that our work will be dedicated in the future as it has in the past. It is for this cause that I call upon every Member of the Congress who concurs, to remain united in our voluntary committee to continue our studies and activities, and with continued cooperation I am sure victory can be won.

Serving the Nation Well

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WINGATE H. LUCAS
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 19, 1950

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Speaker, as proof that we in Texas have a deep appreciation of the extraordinary services being rendered the Nation by our junior Senator, LYNDON JOHNSON, I desire to place in the RECORD an editorial from the Fort Worth Star-Telegram entitled "Serving the Nation Well."

It has been said that "a prophet is not without honor save in his own country and in his own house." I take pride in asserting that Senator LYNDON JOHNSON, whose warnings we have heard here on the floor since the fall of Germany and Japan, is certainly not without honor in his own State, for his vision and his courage have caused the people of Texas to elevate him to the Senate. That he is performing such splendid service, while not unexpected, is certainly gratifying to those of us who have for many years observed his zeal and his fortitude. Indeed, LYNDON JOHNSON is now receiving the laurels he has so richly earned. We may expect his rewards to increase with his years of public service.

The editorial follows:

SERVING THE NATION WELL

The urgent appeal made by Senator LYNDON JOHNSON, of Texas, on the floor of the Senate last week for more speed and determination in the Nation's rearmament program is not to be dismissed as idle political talk. The warning words he uttered were neither irresponsible nor uninformed. For Senator JOHNSON, as chairman of a Senate "watchdog" subcommittee on preparedness, is perhaps as well informed as any man in Washington on the real state of our preparedness—or lack of it.

A growing sense of crisis is apparent in Washington. It is evidenced by President Truman's emergency message to the Nation by radio. It is implicit in Secretary of Defense Marshall's statement that "all-out war can be initiated by a single word from the other side." It is reflected in the joint statement of a group of Republican leaders, after a White House conference, that "a dangerous emergency exists."

The increasing sense of emergency may be due largely to the gloomy outlook in Korea and the growing indication that the deliberate aim of the Communists may be to draw us into full-scale war. But the realization that we are ill-prepared for such a conflict, if it should come, undoubtedly has been heightened by the revelations of Senator JOHNSON and his able subcommittee since the group began its work last July.

In that time the subcommittee has delved into various phases of the defense program and the economic activities backing it—such things as the supply and development of weapons, the stockpiling of critical materials, the availability of essential agricultural products. Some of the reports it has issued on the basis of these investigations have been stingingly critical, charging carelessness and complacency in such matters as the disposal of surplus war plants and the stockpiling of materials vital to the preparedness effort.

It found, for example, that even after the Korean outbreak brought an acute scarcity of aviation gasoline, one Government-owned plant for producing an essential ingredient of aviation gasoline was disposed of without any provision for its recapture by the Government in the event of need, and another was sold to be dismantled and salvaged. In the face of prospects for a 3,000,000-man armed force, the committee said in another report, the Nation has no wool in its stockpile, no wool in inventory, and less than enough wool in sight through domestic production.

So far in its reports, the Johnson subcommittee has not hesitated to be blunt or to point the finger of blame. But it has not been critical merely for the sake of being critical, nor has it been content to denounce policies without having something to offer in their stead. In some cases, as in its recommendation that Government-owned synthetic rubber plants be reactivated as quickly as possible, it already has got results.

In an article by Henry F. Pringle, Pulitzer prize-winning biographer and distinguished journalist, in the December issue of Nation's Business, the investigating group is credited with being something exceptional among congressional committees. It is described as following closely the rule laid down for it by Chairman JOHNSON at the beginning—to be blunt but not unfair, zealous but not persecuting, helpful but not uncompromising. Some astonishment is expressed that the committee, contrary to practices usual among congressional committees, has been as willing to hand out praise where it is found to be merited as to place blame where it is found to be deserved.

The tone of the article strongly implies the belief that the subcommittee is making good on its promise of seeking to accelerate, in and out of the Government, the slackening tempo of the postwar period to the pace realistically called for by world events. Such an appraisal is strong evidence that Texas' junior Senator and his committee colleagues are pursuing their task with vigor and impartiality, rising above partisanship and politics to spur the Nation to gather its strength for what could turn into a struggle for survival.

The Johnson subcommittee has pointed out that in some areas of the defense effort demobilization still is taking place at a time when speedy, aggressive mobilization is the imperative need. If the chairman and his colleagues of the preparedness group succeed in reversing this tide, in speeding and coordinating the mobilization effort, it will have rendered a highly patriotic service and will have confirmed the judgment of Texas people in sending Senator JOHNSON to the Senate.

As Mr. Pringle cogently pointed out, such a committee as Senator JOHNSON's can save money running into the billions by bringing about correction of waste and inefficiency. But more important, it may be the means of stirring the laggard and apathetic into the action that may mean the difference between weakness and strength and not inconceivably could mean the difference between victory and defeat.

The American Medical Association, Under the Whittaker & Baxter Advertising Regime, Should Be Investigated for Their Pernicious Lobbying Activities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 19, 1950

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, the House Committee on Lobbying should give close attention to the past and present political activities of the American Medical Association and its subordinate groups and subsidiaries throughout the Nation.

A definite pattern was laid down and followed in the various States except California. I have been informed that California was made an exception because Governor Warren had advocated previously a very comprehensive State health program, which as far as scope and benefits were concerned fairly eclipsed the Truman health program, and Republicanism operating under the medical smoke screen did not want to embarrass their former vice presidential candidate, and so orders were issued perhaps for Whittaker & Baxter and the American Medical Association to lay off of California. It was quite easy for Whittaker & Baxter to lay off, as they had handled previously a number of campaigns for Governor Warren and California Republicanism, and owed their very American Medical Association jobs to extreme right-winged Republicans.

The organized doctors in other States north of the Mason and Dixon's line took the forefront instead of the reactionary wing of the Republican Party, which went underground politically during the last campaign. I have good reason to believe that the AMA'ers were not interlopers but took over the Republican leadership by prearrangement. The Republican right-wingers for some time have been aware of the fact that they have lost caste almost entirely with the people generally, and searched about to enlist the political aid of some widely distributed group of people which had not lost entirely up to then, their influence and respectability as far as the majority of the voting public was concerned, and by a lucky stroke of political fortune hit upon the organized medicos. The idea first began to take shape when Dr. Fishbein got his walking papers from the American Medical Association and the childless man and wife combination, then composed of Papa Whittaker and Mamma Baxter of the Whittaker-Baxter Advertising propagandists, took over Papa Fishbein's duties. This organization won its spurs in California by conducting a number of lie and smear campaigns for California Republicanism which is controlled largely by greedy and selfish private utilities, oil, gas, railroad, real estate, and other truly Fascist groups. As usual bad things come high financially and this was no exception to the rule as far as the services of the Whittaker-Baxter combination is concerned as the following figures on file in the office of the file clerk of the House of Representatives, room 521, of the House Office Building discloses:

On April 2, 1949, this advertising firm filed, under Public Law 601, a statement in which was recited the financial terms of their contract with the National Education Campaign of the American Medical Association. Pursuant to these contractual provisions, Whittaker and Baxter were to receive $8,330 per month for a period of 2 years, for a total contract price of $199,920. The contract further provides that "48 percent will constitute reimbursement for necessary expenses and one-half of the remainder as compensation for activities contemplated."

Following this contract, Pappy Whittaker and Mammy Baxter got in freewheeling gear with their lies and smear and although there never was any socialized medicine bill pending in the Congress, they wheezed loudly that there was such a bill. Although President Truman's health plan was not by the greatest stretch of the imagination socialized medicine they croaked frantically that it was just that. Although compulsory health insurance no more resembled socialized medicine than the Whittaker-Baxter advertising programs resembles legitimacy and decency in advertising, they screamed wildly that they were synonymous.

The names of the publications authored by these well-trained lie and smear campaigners according to their statement submitted to the House of Representatives along with their lobby report are:

First. Free America Receives an Exciting Invitation From Doctors.

Second. It's Your Crusade, Too.

Third. Your Cooperation Can Help.

Fourth. The Boys in Room 1106.

Fifth. Medical Progress Versus Political Medicine.

Editorially the League Reporter of December 11, 1950, had this to say editorially about the campaign of the American Medical Association:

THE DOCTORS' PRESCRIPTION

The doctors' lobby, which teamed with real estate brokers, gas company executives, and newspaper publishers to smear all liberals in the recent political campaign, reports whopping expenditures for the first half of 1950.

The American Medical Association (AMA) has filed with the Clerk of the House a report showing it gave $545,450 to its press agents, Whittaker & Baxter, during the first 6 months of the year. This included $50,000 in fees to Clem Whittaker and Leone Baxter.

When an organization representing such a small proportion of the population can spend money like that, the need for funds by trade-union groups and other progressives is emphasized once again.

Labor's League is convinced liberal candidates will win when the people understand the issues. But it takes education to show them what the issues are. And education takes money.

The AMA understands that. That's why it is forcing doctors to cough up $25 a year to twist those issues.

Members of Congress and the general public were privileged to be given a "quicky" peek behind the bloated medical front, when a few days ago the alleged coordinating committee, national education campaign, and the board of trustees of the American Medical Association printed and distributed a most expensive booklet entitled "Main Street Speaks Out for American Medicine and for Freedom."

The following quotes are taken from this pamphlet:

For the first time in American history businesses, industries, trades, professions, and individuals combined to make common cause for the freedom of one profession—American medicine. In October 1950, more than 65,000 persons in all walks of life, throughout the Nation, spent $2,000,000 to say through radio and the public press: "Thumbs down on Government medicine, or any other step toward socialization in this country."

From page 2:

The doctors' gigantic advertising campaign, during October, reached virtually every American who could hear or read—not just once, but several times.

Media:	Audience reached Circulation
10,300 newspaper and Sunday supplements	115,630,487
1,600 radio stations	108,205,034
55 national magazines	55,202,080

The purpose of the project was to demonstrate publicly that rank-and-file citizens stand with medicine in its fight for freedom.

The cost of the advertising program, totaling $1,100,000, was borne by doctors in every community in the Nation.

MAIN STREET SPENDS $2,000,000 TO SAY: "ON THE ISSUE OF COMPULSORY HEALTH INSURANCE, WE STAND WITH AMERICAN MEDICINE"

Doctors believe that the medical problems of a patient—or of a nation—should be solved by medical people, not by politicians. They know that such problems are much nearer solution here in the United States than in any country where the government controls and directs medical affairs. Doctors invited other Americans to express their own convictions publicly by way of radio and in the advertising columns of the newspapers. Tens of thousands accepted the invitation, joined the huge project and responded with public affirmations of their own.

THE RECORD SPEAKS FOR ITSELF

Number of individual advertisers taking part, 65,246. These firms bought space in their own local newspapers or time on radio stations to express their conviction that "the voluntary way is the American way," as opposed to compulsion.

Inches of advertising space bought by participants, 1,186,594. This is in addition to the newspaper advertising space sponsored by doctors in their own Nation-wide schedule.

Total amount expended by participating advertisers, $2,019,849. Included in this total are expenditures for 35,362 radio spots, direct mail, posters, billboards, and television programs, carrying the message for freedom in medicine, paid for by nonmedical businesses, industries, and professions. This amount, spent by the public to demonstrate its confidence in the medical profession and its faith in freedom, tota'ed nearly twice medicine's own advertising expenditure to present the basic message.

Participating in the survey of thousands of newspapers, magazines, and radio stations were the following agencies, to which the appreciation of the medical profession is extended: Advertising Checking Bureau, Inc., Western Newspaper Union, National Editorial Association, many advertising agencies, whose friendly counsel was invaluable, and International Business Machines Corp. (As this report goes to press, 1,240 newspapers remain to be checked.)

HOW AMERICA ANSWERED THE ROLL CALL

People in every geographical area, every economic bracket, every type of work, joined in simultaneously—at their own expense—to advertise their views on the issue of compulsion versus the voluntary way. The main conclusion that can be drawn from such overwhelming response is that Americans are thoroughly aware that the socialization of one profession means eventual socialization of others—and that they don't want any part of the process in America.

Businesses, professions, industries, and trades which advertised their views

Type of business:	Number participating
Automobile dealers	1,266
Banks, brokers	1,665
Dairies	1,068
Dress shops	56
Drug stores, retail	10,621
Drug wholesalers and manufacturers	27
Dry goods stores	384
Groceries, meat markets, bakeries	993
Hospitals and clinics	559
Hardware stores, lumber yards	709
Insurance, general; agents, brokers	4,755
Insurance, life; agents, companies	819
Insurance, health and accident; companies, agents, brokers	2,624

Dear fellow doctors and friends of medicine: We take pleasure in transmitting to you this brief booklet summarizing the results of medicine's national advertising campaign, and reporting that our advertising objective has been fulfilled far beyond our expectations.

Today, all the Nation knows that American medicine does not stand alone. Everywhere new allies have taken determined public stand beside us.

We believe this simultaneous action by tens of thousands of people in every part of the Nation, speaking out in behalf of freedom for one profession, is a record of great, new significance, not only to medicine, but in the field of advertising and public relations, and in public affairs and Government as well.

On behalf of the profession, we should like to acknowledge deep gratitude to those legions of Americans who have recognized medicine's campaign as a basic crusade for freedom.

Our great appreciation goes to those who by advertising their views to the public give tangible evidence of their confidence in American medicine and in the continuing crusade for the voluntary way of life.

They Critically Prattle and Babble While Patriots Die and Old Joe et al. Rejoice

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 19, 1950

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, it is indeed difficult for one to believe that men who have been privileged to be born, live, and be honored signally in this great country of ours would become so politically benighted that in this hour of peril they would insist upon exercising to the full their right of freedom of speech against our President and the members of his Cabinet. I do not advocate that freedom of speech be curtailed in any way but I do claim that common decency and true Americanism should prompt some people to correct their talking behavior.

If there ever was a time when speech was silver and silence was golden it is now as far as speaking about supposed mistakes upon the part of the leadership of our country is concerned.

I have observed men, who should be and doubtless are real patriots under ordinary circumstances, fairly chortle with glee when Secretary of Defense Marshall is characterized as a sick old man with a memory so bad that he forgot where he was the night before Pearl Harbor, who assume a puritanical mien when someone denounces and questions the loyalty and patriotism of Secretary of State Acheson; and who seemingly look with approval upon those pygmy minds who bend every effort to make President Truman's trying task more difficult by goading him with telegrams and letters and indirectly seeking to take over the duties of the office of Chief Executive and Commander in Chief.

I sometimes wonder, if when these misguided men are concocting their almost fiendish doings, they ever stop to think that old Joe Stalin and his satellites are also enjoying their doings immensely. I wonder if these people realize what an unpatriotic disservice they are doing at this time to this Nation and its people.

We are preparing to oppose an enemy which is the most sinister ever known to civilized man. This is no laughing or criticizing matter as far as patriotic Americans are concerned. This is a serious and somber moment in the lives of every American. I cannot understand why men to whom have been delegated serious duties and responsibilities should discharge them in a way and manner injurious and detrimental to the Republic.

The right of free speech is a great right but it is not superior to the privilege of being truly American and really patriotic.

Everyone should respect their superiors. People have given to President Truman and he in turn has delegated to others in Government, great responsibilities and burdensome duties. How can this Nation hope to have its juveniles respect law, authority, and position when some of the honored oldsters are setting such a bad example of disrespect for authority, for the rules of common decency, and for the very fate of our country.

I now wish to call your attention to several newpaper articles which I think are well worth reading and seriously considering:

On December 18, 1950, the following editorial appeared in the CIO News:

LET'S CUT IT OUT

We had hoped that the brickbat-throwing season in Washington would come to an end as the international situation became more serious—but we hoped in vain.

We had hoped, too, that the mud slinging which accompanied this year's political campaign would end with the election—but it didn't.

Those who began yelling "Get Dean Acheson" in an effort to influence the election outcome are still at it—and in some respects the situation is now worse than it was a few months ago.

The latest Judo twist goes this way:

"It makes no difference whether Secretary of State Acheson is innocent or guilty of the charges made against him; he should be fired because he no longer has the confidence of the American people."

Those who peddle this phony line act as if Acheson, instead of Joe Stalin, provided our No. 1 problem.

They act as if the battle against the State Department is as important as the battle against the Reds in Korea.

It's disgraceful—and it ought to stop.

It ought to stop because it's wrong, because there is no justification for the "get Acheson" drive and because our internal squabbling is demoralizing to our own Government and to our allies.

And, furthermore, there's no indication that a new Secretary of State—if one were selected—would get any better treatment than that accorded Acheson.

ANNA ROSENBERG ALSO IS VICTIM

Latest victim of the brickbat throwing—other than Acheson—is Mrs. Anna Rosenberg, selected a few weeks ago as Assistant Secretary of Defense, who was accused of having attended Communist meetings at some time in the distant past.

The Senate Armed Service Committee has some very important work dealing with the Nation's security which should be handled, but it spent much of last week looking into the accusations against Mrs. Rosenberg.

The evidence against her—if indeed it was evidence—was provided by a fellow who says he was an ex-Communist. He said he had seen Mrs. Rosenberg at the meetings.

She flatly denied the charge. Senators examining FBI records said they contained nothing to back up the accusation. And the committee cleared her by unanimous vote.

Mrs. Rosenberg has a long and good record of public service. There is nothing in it to indicate that she is one of those subversive elements about which some of our lawmakers love to rave and rant.

Maybe those responsible for the charge against Mrs. Rosenberg were actually out to get her—but there's a growing suspicion in many quarters that Secretary of Defense Marshall, who wanted her as an assistant, is the real target.

One of the objectives of the Reds right now is to disrupt the operations of our war-defense set-up. They must be getting a kick out of seeing somebody else do the job for them.

THE JUDO VOICE CARRIES POISON, FEAR

A great exponent of judoism on the newspaper fraternity says President Truman should be removed from office unless the administration sanctions use of Chinese Nationalist troops in Korea. The United Nations alone has that right. If President Truman or the United States did so, it would be unauthorized aggression.

In the light of the statement, it is interesting to read the following article in the Catholic Commonweal, a widely read Catholic weekly, by Associate Editor Francis Downing:

The voice of Judo is abroad in the land; it is now, as it was in the beginning, a poisoned and fearful thing. It went on forever making unproved charges, forever irresponsible, forever merely free of libel; it went on exploiting the insecure, the anxious, the confused, and the afraid.

It went on attacking Alger Hiss, assaulting Mr. Acheson, attacking perverts, attacking unnamed Communists, attacking Yalta, praising MacArthur as if he were God and Judo had invented him; it went on, the voice, and it harassed the discontent, and it assigned guilt, and it called names, and it laid the blame; and it talked to the emotions, and it was like balm and it assuaged. In every case where it made foreign policy an issue it won.

It told no truth, and held no answers, but won. It is like the taste of pennies in the mouth; it fills me with fear.

We have known demagogues in our political history, but this is a special kind—an evil kind, a deliberate kind; it adds falseness to the already false.

It represents the other side of the election coin. It is the spurious and the counterfeit.

It would be legal tender nowhere in any world where reason was and where intelligence was operative. Yet men took it as though it were legal tender and had value and was clean and bright and new and had been minted honestly.

It Is a Tribute to the Ingenuity and Courage of Our Airmen That More Than 15,000 United Nations Casualties Have Been Flown to Safety From the Battlefields of Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 19, 1950

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, outside of the Berlin airlift, an operation carried on for more than a year, and which affected the lives of several million persons, history has seen no air operation comparable to the evacuation of our casualties out of the Korean battlefields.

It is because of the heroism and courage displayed by our airmen that I submit to the consideration of the membership of this House, the following editorial from the Evening Star.

The editorial reads as follows:

AIR RESCUES IN KOREA

It is a tribute to the ingenuity and courage of our airmen that more than 15,000 United Nations casualties have been flown to safety from the battlefields of Korea. Several types of planes—particularly the helicopter—have been engaged in the operation. Exposed most of the time to enemy fire, and in many cases landing in areas entirely surrounded by Chinese Communists, they have carried out their missions of mercy in a way that lends a kind of new, humanizing dimension to the grim art of warfare. In effect, through their continuing rescues of the ill, the frostbitten, and the wounded, they have saved roughly the equivalent of a division of troops. But more than that, wholly apart from the military significance involved, these machines and their daring crews have come as ministering angels to brave young men who otherwise, being trapped and unable to fend for themselves, might have died in great suffering or been sent off to await some dark fate in faraway prison camps. That they have been brought to safety is one of the very few heart-warming aspects of the bleak Korean story. All hands responsible for it deserve the highest commendation.

Excess-Profits Tax

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. NORRIS POULSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, when the recent excess-profits bill was on the floor, we had no opportunity to make any amendments nor will we have when the conference report is returned.

We know that the tax problem is just starting and that, immediately after the Eighty-second Congress convenes, the Ways and Means Committee will start to survey the whole problem of taxes. I am submitting for their perusal and consideration a plan suggested by Prof. Charles H. Porter, formerly of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. He presents some ideas worthy of consideration, and I am asking that they be inserted in the RECORD so that all those interested may have a chance to study them:

EXCESS-PROFITS TAX

(By Charles H. Porter)

Excess profits are the extra profits made by a company as a result of war mobilization over and above the profits that company would have made in a world at peace.

There is no perfect formula for determining excess profits.

We must strive to devise a formula which will not confuse profits due to superior efficiency or due to added investment with profits due to war.

Since the end of World War II, corporations have spent hundreds of millions in expanding and modernizing plant. Much of this plan has been completed so recently that it has been producing for only a fraction of the postwar years, and some of it is not even now in production. These millions of dollars of added investment would be earning profits in 1951 even if there were no war or mobilization for war. In many cases the actual pretax profits of the expanding companies, though greater than in the base period, will be smaller than they would have been if there were no war. The normal rate of return on added investment differs between industries. The determination of an invested capital base and the adjustment of it for change, involving the effective date of change as well as the amount of change, are difficult.

The old excess-profits tax resulted in many claims for adjustments and refunds. Some of these were not settled for several years, and there may be some which are not yet settled. How many of these settlements were inequitable in a matter of opinion. There is no question but that the settlement negotiations consumed an enormous amount of time and energy on the part both of employees of the Department of Internal Revenue and of the executives of the corporations involved.

We need, therefore, an excess-profits formula which is based on the relation between the 1951 profits of each company and the profits of that same company in the base period and which makes proper allowance for the expansion of the company but does not require a determination of the dollars of invested capital.

The following formula is suggested for consideration. It is far from perfect. There are valid objections to it. The question is whether the imperfections in it are less important than the imperfections in the old excess-profits tax or in other suggested formula.

(A) Determine the total pretax net income for the entire base period, subtract all interest and dividends received or included in net income, add all interest paid or accrued, add the total of individual salary payments in excess of $3,000 per annum; i. e., the difference between total payroll and social-security payroll.

(B) Determine the total social-security payroll for the entire base period; i. e., the total payroll less individual salaries in excess of $3,000 per annum.

The ratio of the first amount (A) to the second amount (B) is the normal peacetime profit ratio for that company. Apply that ratio to the wartime social-security payroll to determine the dollars of normal pretax profit of that company for the war year. Actual profits—adjusted by interest, dividends, etc., as for the base period—in excess of this amount are excess profits.

(NOTE.—The increase in the social-security maximum salary from $3,000 to $3,600 requires an adjustment. Which figure is used is comparatively unimportant so long as the same limit is used for both periods. It may be easier to adjust the 1951 figure to $3,000, the need being known at the time, rather than to correct the figures of all base years.)

Some alternative method should be authorized for companies having losses or subnormal profits in the base period, e. g., Waltham Watch.

Even though the suggested formula should prove after study to be satisfactory for manufacturing companies or department stores, it would still be necessary to devise an alternative formula for banks, insurance companies, and other financial institutions and for personal service companies.

The underlying assumption is that for any one company the number of employees and payroll will increase in proportion to increase in capital invested in plant and that the volume of business and of profits will vary with the number of employees. There will, of course, be a substantial difference between good and bad years, but, whatever formula is used, we have to use the average of a base period as a yardstick. For any one company, is not the ratio of profits to payroll more nearly constant than any other easily determined ratio?

Among the apparent advantages are:

1. The excess profits of any company are determined by a comparison with the prewar profits of that same company.

2. Because both interest expense and interest income are excluded, no adjustment need be made because of substitution of stock for bonds or other changes in sources of capital.

3. Because the date when additional capital invested in plant begins to earn a return coincides with the date when additional employees are needed to operate such plant, these profits will not be confused with additional profits earned on old plant because of the war.

4. Since the purchasing power of payroll dollars, inventory dollars, and dollars invested in receivables are at all times on the same level, increased payroll for the same number of employees will parallel the needed increase in capital invested in inventories, etc.

5. The use of social-security payroll rather than gross payroll will deter a company from increasing the salaries of executives on the theory that the Government will pay 85 percent (?) of the increase.

The ups and downs of the social-security payroll more nearly parallel the ups and downs in business activity and profits than do the ups and downs of the total payroll, because many executives receive the same salary in good times and bad.

6. It avoids the assumption that the normal rate of return on additional invested capital is the same for all industries. This, of course, varies with the risk factor and whether the industry is stable or highly cyclical in character.

7. The use only of amounts already definitely a matter of record will greatly simplify the determination of excess profits both for the corporation and for the Bureau of Internal Revenue.

8. In the old excess-profits tax the effort to give some protection to companies expanding normally allowed an invested capital base which actually gave a "free ride" to companies which were slipping, which had large unused capacity, and whose increased profits were due entirely to the war. Since the profits-to-payroll ratio adequately protects companies expanding normally, the alternative tax based on invested capital can fairly be made stiffer than before and would recapture true excess profits.

Among the disadvantages are:

1. Companies would be penalized which have greatly increased the degree of mechanization in their operations, thereby increasing their invested capital while reducing their payroll; e. g., some coal companies. Such companies could use the alternative method available to companies with subnormal prewar profits.

2. Companies manufacturing new products for the Army might require a greater than normal percentage of high-salaried engineers and other experts. Their salaries in excess of $3,000 would be included in excess profits.

3. Companies with unused capacity in base period would get a "free ride." Outside of the aircraft industry, such industries are rare. If these or others work on military orders, their prices and profits are subject to renegotiation. Whether the Government recovers excess cost to it through excess-profits tax or through renegotiation is immaterial.

4. An increase in rates of pay on cost-plus contracts would increase the proportion of total profit not defined as excess profit. Since it is almost impossible to reduce rates of pay once granted, a company doing this would know that it would lose in the long run, and if it had other contracts not on a cost-plus basis, it would lose immediately.

Interest and dividends received are properly excluded from excess profits. (Except for financial institutions to which this suggested formula is not applicable.) Interest is usually that received on Government bonds and in any case is such a small percentage of the capital invested in interest-bearing bonds or notes that it cannot be considered excessive. Dividends received are paid from the residual income of other corporations which have already paid a tax on excess profits, if any, and have paid all other taxes. The transfer of these already taxed profits as dividends to a second corporation does not make them profits due to the war and therefore excessive.

The profit-to-payroll ratio is preferable to a profit-to-sales ratio because a company operating at capacity can greatly increase its sales volume by subcontracting. Increased profits to the prime contractor resulting from wartime subcontracting are certainly due to the war and should not be exempted from an excess-profit tax.

Even if the apparent advantages of the proposed formula outweigh the apparent disadvantages, the next step is to compute for several typical companies the "normal profit ratio" for the probable base years and apply it to the estimated payroll of 1951. Will this figure compared with the estimated pretax profit for 1951 result in an excess-profits tax, and if so, should it or should it not?

Woman Gets First-Hand Data on Socialized Medicine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL W. SHAFER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 19, 1950

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include an article regarding socialized medicine by Jessie Fant Evans, able Washington Star staff member. This article, based on an interview with Dr. Elizabeth Webb Wilson, noted woman actuary and author, is, in my opinion, must reading for Members of Congress. It follows:

[From the Washington Star of December 3, 1950]

WOMAN GETS FIRST-HAND DATA ON MEDICINE IN ENGLAND

(By Jessie Fant Evans)

Challenging statements in regard to the British socialized medicine program are made by Dr. Elizabeth Webb Wilson, internationally known woman actuary and author of a recent book on compulsory health insurance. Dr. Wilson, a former resident of this city, is here for a series of economic conferences. She holds a doctor of philosophy from Radcliffe College, wears a Phi Beta Kappa key and won her bachelor of arts and master of arts degrees at George Washington University, as well as the GWU alumni achievement award.

She says: "The British compulsory, socialized medicine program is costing 3 times what the government anticipated it would. Both doctors and patients are at the mercy of regulation by bureaucrats. For instance, a physician in Great Britain cannot now move his office into the next block, take on an assistant, or go on an extended vacation unless his petition to do so is approved by the local council, representing the Ministry of Health."

She also quotes Lord Horder, the King's physician, as saying, "The progress of British medicine has been set back 100 years by the National Health Service."

MADE SECOND SURVEY

Dr. Wilson attended the centenary of the British Institute of Actuaries in London in 1948 and was the only woman granted the privilege of speaking before it. She subsequently made an intensive 3-month study of the socialized-medicine program. She recently returned from another 3 months' follow-up survey of how it is working.

"I have never been so intensively occupied in my life," Dr. Wilson told me. "I visited high and low in my efforts to get accurate answers to four questions: 1. What is happening to the economy of the country because of the service? 2. How are the inevitable controls acting on the liberties of physicians and patients? 3. How is it affecting the quality of medical care? 4. What do people think of it?"

With regard to the first two questions, she stated: "Britain is spending between 4 and 5 percent of her national income for the service. This is more than 10 percent of the taxes she collects. Workers pay only a small part through payroll deductions. The rest comes from income- and sales-tax collections." She quoted Sir Hubert Henderson, British economist, to the effect that "expenditures for the national health service are peculiarly inflationary."

COST EXCEEDS ESTIMATES

According to Dr. Wilson, before the service started its advocates expected it would cost about £152,000,000. In its third year £464,000,000 have been appropriated and possibly the estimate may be exceeded. She pointed out that this is not a complete accounting, since there has been no hospital expansion, although there are 90,000 in London waiting hospitalization. She also claims there are no new nurses' homes, although there are 40,000 nurses needed, many of whom could be secured if housing were available.

"Inevitably, when the bill is presented, it will be higher than the £500,000,000 set as the danger line by Dr. Ff. Rogers, British medical economist," she stated.

"Naturally," Dr. Wilson continued, "the pressure from the exchequer for economy is resulting in more and more controls. Already doctors, dentists, and pharmacists are regimented by the fact that Minister of Health Bevan is to all intents and purposes the only employer of their professional skill. As such he has cut renumeration of the dentists and pharmacists to less than was promised before the service began. The general practitioners, too, are contending Mr. Bevan has never paid them their due. The result is that both English family doctors and Scottish pharmacists are threatening to leave the service."

She called attention to the threat last October of the British Medical Association to pull 19,000 doctors out of the Labor Government's free medical treatment program unless their pay raise is significant.

With the Ministry of Health owning 96 percent of the hospitals, specialists are chained to their posts as definitely as if shackles were visible, she quoted from the Martin report.

"GROCERY STORE" MEDICINE

In answer to question 3 her examples are the hurried prescription as a pallative instead of a cure, the cursory examinations, the patients' demands for specific drugs—"grocery store" medicine, the doctors call it.

In conclusion she summed up her reply to her fourth question to this effect: "I interviewed 300 people whose opinions I did not know in advance. A majority were from the lower income groups. Much to my surprise I found that three out of four did not like the service. They criticized the quality of care and resented its cost to their government and thus to them in taxes."

In pursuit of information she visited a factory in Birmingham which turns out small household appliances. Here she talked with each worker. "Then," she said, "I sat in a doctor's surgery, or office, as we would call it, situated in a factory district. He saw 90 patients in 3 hours, some of whom had to wait more than 2 hours for about 2 minutes of his time. I talked to hairdressers, station porters, waitresses, people, in queques before restaurants and in crowds awaiting a glimpse of "Winnie" (Winston Churchill), and the news of Princess Anne's birth."

Dr. Wilson was a guest at the Queen's garden party. She had tea and dinner with the Prime Minister and Mrs. Attlee and their family at Checquers, and she was the first woman to have luncheon in the offices of the Friends' Provident and Century Insurance Co., of which J. Douglas Pringle, one of Britain's prominent industrialists is president. Lady Frank's father, Mr. Tanner, is chairman of the board. She sat between these two distinguished gentlemen.

Hire the Handicapped—It's Good Business

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN E. FOGARTY
OF RHODE ISLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 19, 1950

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am pleased to insert the article which won second prize in the national contest of the President's program on Employ-the-Handicapped Week. This was written by Miss Anne Manning, a student at St. Xavier's Academy in Providence, R. I. The prize-winning article follows:

HIRE THE HANDICAPPED—IT'S GOOD BUSINESS

(By Anne Manning)

Seating himself behind his huge mahogany desk, Mr. Stapleton spoke to his associate.

"You know, I have been contemplating hiring several new workers in the plant, and it came to my mind that lately there has been considerable mention of hiring handicapped persons in industry. Just why is such stress being placed on vocational rehabilitation today?"

"Well," responded his colleague, "it seems since Pearl Harbor five American civilians have become disabled for every disabled American soldier. At least 1,500,000 men and women in the civilian population have some disability which constitutes a barrier to their fullest mental, physical, social, vocational, and economic usefulness. And their number increases by 200,000 a year through accidents and illness or from congenital causes. These Americans have as much right to be independent and self-supporting to their fullest capabilities as they have to freedom of speech and worship. The only way is found through the vocational rehabilitation programs operated by the States with the assistance of the Federal Government which urge businessmen and employees like yourself to provide an opportunity for these disabled persons to advance."

"Yes; I see that, but what about efficiency? A plant like this could not run without it. Certainly one who is handicapped cannot be as efficient as an able-bodied person."

Stapleton's voice betrayed his doubts.

"Services such as counseling, training, and retraining, and physical restoration to remove or reduce the handicap are offered the disabled person. He is trained usually in one field at which he may be particularly adept. Studies have shown that handicapped persons prove to be just as efficient or even more efficient than the nondisabled."

"Is there not more convincing proof of their efficiency? Do many large concerns hire physically handicapped persons?" Businessmen are fond of statistics.

"Why, surely. Several nationally known companies hire many disabled persons and testify favorably as to the quality and quantity of their work. Some employers, such as George Barr & Co., recruit their employees almost wholly from the disabled group. Of the 142 employees in this firm, 127 are deaf, blind, orthopedically disabled, epileptic, cerebral palsied, arthritic, or mentally deficient. Ninety-five percent of the Minneapolis Artificial Limbs Co. are orthopedically disabled. The Ford Motor Co. has made it a practice to employ handicapped workers in its plants in proportion to their number in the population within the area surrounding the plant. As of October 1944, this company employed 11,300 handicapped workers."

"You mentioned quality and quantity of work. Just what indication do these companies have of their satisfaction?" Stapleton settled back in his chair.

"Although few studies have actually measured relative efficiency of handicapped and nonhandicapped workers, there are innumerable testimonials to the efficiency of the handicapped as compared to that of the able-bodied. In fact, companies such as Caterpillar Tractor, Walter Kidde & Co., Consolidated Vultee, the Minneapolis Honeywell Regulator Co., and others, indicate that the production rate of the handicapped is as good or better than that of the able-bodied. Also, two companies, the Barr Co. and Minneapolis Artificial Limb Co., whose employment policies are to hire a large proportion of physically disabled, state that handicapped people are eager workers, capable of maintaining their efforts when the job fits them, over as long or longer periods of time."

"Yes; but that brings us to absenteeism. Is it not possible that a handicapped person is more apt to miss more working hours than the able-bodied worker.

"During the war, stress was laid on the absentee record of the employees because of the necessity of maximum production and absenteeism records are still one of the most important components of successful management. Four of the companies I previously mentioned all reported that the handicapped had fewer absences than other workers. However, the largest number of studies showed no appreciable difference between absenteeism of handicapped and nonhandicapped workers. In the study made by Cincinnati Occupational Research Association, handicapped workers were reported losing around six man-hours per month which did not vary significantly from the five to eight man-hours lost per month for all causes by industrial employees reported to the War Manpower Commission for the period June 1943–April 1944.

"Similarly, the survey made by the Bureau of Labor Statistics showed 93 percent of the employers believed handicapped had equal or better absenteeism records while of the 97 employers reporting to the Office of Vocational Rehabilitation, 95 percent believed the handicapped had equal or better than average absenteeism records."

"I imagine there is more danger of accidents where a disabled person is concerned. "Can they be insured?"

"One of the biggest hurdles for the handicapped is the belief held by many employers who have not yet given them a trial, that they are more prone to accidents. In a study made by the Office of Vocational Rehabilitation, 98 percent of the employers said the handicapped had either the same or lower accident rate than the able-bodied. Another questionnaire revealed that 96 percent of the handicapped lost no time due to accidents. The most convincing arguments for employers as to the low-accident rate of the physically handicapped comes from the organization that has to pay for the accidents.

"The Association of Casualty and Surety Executives in February 1944, stated that it is the policy and practice of member companies of this association not to advise employers against employment of disabled persons. The initial rate for workmen's compensation insurance is governed by the industrial classification involved. The physical defects of such workers are not considered in the formulas for determining that rate and no higher rate is charged because of employment of physically disabled persons. Nor is such employment prohibited in any way by the terms of workmen's compensation insurance policies. Does that answer your question on insurance?

"Yes; completely. But, finally, does the physically handicapped employee require any special considerations? Just how should the employer treat him?

"The belief that the handicapped require special considerations or modifications of the job to suit their needs, all of which entail additional cost, is frequently an obstacle to their employment. Evidence indicated that such special considerations are necessary. Two Minneapolis studies stated that 98 percent of the handicapped do not expect favors. The same studies showed it was unnecessary to modify the job in any way for 85 to 90 percent of the handicapped workers.

"Employers should follow the Golden Rule in dealing with the handicapped. Do for these workers as he would have others do for him if he were physically impaired. He should acquaint him with his new surroundings and the company's history, rules, and policies, introduce him to his fellow workers. A few minutes of warm conversation will weld a friendship and secure a good, reliable worker.

"Another thing I haven't mentioned is that the handicapped who are jobless are supported by Government funds. After rehabilitation, tax consumers become taxpayers bringing successful economic results. You will see the importance of vocational rehabilitation, why such stress is laid on it, why it is good business if you keep in mind three things. First, our disabled civilians generally are capable of becoming self-sustaining and contributing citizens of their communities; secondly, our handicapped workers, once they have received the essential services of vocational rehabilitations, make safe, steady, and productive employees; and third, the investment of public funds in the rehabilitation of our disabled civilians produces social and economic returns of great value.

"Well, you have sold me on the idea. No one could ask for better reasons for employing the physically disabled. Now I know that hiring the handicapped is good business."

Nation Is Aroused

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting a telegram which I just received from one of the outstanding Democrats of southern California:

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., December 15, 1950.
Hon. NORRIS A. POULSON,
House of Representatives:

Governor Dewey's clarion call last night sounds the keynote of an awakened America. We have been frustrated with abstract idealism. Petty politics and appeasements intrude while large issues encroach relentlessly. Further procrastination is madness. Since Korea the people have been waiting for definite realistic leadership. Charity begins at home. In the words of Emerson "of what avail is the plough or sail or land or light if freedom fail." The above telegram was today sent to the following: Gov. Thomas Dewey, Gov. Earl Warren, Senator Richard Nixon, and Senator Robert A. Taft. Also to President Truman, Washington, D. C.

What the United States Must Do To Be Prepared—All-Out Action Recommended

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JACOB K. JAVITS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, there is appended an interesting letter to the editor of the New York Herald Tribune on this subject, the author of which is my brother, Benjamin A. Javits, whose recent book, Peace by Investment—Funk & Wagnalls, 1950—further expands the concepts set forth in this letter:

NEW YORK, N. Y., December 6, 1950.

DEAR SIR: Total war hangs over us. Although the American people are walking around with a collective hole in their stomachs—that hollow feeling that comes with impending doom—our finest hours are still ahead of us. The democratic process makes us appear to hang back, but our people have never flinched and are not afraid now.

We have one enemy—the Kremlin.

I believe the initiative is still with the United States, but we have only weeks, not months, and certainly not years.

This war has been going on for 36 years since 1914 with fascism, nazism, and now communism.

Ours is a social and competitive capitalism; the capitalism of France, England, etc., is monopoly capitalism. Some countries have a combination of socialism and monopoly capitalism.

We must do within 12 months to 2 years at the most what it would ordinarily take 10 years to do. Russian bombs may fall here in 1951.

In this crisis we have failed diplomatically and politically. Only industrially do we excel and since our kind of industry is the real base of military success we can win ultimately in a test of arms. Leon Keyserling, your own editorial policy, the Magazine of Business, and others, have pointed out that there is only one primary approach for us and that is to out-produce the rest of the world. It is, therefore, essential that among other things we dedicate at once to doubling production of this country so that we do not have to have a military dictatorship even temporarily. We shall be able to supply some of our civilian needs and, therefore, save many of our liberties.

The rulers of Red Russia have no other business but war. Russia has been preparing for 26 years for an all-out war of destruction. They actually started war against us in 1947 by way of Greece. They gave us definite notice during the last war of their intentions; they insisted on getting everything, knowing everything they could possibly get from us about our industrial processes, etc., and not giving us the slightest bit of information from behind their borders.

We must get ready industrially for an all-out war, and beyond that we must be ready to meet the needs of the people around the world with our productive power so that the disinherited of the earth may have a chance to live—the Russian system only offers them a chance to die. The world wants hope above food. We can win by giving hope.

We are not helpless even now. We have 10,000,000 trained veterans here. These can become the hard core here of any army we need to consolidate the foreign victory over communism in company with those who have more at stake than we have—the British, the French, and all the other peoples of the world.

I therefore suggest the following plan of action:

1. Declare the United States in a state of siege.

2. Mobilize and make subject to draft all men and women from 16 to 60.

3. Raise the workweek to 48 hours minimum.

4. Cut all union or featherbedding rules and red tape in order that production go full speed ahead.

5. Set a target: To double the productivity of the American production machine for necessary goods by building new plants, improving old or going all out on efficiency.

6. Eliminate all luxury operations whether in goods, services, education, and so forth.

7. For the period of the emergency, tax all profits above a reasonable return on capital and provision for obsolescence, depreciation, depletion, research, or other essentials.

8. Set price and wage controls. Allocate materials and manpower. Bring in additional manpower from Britain, Italy, and Germany, if necessary, after proper screening. We might even bring over enough of these to make armies out of them here.

9. Appropriate $50,000,000,000 for doubling our capacity to produce within 12 to 24 months and for civilian defense, or disaster.

10. Appropriate $50,000,000,000 for additional weapons of war, especially air weapons—offense and defense—to protect us against air attack.

11. Appropriate $100,000,000,000 for aid and development on a businesslike long-term basis for foreign peoples to raise their standard of living and to give them greater assurances of food, clothing, and shelter. Set up an enlarged World Reconstruction Finance Corporation, Export-Import Bank, or World Bank Fund, with or without United Nations support, to carry out this program.

12. Statement by business leaders calling for full mobilization and telling the world that American business is owned by Main Street, not Wall Street; that American business has the same social objectives that any people's government has; that we have a social capitalism and competitive capitalism which sums up into a consumer's economy; that we have democratic elections in practically all big business just as we have political elections; that the fundamentals of American business are constantly higher purchasing power in the hands of workers, constantly lower prices, constantly improved working conditions; no child labor; freedom, peace, security, and prosperity for all; that the right to own privately is a sacred right and applies equally to intangibles (religion and opinion) as it does to tangibles (homes, insurance policies, stocks, bonds, etc.), and that American business is the living example of that philosophy.

13. We stand ready at any and all times to trade and deal with the U. S. S. R. and the other countries now in the Soviet bloc once they stop infiltration, aggression, international libel and slander, and show by their acts an intention not to hamstring the UN and to respect human rights.

Very truly yours,

BENJAMIN A. JAVITS.

Congressional Immunity and the Citizen

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LESTER C. HUNT
OF WYOMING

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, December 19 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. HUNT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the insertion in the Appendix of the RECORD of an article entitled "Congressional Immunity and the Citizen," written by a distinguished member of the bar, Nathan Boone Williams, and published in this month's issue of the District of Columbia Bar Association Journal.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESSIONAL IMMUNITY AND THE CITIZEN

(By Nathan Boone Williams)

The expansive scope of the field of Federal Government which has developed within recent years over the activities of the citizen presents a number of vital and interesting questions of constitutional law and public policy.

It is the traditional and accepted right of free men to paddle their own canoe when they so wish, so long as they respect the equal right of others. Or, as was so pungently stated by Justice Brandeis of the Supreme Court of the United States in Olmstead v. United States (277 U. S. 478 (1928)):

"The makers of the Constitution * * * sought to protect Americans in their beliefs, their thoughts, their emotions, and their sensations. They conferred, as against the Government, the right to be let alone—the most comprehensive of rights and the right most valued by civilized men."

Liberty is not license. Mankind is not free to do as he might desire, or as he might will. He is only free to do what he ought to do in just and decent regard for the equal right and obligations of other men. Only by the acceptance and practice of this principle has mankind made his tortuous and zigzag way from jungle savagery to our present cellophane civilization, a thin and transparent veneer, through which evil and predatory inclinations frequently burst.

Liberty is the keystone in the arch of the temple of free government, liberty under law is the luxury of disciplined minds.

The immunity provision of section 6 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States protects Members of Congress for any speech or debate in either House. The source of this constitutional principle has a long and interesting history tracing from efforts to free Members of deliberative bodies from attack or coercion from any source outside their chambers.

Said James Madison:

"I have always considered the right of self-protection in the discharge of the necessary duties as inherent in legislative bodies as in courts of justice, in the State legislatures as in the British Parliament, and in the Federal Legislature as in both. In the application of this privilege to emerging cases, difficulties and differences of opinion may arise. In deciding on these the reason and necessity of the privilege must be the guide." (Madison's Writings, vol. 4, p. 221.)

The distinguished American jurist, Joseph Story, wrote:

"No man ought to have a right to defame others under color of a performance of the duties of his office. And if he does so in the actual discharge of his duties in Congress, that furnishes no reason why he should be enabled, through the medium of the press, to destroy the reputation and invade the repose of other citizens. It is neither within the scope of his duty nor in furtherance of public rights or public policy. Every citizen has as good a right to be protected by the laws from malignant scandal and false charges and defamatory imputations, as a Member of Congress has to utter them in his seat. If it were otherwise, a man's character might be taken away without the possibility of redress, either by the malice, or indiscretion, or overweening self-conceit of a Member of Congress." (Story's Commentaries, fifth ed. by Bigelow, book III, ch. 12, sec. 866.)

Despite numerous and recent examples of scandalous abuse of the immunity privilege by some Members of Congress, we are not presently concerned therewith, but, rather with what may be done to protect the citizen from "the malice, or indiscretion, or overweening self-conceit of a Member of Congress."

An example of current and widespread attempted protection of constitutional immunity is the insertion of scandalous matter in the Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as alleged "extension of remarks." When words are spoken in debate, others are afforded an opportunity to challenge untrue or intemperate statements. When words are found in a formal report, such report relating to a matter under consideration or review by either House, such report is subject to examination of the entire membership of Congress. Such formal reports, together with testimony taken by a committee of either House in inquiry concerning a constitutional subject of legislative interest, together with words spoken in speech or debate, must embrace the full limits of congressional immunity under the Constitution.

Extension of remarks appearing in the Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD are frequently reprinted bearing the label: "Not printed at Government expense." Such designation is only a half-truth. These reprints are printed at a charge by the Government Printing Office on the request of Members of Congress. Such charge covers paper and presswork, but the expensive part of such publication—composition—is rarely, if ever, taken into account. These reprints are then mailable under frank without the payment of postage, a device widely used for propaganda purposes. By such technique individual calumny may be, and frequently is, accomplished at the expense of the public purse.

The idea that the king can do no wrong has followed us from the days of kings and serfs. The acts of public officials, whether tortious or other, being the acts of Government through their agency, must be made instantly reviewable, despite the ancient concept, "The king can do no wrong."

Government, whether popular or other, is but the agency whereby society as a whole undertakes in its own interest certain necessary activities. Society as a whole should willingly assume the burden for the tortious or corrupt acts of its own agents and employees. When it does so, it will open the only really effective way whereby corrupt acts can be challenged by the damaged citizen.

Government, whether municipal, State, or National, must assume full responsibility for the wrongful acts of its agents and employees in the administration of their trusts, if we are ever to secure the full measure of trustee responsibility which good government requires and decent respect for the rights of the citizen demands.

Congress has seen fit to partially meet this problem by the enactment of the Federal Tort Claims Act, title IV of the Reorganization Act of 1946.

Under that law money damages only on account of damage to or loss of property or on account of personal injury or death, caused by the negligent or wrongful act or omission of any employee of the Government while acting within the scope of his office or employment are recoverable against the Government.

Such is the generally accepted rule of law as applied to the agents and employees of business concerns. Corporations have also been held for criminal offenses, such as sending obscene matter through the mails, criminal libel, obtaining money under false pretenses, extortion, and many other offenses against the statutes, both State and Federal. For a rather full discussion of this phase, see Corporate Criminal Liability, the Lawyer and Law Notes, fall issue, 1950.

With Government increasingly engaging in various forms of business enterprise, we can ill afford to longer neglect to apply the rule of honest responsibility for the acts of even those employees personally protected by constitutional immunity. They are our agents. We chose them. We must accept responsibility for their tortious acts against the rights of the citizen. They are trustees of the rights, privileges, responsibilities, and immunities conferred upon them by the suffrage of the citizens.

The Minneapolis Tribune said recently:

"The immunity enjoyed by Members of Congress is a public trust to be exercised conscientiously—not a license to be abused on the chance that it may make political capital."

Henry Clay said:

"Government is a trust, and the officers of the Government are trustees; and both the trust and the trustees are created for the benefit of the people."

When statutory regulation concerning the acts of trustees is absent it is high time that the omission should be cured by appropriate legislation. Such legislation has been proposed by Senator LESTER C. HUNT, of Wyoming, who on September 1, 1950, introduced S. 4113 providing for civil suits against the United States by persons suffering damage as a result of defamations committed by Members of Congress in the course of their official activities. The measure is restricted to the recovery of money damages occasioned by libel or slander.

This is a carefully written measure and would seem to merit the careful study of members of the bar, a group so vitally responsible for the maintenance of the principles of constitutional government, and, of whom Alexis de Tocqueville wrote:

"I cannot believe that a republic could subsist at the present time if the influence of lawyers in public business did not increase in proportion to the power of the people."

Shortsightedness

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 19, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following article from a recent issue of the Lawrence Evening Tribune, Lawrence, Mass.:

The National Munitions Board's failure to stockpile raw wool during the past few years when experienced men were urging this policy is now opening the way for much criticism of the Government agency. Tuesday's Boston Post carried the following editorial directed at the situation: "Boston, one of the world's great wool reception centers, and the New England textile cities where wool has long been processed into warm clothing material, will not have to indulge in any idle "I told you so" recriminations to bring home the results of the Munitions Board's refusal to stockpile this strategic item. The dispatches from Korea's fighting fronts are far too eloquent in that direction. So, too, is the urgent request of the Army that the Agriculture Department purchase 30,000,000 pounds by next October. That acquisition is going to cost a lot more than it would have in 1948 and 1949, and there are indications that we will have to compete with Russia for it in the world's market. It is a bit of shortsightedness upon which no American can look with equanimity."

The Medical Profession on Election Day Won a Pocketbook Victory for Themselves at the Expense of Our Government and Its People

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 19, 1950

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, it is significant that while the American Medical Association in good old cock-a-doodle-do fashion is crowing loud and long about having saved the medical profession from bureaucratic bondage, that a Nation-wide appeal is being made through the press to have something done on a national scale to relieve the medical shortage which our country is facing at this critical hour.

In view of the fact that an emergency has been declared by our President, and it is a real emergency as all of us must admit, I cannot see why it would not be proper and right for the President, as the Commander in Chief to order members of the Army, Navy, Air Corps, and Coast Guard, with proper aptitudes and educations, to be trained for the medical, dental, nursing, pharmacy, and other professions. An abbreviated, concise course could be given in a short period of time and the instructors could be drafted for that purpose from the Nation's manpower pool. In that way the medical quiz kids could be bypassed and the throttle-hold of the AMA and its members could be torn loose from the throat of public health needs. These newly trained military men could later, after proper legislation, take their places as professional men in civil life and the conspiracy against the health of the Nation would be broken.

I now invite attention to some of the recent newspaper publicity:

An eastern newspaper carried this news item:

ARCHBISHOP RAPS CRITICS WITHOUT CURE

BOSTON.—Too many who oppose socialized medicine have no substitute program for God's elect—the neglected sick poor, Archbishop Richard J. Cushing, of Boston, asserted at the midcentury meeting of the Archdiocesan Council of Catholic Nurses here.

"It is perfectly acceptable to me for Catholic doctors and nurses to oppose socialized medicine," Archbishop Cushing said, "but it is one thing to oppose a constructive program without a constructive substitute program. It is another thing to oppose socialized medicine and to come up with a program which will meet the needs of the sick poor."

The practice of medicine is a vocation, he continued, and the American Medical Association should give us a little more of the Christian charity which inspired in the days of old the doctor of the horse and buggy who answered a call at any hour of the day or night, who thought nothing of the bill but of the patient.

The League Reporter, of December 18, 1950, made this editorial comment:

PAYING THE DOCTOR

The doctors' lobby, the American Medical Association (AMA), fights a purely negative battle.

It is against national health insurance, which it labels socialized medicine. It has teamed with the realty lobby to fight public housing. It has teamed with the insurance lobby to fight disability insurance in the social security laws. It has teamed with the private utility lobby to fight public power.

But what the public wants from the doctors is an answer to such questions as these:

How can I pay the doctors' bills for a long illness—leukemia, for instance—of my child?

How can I pay the hospital bills for an accident—the loss of a leg, for instance—to myself?

The American people are not fooled by double talk. They want specific answers to specific problems.

They want to be able to pay for their illnesses and accidents themselves. They don't want a poorhouse system whereby they have to depend on charity. And they don't want to have to use up the savings of a lifetime.

The best way to guaranty that they can pay their own way is through a system of national health insurance. If there is a better answer the AMA should come forth with it instead of damning, attacking, and criticizing.

The League Reporter had this to say newswise:

YOU WOULD HAVE OWN MEDIC WITH HEALTH PLAN

Do you wonder just how national health insurance would work for you?

The following points should cut through American Medical Association (AMA) propaganda against the plan. All the points are in your favor.

1. When you or a member of your family needs medical care, you would call or go to the doctor of your own choice.

If your doctor found you needed hospital care or the service of a specialist, you would be entitled to such care (hospital care for 60 days).

You would also be entitled to:
Laboratory and X-ray services.
Costly medicines.
Home nursing, within limits.
Dental care, within limits.
Eyeglasses and appliances.

2. You and your family would get these benefits if you were employed, a farmer, or were in business for yourself. You would make small regular payments out of your income into a Government insurance fund, just like social security.

The payments made by people on wages and salaries would be matched by equal payments from their employers.

You would be eligible for these benefits also if you were retired under social security or a Government retirement plan, or if you were receiving public aid and your contribution was paid by a local or State agency.

3. The health insurance fund would be distributed to local communities by the States. In your locality, a board made up of representative citizens and doctors (the doctor members to be selected by the doctors themselves would handle the funds and determine the method of payment.

4. Your doctor, specialist and hospital would be paid out of the fund handled by the local committee—instead of your paying them directly.

That's the only difference from the present method. Your medical bills would be paid on an insurance basis rather than individually on the "catastrophe" basis.

Another leading labor paper printed the following:

COLLIER'S TAKES AFTER AMA

The American Medical Association got it in the neck from an unexpected source last week.

In its December 16 issue, Collier's, a weekly magazine which by no stretch of the imagination could be termed proliberal, took the AMA to task for the organization's continued opposition to Federal aid to medical education. The article was written by Albert Q. Maisel.

"There is strong public and professional support for financing an expansion program with Federal funds," the article said. "But the leaders of the American Medical Association are against the idea. So far they have blocked the passage of legislation which would make such a program possible."

Maisel said the AMA must shoulder the responsibility for the shortage of medical personnel which is constantly becoming more critical. He wrote:

"They (the AMA) are the one big obstacle in the path of congressional efforts to meet the shortage with Federal aid * * * the solution which has the backing of most medical school deans, of leading university presidents, of both Republicans and Democrats and (by a unanimous vote) of the United States Senate.

"By their action in fighting the measure to a dead stop in the House of Representatives they have made it entirely possible that wounded American soldiers in the future will receive some second- or third-rate substitute for the marvelous medical services that saved tens of thousands of lives in World War II."

The magazine declared that Federal aid to medical education is not socialized medicine. It added: "As long as the danger of general war and atomic attack against our civilian population exists, the argument that Federal aid may lead to Federal control of medical education is academic, to say the least."

The unsuccessful efforts of Representative BIEMILLER, Democrat of Wisconsin, to get the measure before the House after the Senate had passed it were told. Despite the bipartisan support of Representative SCOTT, Republican of Pennsylvania, former Republican National Committee Chairman, the measure was bottled up in the Interstate Commerce Committee.

Two efforts by BIEMILLER to have it brought to the House floor for a vote proved unavailing when the motion was defeated by a one-vote margin on both occasions.

"Finally," Maisel said, "the AMA came out openly against the bill. Early in 1950, Louis H. Bauer, M. D., chairman of the AMA board of trustees, stated that aid to medical education was now added to the long list of measures meeting AMA opposition."

Bauer said the bill "as presently drawn * * * would give the Government a foot in the door * * * for Federal control of medical education. There are certain very drastic amendments which will have to be made to that bill before we can approve it."

The AMA's friends on the House subcommittee kept working over revisions until last May.

"Despite the tendency on the part of Congress and the AMA to look the other way," the article continued, "the grave problem of medical shortages still exists and the pressure is mounting for some action to solve it."

Bernard M. Baruch was listed as one of those demanding that something be done. He is quoted as saying he is not in favor of socialized medicine (which usually means compulsory health insurance) but believes the medical profession has got to do something to meet the needs of the people. He declared the first way is to increase the output of doctors.

The Collier's article concluded with the observation that "unless immediate steps are taken to solve our chronic and growing shortages of medical, dental, nursing, and public health personnel, your health and that of your family, your neighbors, and your sons in service will be jeopardized for years to come.

"If the AMA continues its fight in the new Congress, we trust that the lawmakers will have the courage to enact the measure anyway in the interest of urgent necessity," it added.

The Senate-passed bill would provide $250,000,000 in Federal aid. Against that figure, the AMA has announced it is donating $500,000 to the Nation's 79 accredited medical schools. BIEMILLER termed the contribution a "Trojan gift" intended to obscure the "selfish motives" of the AMA.

He said the donation would bring merely "fatal indecision and inaction." Noting that AMA has been alone in its opposition to such legislation, Maisel declared: "It has claimed time and again that the financial crisis in our medical schools could be met with private aid. Yet all efforts to obtain such aid have failed. That $500,000 contribution does not change the situation in the slightest."

The Washington Post on December 11, 1950, printed the following item:

HEALTH SERVICES

There was urgent need for Federal financial aid to State and local health departments long before the threat of a major war became acute; the need is now underscored and clarified by the importance of such departments in the mobilization of civil defense. They would be the country's principal refuge in case of atomic or biological warfare attack. We believe, therefore, that the House should act on the local public health services bill, which the Senate has already passed, during the present session. The bill has been reported favorably by the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and is now in the Rules Committee.

State and local health departments are woefully inadequate. Some 40,000,000 Americans live today in areas where no local full-time public health departments exist; and it is estimated that nearly a hundred million others have only inadequately staffed departments available. The cost to the country in time lost from productive effort and in the incidence of preventable or controllable diseases is much too high. The cost in lives and human suffering in the event of widespread aerial attacks on the United States would be incalculable.

The civil defense report of the National Security Resources Board recommended that "in each State, the State health officer should be placed in charge of all civil defense health and medical services; and cities should appoint local officers in the same manner." The report pointed out also that "special measures must be taken to enable civil defense organizations to deal with the problems arising from atomic, biological, and chemical warfare. * * * The effects of these special weapons are of such a nature that defense against them becomes primarily the responsibility of the health and medical services."

But the plain fact is that in many areas there simply is no such defense at all. And it is highly possible that war production plants and other vital installations will be dispersed into just such areas, with large concentrations of war workers clustered around them. Many cities which might become bomb targets are lamentably lacking in health facilities. The problem is not one on which the country can afford to defer action.

The following articles appeared in the New York Times, Sunday, December 10, 1950:

CIVIL DEFENSE PLANS PLACED IN OPERATION IN MANY AREAS—ONLY SIX STATES HAVE COMPLETE COVERAGE, BUT OTHERS SPEED HEALTH PROGRAMS

(By Howard A. Rusk, M. D.)

Paralleling the stepped-up tempo of military and industrial mobilization, steps have now been taken to move civil defense from a stand-by basis to an actual operating program. Since its organization in 1947, the National Security Resources Board has been responsible for developing plans for our civil defense in case of national emergency.

Now, in view of the present international tension, President Truman has appointed Millard F. Caldwell, Jr., former Governor of Florida, as Civil Defense Administrator. In accordance with plans, the responsibility for civil defense will now be carried out by this new agency, as the Resources Board, is a planning and coordinating, rather than an operating agency.

Recognizing fully the all-important role of health and medical services in civil defense, the board has been preparing a comprehensive official Federal guidebook of medical and health problems fundamental to civil defense. Leading authorities in all specialized aspects of health services have assisted in preparing the manual, which is now completed and in the Government Printing Office.

As W. Stuart Symington reported to the President in September, all planning done on the health and medical aspects of civil defense is based on using State commissioners of health as directors of civil defense health services, and local health officers as directors of local civil defense health services. This plan has been accepted as a most practical and effective administrative mechanism, but unfortunately, nearly 30 percent of our citizens live in communities in which there are no full-time local health services.

COMPLETE COVERAGE IN SIX STATES

Only six States in the Nation now have complete local health services coverage in all counties. They are Maryland, Delaware, New Mexico, South Carolina, Alabama, and North Carolina, which added its final county recently.

There is almost complete coverage in California, Michigan, Florida, and Virginia. Kentucky, Louisiana, and Tennessee have organizations for nearly every county, but have many health officer vacancies.

In New York, the State Committee on Tuberculosis and Health of the State Charities Aid Association has announced a program to foster the development of county health departments next year, but at present, there is no locally operated, full-time public health service in the rural areas, and even the smaller cities in 44 of New York's 57 up-State counties.

Steps toward remedying this situation were taken last year when the Senate, with bipartisan sponsorship and wide public support, unanimously adopted a bill authorizing Federal grants-in-aid specifically for local public-health departments. The act provides Federal funds for at least six minimum functions of a local health department: Vital statistics, communicable disease control, maternity and child hygiene services, environmental sanitation, public health laboratory services, and public health education. Significantly, now there is the extra bonus in that it will provide the keystone for local civil-defense planning for health services.

ACTION HELD UP BY WAR

Endorsed enthusiastically by 60 such groups as the National Congress of Parents and Teachers, American Medical Association, the National Grange, and the General Federation of Women's Clubs, an almost identical bill was passed by the House of Representatives during the Eightieth Congress. This year, when the bill reached the House, the Korean war had broken out and it was shelved because of what were considered more pressing matters.

Events of the last few weeks, however, have shown clearly the need for all-out action in planning our civil defense, and that local public-health services will be the foundation for the medical, hospitalization, and health aspects of civil defense.

As Dr. William P. Shepard, president of the American Public Health Association, said recently, "Public health services are the administrative backbone of civil defense. The immediate development of such services is not only requisite to the safeguarding of the health of the Nation in normal peacetime, but is given even greater urgency by the current demands for the establishment of adequate civilian defense against possible acts of aggression, including atomic, biological, chemical, and other devices of warfare directly affecting the civilian population."

That there is urgent necessity for immediate action by the House of Representatives is clear. One-third of the Nation is without the administrative organization for providing even normal local health services, let alone those necessary for civil defense. The provision of those services is as essential to our civil defense as weapons are to our fighting men.

ANOTHER DEFENSE BILL

Following the appointment last week of a new Civil Defense Administrator, the National Security Resources Board presented Congress with a $3,100,000,000 plan for civil defense. Listed by the President as a must for the present short session, prompt action will undoubtedly be taken on this measure.

As Dr. Howard A. Rusk points out elsewhere in this newspaper today, there is another bill currently in the House Rules Committee which is equally a must if we are to make full plans for medical and health services in civil defense. This is H. R. 5865, for Federal aid to establish local public health services. Its immediate passage is essential, for civil defense plans call for the administration of medical and health civil defense services by State and local public health officers. Added to the usual essential health services, there is need for special measures to enable civil defense organizations to deal with the problems arising from possible atomic, biological, and chemical warfare. These problems are primarily the responsibility of health and medical services, but today 40,000,000 of our citizens live in communities where there are no local full-time health services.

H. R. 5865 would help remedy this by giving Federal grants-in-aid for the development of local health services. Prior to the Korean war this bill was unanimously passed by the Senate on the basis of its peacetime merits. Today the bill takes on a new significance if we are to be prepared to meet all the possible eventualities in civil defense.

"Me Too" Dewey Now Military Expert

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL W. SHAFER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 19, 1950

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, since the disclosure of the military debacle in Korea, the airways have been loaded with gratuitous advice on national defense policy, largely from the mouths of men whose judgment is limited by lack of information and any real understanding.

I refer particularly to the radio speech delivered a few nights ago by Gov. Thomas E. Dewey, of New York, on the occasion of a bar association meeting in the Nation's metropolis.

While I would be the last to deny Mr. Dewey's sincerity and his belief that he is well qualified to answer every question and solve every problem now afflicting the military leaders of this country, I cannot help wondering where he acquired his wisdom and his expertness on military affairs.

Thomas E. Dewey is not a soldier, and he never served in the Armed Forces of the United States in any way that would qualify him to hold any opinion that necessarily is sound on those matters which are peculiarly the province of the professional soldier.

As a member of the House Armed Services Committee, who has tried earnestly to understand and properly to evaluate the military information supplied the committee by the Army, Navy, and Air Force chiefs, it appears to me that Governor Dewey came out with a series of national defense proposals, manifestly absurd by reason of their unreality, with respect to the international situation and to the possible means by which we can combat the deadly peril which confronts the American people.

This purely political and quite ill-advised radio speech, I believe, was inspired by Governor Dewey's itch to get back into the national political arena; his desire once more to serve as Republican standard-bearer in the 1952 presidential election.

Furthermore, this speech, I am reliably informed, was written for Governor Dewey by no other than John Franklin Carter, who uses the pen name of Jay Franklin. It is well known to those of us, who took the trouble to find out, that Carter long served as a New Deal camp follower and a White House smear-pot during the Roosevelt administrations. He wrote many speeches for Roosevelt, and later on he wrote speeches for Harry S. Truman. Now he turns up in the employ of Gov. Thomas E. Dewey.

Small wonder, then, that Dewey's radio speech lacked the realism and common sense even of some of the wilder pronouncements emanating recently from the White House. Dewey's speech revealed him finally and completely as a captive of the New Deal and the self-styled Fair Deal. It was me-too-ism reduced to the ultimate degree of absurdity. Every real Republican should be able to understand now, why it was that the last two Republican national conventions were controlled, secretly and behind the scenes, by Democrats, Wall Street, international bankers, and fellow travelers.

Governor Dewey proposed, as the opening gun in his 1952 nomination campaign, that 100 Army divisions, presumably numbering 12,600,000 men, should be mobilized at once. He proposed that universal military training should be put into effect immediately.

Now as a humble student of military affairs, I should like to ask Governor Dewey how he would provide for the upkeep and training of such a force on short notice. Has he forgotten, or does he not know, that today in American training camps, thousands of drafted men lack uniforms, and are waiting for the guns, tanks, airplanes, and all the other tools of war, which they should now be learning to use? What little we had was sent to Korea. And all this, in spite of the fact that Congress, in the last 5 years, has appropriated $50,000,000,000 for maintenance and expansion of our armed services.

Does Governor Dewey fail to understand that war production—the manufacture of arms and munitions—is our first need? The men to wield those weapons can be called and trained quickly enough, when the weapons have been produced. Why in God's name should we take millions of young men away from production, and sequester them in training camps, where they could do nothing but sit and wait? And why should we take other millions of boys away from school, and put them in training camps, all to the same purpose?

It strikes me that Governor Dewey would do well to keep silent on things concerning which he so evidently knows little. He would do well to let the military decisions be made by those men who have spent their lives as professional soldiers, and whose ability has won for them places of responsibility in the high command. If anybody knows what should be done in this desperate emergency, those men should know. Their word should be taken, and nobody—nobody at all—should presume to make political capital out of the Nation's need.

That Governor Dewey for long has been, and is now, a captive of the New Deal, the Wall Street internationalists, and the left-wing ideologists, is explicit in his record.

He first came to political prominence as a New York prosecutor. Nobody denies that he did a good job. It made him the idol of the millions in his adopted State. Therefore, it was only natural that they should make him governor. In Albany he continues to build up an outstanding record as an administrator. But his ideology always has been, and still remains, that of his Wall Street New Deal internationalist masters. He is the Charlie McCarthy of that group which recognizes no loyalty, except to its own political and financial interests, which are not confined to the shores of America.

It will be recalled that in the 1944 Presidential campaign, when Dewey first became Republican standard bearer, he subscribed almost entirely to the Rooseveltian New Deal program. He let himself be cajoled, on the fanciful pretext of preserving national security, into keeping his mouth shut on the issues created by Roosevelt's disastrous blunders, with respect to the conduct of the war, and the secret commitments which paved the way for the war now in progress.

It will be recalled, too, that in 1948 Dewey again refused to discuss the real issues of the campaign. He resorted to a campaign policy, which failed to point out the postwar blunders, at home and abroad, and the manifest corruption, if not actual treason, in some segments of the Truman administration. He lost the election by default.

Now he wants to try it again. And you may be sure that every inch of him—including the 2 inches he has added by wearing elevator shoes—belongs to the New Deal. Dewey is running for President again. Make no mistake about that. His New Deal internationalist masters want him to make a third try for the Presidency, that the present gang may continue in power.

If the Republican Party fails to keep its collective eye open, and fails to squelch this new manifestation of me-too-Deweyism, we are going to have him on our necks again and again and again.

If anyone doubts Dewey's ambition and his New Deal ideology, let them recall the Lincoln Day dinner speech he delivered less than 3 months after his defeat in 1948. The Governor of New York came to Washington, and in a long and windy address, berated his fellow Republicans for refusing to subscribe to his own me-too-ism. He said then, in effect, that this refusal caused his defeat. The answer to that, of course, can be found in the results of the 1950 congressional elections.

The English on Dean Acheson

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to insert an excerpt from the Economist, one of the most highly esteemed journals of the English-speaking world, and one which has always sought to strengthen Anglo-American relations. The following paragraph appeared in the November 18, 1950, issue:

But the methods of campaigning pursued by the Republicans this year—actively pursued only by a minority but silently acquiesced in and turned to account by virtually the whole party—have cast upon every Republican gain in this year's election a light that, in European eyes, is inevitably sinister. For months the Republicans have been conducting against the Secretary of State, Mr. Dean Acheson, a campaign that, from this distance, has seemed to be as scurrilous as it has been irresponsible. Mr. Acheson is regarded in the outside world not merely as a good Secretary of State, but as one of the best that the United States has had in modern times—and this not because he has shown any undue partiality to his country's allies, but because, together with his predecessor and former chief, General Marshall, he has given to American policy a consistency of purpose and an intellectual foundation which have brought new hope to the free world. It may be that distance makes it impossible to see his defects of bearing when under congressional inquiry, but distance also makes it impossible to see why such superficial niceties should weigh for anything in the balance against the world stature of a real statesman. Do not the Republicans see, in hurling their charges of incompetence and misfeasance, on grounds that carry utterly no conviction abroad, that they are undermining the very foundations of that confidence in the consistency and trustworthiness of American policy on which rests the hope of defeating comunism without war? That such a campaign, not merely of dragging foreign policy into party politics but of spattering it with mud, should be tolerated by the leaders of a great party, must seem to many of America's most affectionate friends to be bad enough. But that it should be rewarded by the electors is found by many of them to be downright alarming.

National Sojourners Oppose World Governments

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, a great patriotic organization, the National Sojourners, are engaged in a crusade against the campaign to impose world government upon the people of the United States. As part of my remarks, I am including an article by Col. Albert G. Hulett in opposition to that movement:

WHY WE SHOULD OPPOSE WORLD GOVERNMENTS

(By Col. Albert G. Hulett)

United World Federalists, and its kindred groups are currently appealing to the emotions of our citizens, our business and professional men, the members of State and National legislatures, Government employees, organized labor, churches, civic groups and veterans' organizations, using the alluring bait that "here and now" is eternal peace, security, prosperity, and a future Utopia for all. Recently the writer listened to one of these UWF spellbinders addressing a Rotary Club, and was astounded to hear him declare that UWF did not advocate the demise of national governments except as to their right to declare and wage war, and that the proposed world government would not, in fact, in any way alter your everyday life and mine.

Could anything more deceptive and untruthful be imagined by anyone who has read the pronouncements of UWF and Union Now? Hypnosis and autohypnosis (self-hypnoses) are realities, as every physician and psychologist knows. It is wholly possible to induce autohypnotism of whole populations—as has been revealed so clearly in Nazi Germany, Fascist Italy, Falangist Spain, and Napoleonic France. It appears possible that some adroit psychologist has now assumed direction of UWF propaganda with this objective in mind. The oft and clearly stated features of the proposed world government, as advocated by UWF, have been broadcast in their own official publications and in countless editorial commentaries in the daily press of this country. And these have not been retracted, despite this speaker's avoidance of them. It would be useful that we study how these proposals will inescapably affect the individual security, freedom, initiative, welfare and happiness of each of us. So let us start with individual rights and prerogatives.

The present unprecedented success of the United States and of its citizens has stemmed from our Constitution and its Bill of Rights. Upon our joining the world government, that Constitution will no longer operate, and whatever our individual status may be will be determined by the imposts of that world government, by majority vote of its parliament in which our representation will be—upon a population basis—a trivial minority. So we shall be regimented for the benefit of the majority, and any attempt to retain more prosperity or liberty than obtained elsewhere in the world will be ruthlessly suppressed. We may incline to the declaration, "We would resist such injustice." Now, would we, and how? Let us remember that all military forces are to be done away with, except a single world force serving that single government.

Next, let us consider that world armed force. Equipped with it, the proposed world government would be in actuality a military despotism wherein its edicts and demands upon the peoples of the world would be accomplished by the threat, or actual use, of that armed force. Yes, we would have world peace but it would be the sort of peace experienced by the people of Israel during their long years of captivity. Do we want that sort of peace? Again, since the United States is the richest Nation in the world and possessed of the greatest manufacturing and industrial potentials, who but the United States would equip and maintain that world army? As indicative thereof, just note who produced the war material for the allied nations in World War II, and who is (gratuitously) providing the armament for Western Europe today. Hence, a large part of our industry would be diverted to military purposes, and do you doubt for a moment that such would vastly cripple our commercial progress and warp our way of life? What is the intent of our founders, or is it yours and mine, that the proper destiny of the United States is to be the arsenal of a world despotism?

Again, let us consider economic trends of the past two decades and envision what remedy UWF would proffer. In this period we have watched the skyrocketing of taxes and of the living-cost index, the decline of purchasing power of money, the confiscation of estates and inheritances through special gift, inheritance and capital-gains levies, and the downward move of investment income to the point where trusts, annuities, pensions, life insurances and savings funds, are seriously embarrassed and their annual earnings and dividends greatly reduced. These things are ominous and we worry over them and yearn to find a way out. So we are vulnerable to a proposal for a complete change of scene—any change. What solution does this world government proffer? Let us see what is proposed:

"All national and international debts shall be cancelled and title thereto shall revert to the world government which shall also take possession of whatever gold, silver, currency, and natural resources may exist in any country at the time of joining; also, it shall have direct taxing power upon individuals anywhere and also the right of entry, and inspection, anywhere, and to punish violators of its laws and decrees."

Now, with such program completed, we shall be able to cease worrying about our life insurance, annuities and pension plans, our bonds and cash reserves, all of which constitute our present guaranty of future benefits; neither need we be concerned over social security, old-age pensions, unemployment insurance, retirement plans in industry or even about retirement pay for the Armed Forces or for other governmental services, nor need national or State taxes concern us. And why? Because, after the wholesale confiscations prescribed for this world government, these equitable and hard-won provisions for our safety will no longer exist. And—in passing—may I insist that these messianic UWF planners do not even exhibit the finesse of stipulating that we should be rebated the sums we will already have paid into these projects, nor that such sums be credited to us against future world government taxes to be imposed. Do you and I favor such a pattern of future dependency, penury, and misery for ourselves and our loved ones? If so, then go out and work for UWF now.

Furthermore, if we are soon to scrap our Army, Navy, and Air Force, why then spend another nickel upon them—and thus deplete the hoard this world government is to acquire? Does it make sense to advocate billions of military expenditure in one breath and then, in the next, propose that this armament be scrapped? And why send billions in material to Western Europe for scrapping there? Yet certain high-ranking officials in our National Government, and certain Members of both Houses of the Congress—amongst whose duties are the pursuit of these military plans and projects—are members of UWF and, upon being questioned, have declared that they couldn't see where their two allegiances conflicted. We elected many of them, and—unless we ponder well—we'll be doing it again.

Unless the world and its people plan to live upon a socialistic, communistic system of rationing of everything, wherein the individual is but a pauper and pawn of the state, we must have a stable and sufficient currency or medium of exchange, so the citizens may maintain themselves, and provide for future contingencies. But, if all national and private wealth, all securities, and all resources are to be taken away from us, and national wealth and financial resources as well, wherewith shall such necessity be had? Ah, yes. But that UWF spellbinder declared that their proposals "would not in any way alter your daily life."

And, in the fool's paradise of UWF, how can you or I, or anyone, engage in any private enterprise? And how finance it, make profit by it, or maintain it? Any such venture would have to be underwritten by world government, since it would alone have the credit facility. And do you imagine for a moment such government would reach down to you or me and aid us in this manner? Just note what is happening in the militaristic states of Russia, Hungary, Rumania, Czechoslovakia, and Poland, in re private enterprise. Is such not a warning?

Another clear but (I believe) purposely glossed-over feature of this world state is its requirement that "all class, racial and religious divisions and discriminations shall be abolished." (If this is not Marxian, what is it? Yet that recent speaker firmly avowed that those in UWF are not Communists, Socialists, or Fabians.) If that program be enacted, then the world government will control religions and inevitably suppress them, and likewise will terminate all fraternal orders, secret societies, trades-unions, business organizations, civic and patriotic societies, as being "enemies of the state." Do we want such oppressions?

One has often heard the adage which declares: "Give a boy a putty-blower and he will use it—perhaps first to knock off your own hat." Would it be otherwise did we give to this world government such over-all powers AND the force with which to employ them? Except in these United States, wherein our unique Constitution and the compulsion of public opinion through the ballot prevents, has there ever been any country possessed of a large military force wherein control of that force has not been usurped by those who used it to despotically control and exploit its people? And, in many such instances, there have been supposedly effective laws in existence which promised to prevent such happening—just as promising as the regulations UWF is now advocating to make this World Government Army immune to cabalistic capture. Can we—if mentally adult—imagine that ANY such measures would prevent such catastrophe? And, do we hold in mind the fact that, did such occur, there would be no other military force in the world to rescue us from it?

The greatest fault and weakness of United States citizens is their idealism and their yearning for peace and good-will. If such ideals be appealed to and their fulfillment promised, they will readily fall for ANY such project, no matter how fantastic or dangerous. In such ecstatic emotional state, our citizens fail to analyze and inquire ere they give support to such schemes. Time and again in the past we have committed just such errors. Happily, in each such instance we have possessed the means and wisdom to correct our mistake. In this present matter we shall not have that opportunity, because another of the specifications of UWF is that: "Nations may elect whether to join this world government but they shall not have the right to secede therefrom, after joining." Hence, should we enter and then discover that my analysis be correct and that we have erred therein, that world armed force would be sent to keep us in subjection and in membership. Do we want to invite such calamity? But, that spellbinder declared that national governments would not be changed except as to declaring and waging war. Was he truthful?

So, let us assemble the facts and think well upon them. Let us relate these truths to as many of our citizens as possible and speedily. Let us dare UWF, and their fellow travelers, to now maintain that they have not advocated these horrible propositions to the American people, and in the printed page; or to prove to us and to all that any world government, based upon such provisions, would be the answer for humanity, or would be better than these United States.

Let us expose these two-faced proposals for what they truly are, and thus enlighten the well meaning but duped citizens of position and wealth who to date have been supporting this proposal. Then, and only then, will our citizens, our legislatures, our Congress, and our civic leaders identify this scheme for what it really is, "a plan for the extinction of the United States in favor of a world despotism in a manner like that whereby Czechoslovakia was lured behind the iron curtain."

Armed conquest of these United States would be costly and uncertain; its disintegration by subversive and economic infiltrations would require years and involve world confusions; however, the quick and voluntary surrender by this Government of its sovereignty with its resources and potentials intact, is something worth scheming for—if the plotter be un-American!

Even the Greek gods on Mount Olympus fell short of so grandiose a plot. Yet it can happen here, unless you and I prevent.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS E. GRAHAM

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 19, 1950

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, when the Eighty-second Congress convenes on January 3, 1951, two familiar features will be missing. One is the friendly smile of the Honorable ROBERT FLEMING RICH and the other his oft repeated question: "Where are you going to get the money?"

For almost 20 years "BOB" RICH, as he is affectionately known to all the Members, has arisen on the floor of this House and raised his voice against extravagance in Government and the need for Federal retrenchment. His words have reechoed throughout the Nation.

Primarily a businessman, he has looked upon the operations of this Government from the viewpoint of successful business.

His criticisms have been sharp and severe. Thrift, saving, and retrenchment have been his guiding lights.

Now, he is about to leave us, and many and deep will be the regrets in his passing. His friends are innumerable, and whether or not one agreed with his business and political philosophy, all who knew him admired and respected him for his honesty, courage, and candor. Warm-hearted, impulsive, and generous to a fault, he will leave a large void in this House.

He retires to devote his entire time to the management of his successful business enterprises.

We, of the Pennsylvania Republican delegation, will miss him greatly. He was a friend to each of us, always willing and anxious to help, kind, generous, and thoughtful and we wish for him every success and happiness in the remaining days of his useful and helpful life.

Requirements for Labeling Bread

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERBERT H. LEHMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, December 20 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD, a portion of the recent testimony of Mr. Jerry Voorhis, of the Cooperative League of the United States, before a special House committee. This testimony deals with proposed requirements for labeling bread. This is of special interest to people of my State because of the fact, brought out in this testimony, that full labeling might result in the use of more dried milk in the baking of bread. This result would be good for the consumers of bread and also for the dairy industry in this country. I am not enough of an expert to comment on all the aspects of Mr. Voorhis' testimony, but I think it is worthy of attention by the Congress.

There being no objection the testimony was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

Products carrying the cooperative trademark are fully labeled, not just to meet the requirements of the law, but to meet the considerably more stringent requirements of the cooperators for whom the store serves as a purchasing agent, just as any large manufacturing business employs a purchasing agent. Cooperators and noncooperators who patronize cooperative stores are enabled to buy on specifications, written for the protection of the buyer, to give him a practical measure of what his money is buying. This, of course, is the universal practice insisted upon by all buyers of producer's goods. We cooperators believe that the same practice should be extended to buyers of consumers goods and that the law should further, not obstruct, the education and the protection of the consumer at the point of purchase.

Cooperatives supply more than 350 different products under their own open-formula label. The co-op store managers vouch for the popularity of informative labeling.

When this background of cooperative policy and practice is understood it becomes obvious that the Cooperative League and its members and affiliates are bound to support the proposal which is being considered at these hearings. That proposal as I understand it, is to amend the present food and drug law to enable its administrators to determine and certify, in advance of their adoption by the manufacturer, the harmlessness to human health of chemicals used in the manufacture or processing of food, insecticides, and fertilizers.

I mentioned fertilizer. Until little more than 15 years ago fertilizer manufacturers put everything in the bag, including just plain dirt. Farmers had no idea what they were putting into their soil to produce better crop yields. When they began to form their own cooperatives, they demanded better quality. Thus to prove to the skeptics, they used open-formula labels. Co-ops were the first to list the analysis on the fertilizer bag. They have applied the same principle to feed and seed. Today practically every company in the business lists the ingredients on the tag. It seems ironical that consumers know exactly what they mix into their soil, feed to their livestock and poultry, but are denied the right—except through cooperative efforts—to know what is contained in the food they purchase for their families. The committee will undoubtedly be interested in seeing some of these labels to note the simple, effective use of the open-formula labels.

Not only should the consumer be given the maximum protection of the law and its administration—he should also be equipped and educated to protect himself. Precisely that is the purpose and effect of the open-formula labeling which the cooperatives practice, and which we believe should be made mandatory on all producers and distributors of foods, insecticides and fertilizers.

With all due respect to the Food and Drug Administration—and I have the highest respect for the integrity and competence of its administrative and technical staff—history has shown that it is not possible to determine beyond any possible doubt the harmlessness of a given chemical. I have only to cite the example of agene or nitrogen trichloride, the chemical which was used for 30 years to bleach and condition flour until the summer of 1949 its further use was prohibited by the Food and Drug Administration.

We cooperators believe that the consumer should be told, and we tell him. Our Co-op Triple Rich white bread is made with unbleached flour, 2 percent wheat germ, 8 percent milk solids, and 6 percent high-protein soy flour, and the wrapper so states in plain lettering. And because it illustrates clearly both the position of the League with respect to the problem before this committee and the present defects of the law as we see it, I ask your permission to sketch briefly the history and purpose of its development.

Triple Rich, frankly, was not our idea. It was the idea of Dr. Clive McCay, professor of animal nutrition at Cornell University, and formerly chief nutritionist for the Navy, who has testfied before this committee. Its purpose, as Dr. McCay saw it, and as we saw it when Dr. McCay, himself a good cooperator, secured the help of the Ithaca Cooperative in introducing it to American consumers, was to improve both the nutritional value and the consumer acceptance of the white bread that constitutes approximately 95 percent of the bread consumption of the American people. Neither he nor we set out to make money by producing and selling another expensive tea bread, bought only by the minority of middle class and upper middle class people who can afford it. These people aren't dependent on bread for their vitamins and minerals, but poor people are, especially poor children and poor old people, for whom white bread is really the staff of life.

Dr. McCay proved in his laboratory that rats could live and grow on a diet of Triple Rich bread alone, whereas they pined and died when they were fed ordinary white bread, whether it was enriched or not.

In its March 1950 issue, Harper's magazine printed an article about Triple Rich entitled "Bread, and the Stuff We Eat," by James Rorty. The article drew the largest mail response received by any Harper's article for many years. When the letters were read it was pretty clear that American consumers' concept of what white bread ought to be was considerably different from the kind of bread they were getting.

As a result of this correspondence, hospitals and school lunch departments all over the country began adopting Triple Rich. Commercial bakers became interested—scores of them, including some very big ones. Eight large baking companies are now producing Triple Rich for the New York City schools and for a growing market among public and private hospitals and other institutions. One of these companies, the makers of Bond Bread, is about to introduce Triple Rich to the general consumer market in the New York area, and I am told that when it goes on sale it will be fully labeled like our Co-op Triple Rich with the quantities of the ingredients it contains. Triple Rich is already being sold, fully labeled, at 15 cents a loaf—12 cents on sale days—by the Mohican Stores, Inc., a large eastern chain store organization.

It sounds as if Dr. McCay were well on his way toward accomplishing his objective, which, again, was to improve the nutritional value and the consumer acceptability of the staff of life. There can be no question that both improvements were needed. With respect to just one ingredient—milk solids—the Bureau of Agricultural Research has reported that white bread averages only 1½ percent whereas the National Research Council urges at least 6 percent, and Triple Rich contains 8 percent.

The more milk solids the better the bread. The Bureau of Dairy Industry says so, the Bureau of Human Nutrition and Home Economics of the Agricultural Research Administration says so. Even the bakers say so, but they're not saying how much milk solids their products contain, and the Food and Drug Administration doesn't require them to. Until it does, it is obvious that the consumer is buying blind and is frequently cheated. And when the consumer is prevented from buying as white bread a product that does tell him how much milk solids and other nutritious ingredients it contains, I submit that the law is being perversely utilized not to protect the consumer but to his detriment.

The consumption curve on flour and bread has been going down for decades. The farmer, the miller, the baker, all need badly a staff of life that people will eat more of, as they eat more of Triple Rich.

Presumably the Food and Drug Administration is in sympathy with Dr. McCay's objective and would like to further it. Yet today, the Food and Drug's projected white-bread standards stand squarely across the path of progress that Dr. McCay has charted, and that both the co-ops and progressive baking companies and chain stores are trying to follow.

The Food and Drug Administration says Triple Rich isn't white bread, despite the testimony of a half-million American families that are buying it as white bread, liking it, and coming back for more. If the projected standards are permitted to go into effect, it will not be legal to distribute Triple Rich in interstate commerce as white bread or enriched white bread. It is too good. It contains 8 percent milk solids, 2 percent wheat germ, and 6 percent soy flour, whereas Food and Drug Administration says the top limits are 3 percent soy and 1½ percent for wheat germ.

Triple Rich can be sold outside the white bread and enriched bread standards, says the Food and Drug Administration, if it is properly labeled, as one of the numerous overpriced "specialty" breads that make up the 5 percent of American bread consumption outside the standard white loaf. That solution, of course, would completely defeat Dr. McCay's objective, which is the co-op objective, to improve the nutritional value and the consumer acceptance of the staff of life generally in the whole trade. The Cooperative League rejects that solution. We don't want the impact of a really nutritious bread to be limited to a small field of competition.

Eight national organizations with over 20,000,000 members have joined in protesting against the artificial ceilings on the quantity of nutritious elements which can go into a loaf of bread, white bread, or enriched bread. The organizations which have protested to the Federal Security Agency and the Food and Drug Administration are the American Federation of Labor, the Congress of Industrial Organizations, the International Association of Machinists, United Automobile Workers, National Farmers Union, National Grange, National Association of Consumers, and the Cooperative League.

We are hopeful that the Food and Drug Administration will change its mind, remove its irrational ceilings on honest food ingredients, and permit Triple Rich which half-a-million people are already buying and eating as white bread, to be sold as white bread in interstate commerce. The Food and Drug Administration, to put it mildly, has far more important responsibilities in protecting the public than the setting of maximum standards of quality.

The important point I want to emphasize here is that, regardless of a Government agency's conception of what a consumer expects of a food item, by and large the consumer detests the use of chemicals in foods as substitutes for nutritious, wholesome, natural ingredients which improve flavor and quality. The consumer has little to gain in purchasing a product containing questionable ersatzes if his life is to be endangered or he will suffer ill effects. It may well be that many of our common illnesses today are caused by the things we eat or fail to eat.

Another important point is that, through the use of hundreds of chemicals and other substitutes, farm commodity surpluses are piling up. Lard, wheat, eggs, and dried milk have been purchased by the Government in large quantities to keep farm income up where it belongs. I am informed that if bakers would increase the use of one item alone—dried milk—to 6 percent in bread, there would soon be no surplus. True, if bakers would use more of the other commodities, instead of chemical mixtures, both farmers and Government would benefit—but the consumer would stand to gain most because of the added wholesomeness in bakery goods.

The position of the Cooperative League is first that the administration of the law in the instance cited is against the public interest. Second, that the law should be amended to require the full quantitative labeling of bread and other food products.

I have discussed the question of bread in detail because this example serves to clarify the general principles involved with respect to the problems of controlling the use of chemicals in food products and in fostering their improvement in the interest of the consumer. The same principles in modified form are encountered in the closely related fields of insecticides and fertilizers.

Returns From Postwar Ship Chartering Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. WILLIAM A. BARRETT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 20, 1950

Mr. BARRETT of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the Federal Maritime Board will shortly break out 25, and perhaps eventually as many as 50, vessels from the reserve fleet for bareboat charter to American citizens to meet the new demands for large scale movement of coal and grain to ECA nations. On Monday of this week, the ECA Director of Transportation testified before the Board concerning the extreme shortage of tonnage and the inability of the privately owned fleet to move the necessary cargoes in time. Moreover, there is now pending an application for a long-term charter of tonnage for the intercoastal trade. I wish to call to the attention of the House the magnitude of the financial return to the United States Treasury from the postwar ship chartering programs, a return unmatched by lease or sale of any other war surplus material.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I would like to include the following:

MEMORANDUM ON THE FINANCIAL RETURN TO THE UNITED STATES TREASURY FROM THE POSTWAR SHIP-CHARTERING PROGRAM

The financial return to the United States from the postwar ship-chartering program constitutes an unparalleled recovery of funds expended in a war effort.

Charter hire accruals (unaudited) for the WSA interim bare-boat-chartering program and for the chartering programs of the Maritime Commission and the Maritime Administration from July 1, 1945 through June 30, 1950, are as follows:

Basic charter hire accruals	$357,736,909.66
Additional charter-hire accruals	72,060,191.14
Total accruals	429,797,100.80

An indeterminate but very large proportion of the accrued basic charter hire and all of the additional charter hire was derived from United States citizen charterers who chartered approximately 33,700 ship-months.

In addition, charter to aliens, of which the British program comprised a high proportion, consumed an uncertain amount, but, at the outside, no more than 8,000 ship-months. More than 80 percent of the total ship-months consumed in the chartering programs by citizens and aliens was with Liberty ships. Much of the remainder was with Victory ships.

If the useful life of a vessel is taken to be 20 years, roughly 175 vessels were expended in the ship-chartering programs through June 30, 1950, for which nearly $430,000,000 were paid. Thus over $2,450,000 was collected in charter hire for each ship-life consumed in the program. This return is nearly four times the $639,000 statutory sales price of the Liberty ship, nearly 2½ times the $1,050,000 statutory sales price of the C2, and nearly 50 percent greater than the $1,650,000 statutory sales price of the C4.

The extent of the financial recovery from the ship-chartering programs may be better appreciated by a comparison with the return from the postwar ship sales program.

Through September 30, 1950, accrued ship sales receipts are:

695 vessels sold to United States citizens	$704,204,672.92
1,113 vessels sold to aliens	919,178,601.25
Total receipts for 1,808 vessels	1,623,383,274.17

The average return per vessel from the ship-sales program was $898,000, only 37 percent of the return per vessel-life consumed in the ship-chartering programs.

The 695 vessels sold to United States citizens brought only twice as much return to the United States as the 140 odd ship-lives consumed by United States charterers, despite the fact that 192 of the vessels sold were large, fast, modern tankers and most of the remainder were C-type vessels.

The $2,450,000 received per ship-life consumed in the chartering programs represents more than 150 percent of the average war cost of a Liberty ship and nearly 100 percent of the average war cost of an AP2 Victory ship.

Contrasted with the average rate of return of 27.3 percent of acquisition cost secured under the Surplus Property Act, the rate of recovery from the ship-chartering programs is nothing short of phenomenal.

THE REAL CHARTER RATES

The basic charter hire rate for vessels in the offshore trades (and if earned for the coastwise and intercoastal trades as well) is fixed at 15 percent per annum of either the unadjusted statutory sales price or the floor price of the vessel as determined under the Merchant Ship Sales Act of 1946, whichever is higher.

Because the unadjusted statutory sales price is higher than the floor price for all types of vessels with the exception of the C3, N3, and C1–M–AV1, charter rates in general exceed 15 percent per annum of the floor prices which are the prices at which many of the vessels were sold.

The basic charter hire rate for a C4 vessel is equivalent to 16 percent of the floor price of the vessel. For the AP2 Victory ship, it is equal to 16.7 percent. For the Liberty ship, the charter rate is 17.6 percent per annum of the floor price. (See table below.)

Additional charter hire is payable by American charterers if, after payment of basic charter hire and fair and reasonable overhead, cumulative net voyage profit exceeds 10 percent of the capital necessarily employed at the rate of 50 percent on the first $100-per-day profit, 75 percent on the next $200, and 90 percent on all above $300 per day.

Accrued additional charter hire between July 1, 1945 and July 1, 1950 totals $72,000,000. This entire sum was paid by United States citizen charterers as no additional charter hire was assessed against alien charterers regardless of the profits made. In fact, preferential basic charter hire rates were given and are being given today on vessels chartered to foreign nationals. The rate applicable to vessels chartered to Philippine Nationals at the present time approximates only 10 percent of the floor price of the vessels.

It is impossible to separate out from the grand receipts of over $357,000,000 in accrued basic charter hire, the portion which is attributable to foreign charters. We do know, however, that over $50,000,000 was derived from charters under the Land-Leathers Agreement with Great Britain.

Thus, at a minimum, United States citizen charterers, on the average, paid a surcharge equal to 23 percent of the basic charter hire rate. (This percentage is derived by dividing the $72,000,000 in additional charter hire paid by United States citizen charterers by $307,000,000 which represents the highest possible amount in basic charter hire paid by American operators.)

There are vessels on charter today, as for instance the Dartmouth Victory, which have been on charter continuously since July 3, 1946. Now rounding out 4½ years of charter service, such vessels have returned to the United States nearly 75 percent of the floor price in basic charter hire, and, on the average, over 17 percent of the floor price in additional charter hire. Thus the United States Treasury has been the recipient of nearly the full floor price, additional charter hire is still being collected, and the Government retains full title to the vessel.

CHARTERING POLICIES OF FOREIGN NATIONS

In Great Britain, Government-owned or controlled vessels are chartered on the open market on the basis of sealed bids. The British Ministry of Transport has established a policy of not entertaining bids which do not assure the Government of a 10 percent return on the value of the vessel at the time of chartering.

The terms and conditions of the British Government charters are those of the ordinary commercial contract and there is no sharing of profit as in the United States.

The Dutch Government is chartering Government-owned Liberty vessels at the rate of 2 florens per deadweight ton per month when the survey is for the charterer's account and 2½ florens when it is not. At the official rate of exchange of 3,805 florens to the dollar, Dutch charterers are paying $5,400 and $7,100 per month respectively for Liberty vessels. American charterers are paying just under $8,000 per month exclusive of additional charter hire and the survey is for the Government's account on delivery and for the charterer's account on redelivery.

Statutory sales and floor prices, basic charter-hire rates, and rates of return on floor prices from chartering, by type of vessel

Type	Statutory sales price (unadjusted)	Floor price	Monthly basic charter rate	Annual rate of return on floor price
				Percent
Ec2-S-C1	$639,000	$544,506	$7,987.50	17.6
C1-A, C1-B	970,000	912,859	12,125.00	15.9
C2 (cargo)	1,050,000	957,818	13,125.00	16.4
C3	1,230,000	1,280,730	16,009.13	15.0
C4	1,650,000	1,547,338	20,625.00	16.0
VC2-S-AP2	979,000	879,157	12,237.50	16.7
VC2-S-AP3	1,095,000	1,005,431	13,312.50	15.9
N3	380,000	468,817	5,860.21	15.0
N3-M-AV1	393,000	484,726	6,059.07	15.0
C1-M-AV1	640,000	693,862	8,673.28	15.0
R1-M-AV3	875,000	857,285	10,937.50	15.3
R2-S-BV1	1,720,000	1,562,749	21,500.00	16.5
C2-S (reefer)	1,725,000	1,553,093	21,562.50	16.7

NOTE.—Additional charter hire is payable (after payment of basic charter hire and the payment of the charterer's fair and reasonable overhead) in the event the voyage profits exceed 10 percent of the capital necessarily employed under the following rates: Cumulative net voyage profit in excess of $100 per day—50 percent; cumulative net voyage profit in excess of $100, but not in excess of $300 per day—75 percent of such excess over $100 per day; cumulative net voyage profit in excess of $300 per day—90 percent of such excess over $300 per day.

Veterans' Insurance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAMILTON C. JONES
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 18, 1950

Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I wish to comment upon H. R. 9911. This bill is one of the most important bills of its kind coming before the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, since I have been a member of the committee. The question of insurance has been an enigma before the committee for some time. We have all been impressed with the fact that the program for insurance of GI's has been costing more than it should without recurring benefit to the veterans or the Government. Furthermore, we have been impressed with the fact that many GI's have not been protected by death insurance. Some because of carelessness, but most of them because of the cost of insurance added to many other expenses made it financially impossible for them to carry it.

So, when H. R. 9911 reached the committee, it seemed to solve the problem that has been constantly and continuously bothering us for some time and was referred to the subcommittee headed by Representative J. E. NOLAND, of Indiana, which immediatly went to work on the bill. The committee worked very diligently and ably on the bill, holding a number of hearings in order to get the bill in good shape and I want to commend this committee and especially its chairman for the fine job it did in producing what I believe is a satisfactory bill to all concerned.

The subcommittee reported the bill back to the full committee and after careful and thorough discussion the Committee of the Whole reported the bill to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

It provides in substance that on and after June 27, 1950, each person in the Armed Forces is insured against death in the amount of $10,000 without any cost to the person. This protection covers the period from induction into service and 90 days after separation from service. If it develops that the person is injured in service to such an extent as to make him uninsurable at normal commercial rates, he may obtain a policy of the national service life insurance. The effect of the bill is to bar future entrance to the United States Government life insurance and the national life-insurance programs after enactment of this act, but any person having one of these policies may continue it in force, or if he has a lapsed policy, he may reinstate it upon a showing of good health.

Who are the beneficiaries under the policy? The beneficiaries are limited to the members of the immediate family and paid in monthly installments of $92.90 each over a period of 10 years. This indemnity cannot be assigned for benefit of creditors and is exempted from taxation.

The Bureau of the Budget recommends the approach employed in this bill and believes that its enactment at this time would be desirable and consistent with the sound long-range program for servicemen and veterans' benefits.

It has been estimated by the Comptroller General that had this program been in effect during 1940 through 1949, the cost to the Government would have been reduced by approximately $587,000,000. This bill is a practical efficient one and should be passed by the Congress as it sets up a protection in case of death for every GI without any cost to him and at the same time saves the Government the enormous expense over a period of years of collecting and receipting premiums paid and naturally reduces the cost of the insurance program in case of death by substantial figures as above stated. And, last but not least, it gives a protection of $10,000 in case of death to every GI in the service of his country, which continues through the period of induction into the service and 90 days after separation from same.

Wheat and Our Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOWELL STOCKMAN
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 20, 1950

Mr. STOCKMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following address by E. J. Bell, administrator, Oregon Wheat Commission, at annual banquet of the Oregon Wheat Growers League at The Dalles, Oreg., December 9, 1950:

WHEAT AND OUR FOREIGN POLICY

A few months ago I asked a friend in Washington, D. C., for a brief, simple explanation of our foreign policy. "Just what are we trying to do anyway, in our dealings with other nations?" He said, "Why not read the preamble of the Constitution?" After thinking about that for some time, I decided this would be a good place to start in considering the wheat of Oregon and its place in world affairs. So here it is, in case some of us may be a bit "rusty" on our eighth-grade history lessons:

"We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

It may also be helpful to read the first part of a bulletin published by the Department of State in September 1950, on Our Foreign Policy. I hope you get copies and read all of this bulletin but I shall give you here the first few paragraphs:

"Policies are an expression of the national interests.

"That is a way of saying that our policies reflect what we are and what we want.

"During the 175 years since we became a Nation, our national interests have changed in some ways, but their general character has remained constant. Here are some of the values that have persisted all through our history.

"We are an independent Nation and we want to keep our independence.

"We attach the highest importance to individual freedom, and we mean to keep our freedom.

"We are a peaceful people, and we want to get rid of wars and the threat of wars.

"We have a comparatively high standard of living. We want to raise the standard so that everyone in the United States will eventually have a chance to earn a decent and secure living.

"We are a friendly people. We have no traditional 'enemies,' and we want to be on good terms with every other people.

"These are the things on which Americans, with all their different points of view, are most likely to agree.

"It is the job of the Government, as the agent of the people, to promote these national interests."

We can all agree on these objectives. The arguments start when we try to put them into practice. For example, some folks may tell you that we have no business in Korea, Japan, the Philippines, Germany, Greece, Turkey, or any other part of the world outside our own immediate borders; that we should live our own lives and let other people live theirs. Maybe that would be the best policy for us, if it were possible for us to live in isolation from the rest of the world; only we never have done it.

From the very beginning of our Nation, the United States has played an increasingly important part in the affairs of the world. Not long after we started as a Nation, pirates along the coast of Africa molested American merchant vessels. Did we tell our Yankee traders to bring their ships back home? No. We sent warships and men over there right away and the infant Marine Corps cut its teeth on the shores of Tripoli. The "blessings of liberty" to our forefathers evidently included freedom of the seas for peaceful commerce. In providing for the common defense we established the Monroe Doctrine and (with the help of the British Navy) kept European countries from invading the Western Hemisphere. We opened the door of Japan and established markets in China and elsewhere for the wheat and flour of Oregon and Washington. We helped the Filipinos get their freedom from the crumbling empire of Spain and guided them in forming a country of their own. Finally, in your memory and mine we played a decisive part in two world wars. In each of these wars we were unable to keep out, even after doing all we could to remain neutral. During the past 6 months, we have again seen our boys fighting on foreign soil in an effort to protect the security of the United States.

In the world as it is, we cannot "secure the blessings of liberty" by standing in our own doorways with rifles in our hands. It is no more possible for us, as a nation, to live by ourselves in the world of today than it would be possible for us to live behind locked doors in our own homes, if lawless bands went up and down the roads shooting tommy guns. Whether we like it or not, we are an important part of the world. Airplanes and radios have made that world very small indeed; overnight from London to New York, 25 hours flying time from San Francisco to Tokyo.

Now, none of us think that we can do all the fighting for the free world. Just as our pioneers in Oregon needed to band together to protect one another, the security of the United States now depends on the help of a lot of other countries. To be specific, if the Communists take over Korea, Japan, and the Philippines, where would be our next line of defense? And, if the people in those and other countries are really to get up and fight against communistic invaders, they must have something that they think is worth fighting for. Otherwise, we shall have to do the fighting for them.

So, to quote again from the bulletin of Our Foreign Policy:

"We realize that our security consists in a combination of many things. It consists in having superior military and economic power on the side of law and order. It depends on strong and free allies. And it depends also on the good will, the respect, the confidence, and the moral support of decent people everywhere."

Every one of us must take a more active interest in foreign affairs. We must do this because, first, it is essential for our personal protection. Second, it is our sons and daughters who are doing the fighting. Third, our whole wheat industry in Oregon and other Pacific Northwest States depends upon the export market. Fourth, most of the men in the world are farmers and most of the women are homemakers. Neither we nor other farm people across the seas can depend entirely upon professional diplomats to protect our homes from invasion or our children from being sent into battle all over the world.

It is not enough for us to wring our hands and say to ourselves, "What a mess this is," or to cuss out the Government in Washington. Under our Constitution we are the Government, and when we express ourselves in no uncertain terms Congress and the executive branch pay attention.

Now, to make this whole thing a little more definite, I want to talk about wheat in relation to the general nature of our foreign policy. What I have said by way of introduction shows that our dealings with other nations are intended to gain their friendship, confidence, and respect and to promote the best interests of the people of the United States. These two objects are consistent with one another because we cannot hold respect of other people unless we are firm and businesslike in our dealings toward them. In a farming community we cannot hold the respect of our neighbors unless we stand up for our own rights. In the same way, as a Nation, we cannot hold the respect of other nations unless we stand up for our own rights.

Trade in wheat and flour is a good example of how we are not putting these principles into practice. In the world of today wheat is a weapon of war and an instrument of peace. It is important to keep people from going hungry. Since World War II Europe and Asia have used more wheat from the United States than ever before. People who never saw bread have become used to eating it. Most of the movement has been financed, directly or indirectly, by the United States. And the fact that this wheat from the United States was made available has kept revolution from spreading in Western Europe, in Greece, in Turkey, in Japan, in India, and elsewhere in the world.

During this period we had a glorious opportunity to get people in the habit of trading with us. We could have held on to markets we had before the war and could have entered new markets with our flour and wheat. I am sorry to say that we have not done this. Instead, Canadian and Australian millers are getting bakers in the habit of using their brands of flour instead of ours. Bakers in the Philippines, Venezuela, Panama, Haiti, Ecuador, and elsewhere are buying more flour from our Canadian neighbors and less from us. These were markets our millers have supplied for years.

Bakers in Hong Kong and Singapore would like to buy Stateside brands of flour if they could get it at competitive prices. The British Food Ministry, however, licenses all imports and gives a monopoly to Australian and Canadian mills to sell in those markets. The United States buys rubber, tin, and other commodities from that part of the world so those bakers could get dollars if the British would permit it.

India must import food for her teeming millions. She has agreed to buy 38,000,000 bushels of wheat annually under the International Wheat Agreement. Last year she bought all of it from Australia. She tried to buy a lot more from us outside the agreement, but felt her people could not afford to pay our price. Instead, she bought grain sorghums because they were cheaper.

Japan has used millions of bushels of our wheat as long as we gave it to her, but when she has to buy it she gets it from Australia, Pakistan, and Canada. We now witness the spectacle of Japanese mills grinding flour from Australian and Canadian wheat for relief feeding in Korea, while Pacific Northwest mills and mill laborers work only part time and wheat piles up on the ground and in the warehouses of Oregon, Washington, and northern Idaho. And the whole deal is financed by the United States.

How did this situation come about, and what are the remedies?

In all fairness, we must first mention the price-support program. By maintaining a level of wheat prices in the United States we have enabled other exporters to undersell us in the world market. The subsidy under the International Wheat Agreement during 1949–50 cost 54 cents a bushel. This is another way of saying that our prices averaged that much above world prices on the 1949 crop. This subsidy was paid only on wheat sold under the agreement. For sales outside the agreement our wheat and flour were completely priced out of the market. This has given other countries a chance to undersell us in the world market. It has given millers in other countries a chance to establish their brands of flour in markets the United States previously supplied. Loss of these markets may cost United States wheat growers more than the temporary benefit of higher prices on the current crop.

The Oregon Wheat Growers' League has recognized this problem for a number of years. Our approach has been to price our surplus wheat so it can be sold in the world market at competitive levels. This would remove the necessity of acreage restrictions and avoid piling up surplus wheat which now stares us in the face. In return, growers have asked full parity by means of certificates only on the wheat milled for human food in the United States. So far we have not been able to get this plan into action. Many growers have been content to rely upon the Government to support wheat prices and to move the crop before the next harvest. That has come to an end, and we see our surplus wheat piling up in a hungry world while other countries capture our markets and our productive land and efficient mills lie idle.

Meanwhile, our millers cannot wait for Congress to enact a realistic farm program. They must meet their payrolls now, and flour markets, once lost, are very hard to regain. It is important to growers that mills retain flour markets. Once a baker is in the habit of using a brand of flour, he will keep buying it as long as he can get it at anywhere near prices of other brands. It is very important to us in Oregon that our millers continue to sell flour, and we all should be working right now on a program to expand flour sales into new markets. Instead we are losing the fight to hold what flour markets we have had in the past, and that means, in the long run, less sale for our wheat.

Faced with financial loss, millers have asked for a general subsidy on exports to enable them to meet Canadian and Australian competition outside the International Wheat Agreement as well as within it. The Oregon Wheat Growers League has supported our millers in this proposal and all our Senators and Congressmen have been working on it. This request has been denied by the United States Department of Agriculture because they think the cost would be excessive; that not a great deal of flour would actually move, and because they do not want to get into a price war with Canada and Australia. Perhaps we are in a poor position to ask for a subsidy in addition to the present one under the IWA which cost $87,000,000 in the 1949–50 fiscal year; but if our foreign policy means anything in protecting the interests of the United States, we should somehow get our prices in line so as to meet this competition; and this needs to be done soon.

Meeting price competition is just the first thing which limits our exports of wheat and flour. A second very important factor all over the world is shortage of dollars. Japan is a good example. There is a population of 80,000,000 people living on an area the size of California. Even though they produce all the food they can, they still need to import around 3,000,000 metric tons of cereal grains (the equivalent of around 110,000,000 bushels of wheat). The Japanese are a very skillful, industrious people who make a great variety of manufactured articles. The only way they can buy food is to sell these products somewhere in the world; and the country or countries that buy Japanese products are the countries that will sell them the rice and wheat they must have.

It is easier for Japanese to sell their goods anywhere else in the world than in the United States. Because of this, it is easier for her to buy wheat almost anywhere else. Furthermore, there are many things (such as cotton and petroleum) that she can get only with dollars but she can get wheat from Australia and Argentina without using dollars. If she does have dollars to buy wheat, she can get more for her money from Canada because prices there are relatively lower.

Temporarily the United States Army has been furnishing wheat to the Japanese. In fact, most of the extra wheat in Oregon since 1946 has been bought by Commodity Credit Corporation, sold to the Army, given to the Japanese Government, ground in Japanese mills, and the flour sold to the Japanese people. The money paid for this flour is put into a counterpart fund and used to help rebuild Japan. The Japanese are grateful to us for feeding them but they and the other self-respecting people of the world would much rather earn their own living. Unless we buy from them, they will be forced to go elsewhere for the wheat they need.

The same situation prevails in Western Europe only to a greater degree. We have furnished wheat for Western Germany on the same procedure as we used for Japan. We have also provided billions of dollars under the ECA and this program, known as the Marshall plan, has retarded the spread of communism in that part of the world. As Europe gets back on her feet and begins to sell more manufactured products and as she rebuilds her agriculture, she will need less help from us. Because we do not buy from them any more than we can help, European countries are short of dollars. It easier for them to buy wheat from Argentina, Australia, and even from Russia than to buy it from the United States. The only way for them to buy more of our wheat is for the United States to give them more dollars or for the United States to buy more of their manufactured articles. ECA has been instructed by Congress to "minimize the burden on the American taxpayer by reducing the amount of dollar purchases by participating countries to the greatest extent possible, consistent with maintaining an adequate supply of the essentials for the functioning of their economies and for their continued recovery." Backed by this language our representatives encourage European countries to reduce their dollar expenditures and buy wheat elsewhere, wherever possible. These countries are also exerting themselves to produce more wheat at home and thus become less dependent upon imports from overseas.

A third factor limiting our sales of wheat and flour is found in licensing regulations of importing countries. Everywhere we went in the Orient a year ago we found bakers wanting to buy more flour from the United States than their local government licenses permitted, and we found people with a greater taste preference for bread than local government officials were willing to admit. The people of the world can use more wheat than they are now getting and many more folks could be taught to use it. On one side of the Pacific there are millions of hungry people many of whom have a little money to buy a little bread. On our side we have wheat and flour to sell. The chief thing that keeps us all from trading with one another is a bunch of Government regulations.

The net effect of all these circumstances is that the United States supplies only that part of the world wheat market that cannot be supplied from other sources. We shall be lucky to export more than 250,000,000 bushels of wheat and flour during the current marketing year (July 1, 1950, to June 30, 1951). This looks small compared with the 500,000,000 bushels we exported in 1948–49. It is larger than our long-time average of 170,000,000 bushels but we can easily produce 300,000,000 bushels or more above our domestic requirements.

A few years ago, we in Oregon supported the International Wheat Agreement. I still think that is a very good thing and we should do all in our power to make it work. That agreement alone, however, will not assure us export outlets in the face of existing price relationships, dollar shortages and import restrictions.

This hungry world can and should use more of our wheat and flour and the United States can and should make it possible for other people to buy it from us. Wherever in the world one finds an Englishman, whether he is a government official or a private trader, he is out there to represent the British Empire and that means he is out there to sell British goods. If all Americans would really represent the interests of the United States to the same degree that those Britishers represent their country, we could sell a lot more of our flour and wheat abroad.

Getting back to our principles of foreign policy, do we really make friends among nations by giving in to them on every turn, or by giving them wheat and dollars? Or can we best preserve the friendship of the world by trading with them on a businesslike basis?

I suggest that the time has come for wheat growers and millers to get together with Government officials and importing firms to insist that we put our foreign policy into practice; that we develop price policies and trading methods that will retain the real friendship of other countries and establish their respect in terms of good business for all concerned. If that means a new look at farm-price programs and a different attitude towards imports, we should be prepared to face the facts.

Report of the Subcommittee on Appropriations for the National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAMILTON C. JONES
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 20, 1950

Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to state that since becoming a Member of Congress, I have heard many fine encomiums and eloquent speeches made by very able speakers on former Members and Members who were retiring from the Congress after long years of devoted service in the body or had died, which was all and properly fitting. But there has been somewhat of a scarcity of such speeches on very active committees and subcommittes which are functioning at the present time and literally giving their life's blood in major efforts to serve their Nation in vital matters that are brought to them for solution by the world crisis that we find ourselves in.

One of the most impressive of these major efforts is the very fine job done by the Committee on Appropriations headed by Representative CLARENCE CANNON, but especially the masterful job done by the Subcommittee on Appropriations for the National Defense headed by Representative GEORGE H. MAHON, of Texas. I wish to commend this subcommittee for the excellent manner in which the very important appropriations for the armed services are handled and allocated. The committee has done a splendid job in getting right down to the fundamentals in providing a most intelligent and practical program for the masterful strengthening of our armed services. And it has done this with a most illuminating report of the program outlined and the reason for same. It sets forth item by item the real necessities and the philosophic thought behind the program.

To emphasize the point, I shall quote freely from the report showing that the committee had a full grasp of the problem and presented to the Congress a clear and convincing analysis of it, concluding that it was certain without a rapid building up of our military strength that war is inevitable.

The subcommittee report shows the current fiscal year—fiscal year of 1951—we have already provided in the regular bill and in the first supplemental, the sums of $25,000,000,000 for the Army, Navy, and Air Force and for the office of the Secretary of Defense. In this supplemental request, $16,800,000,000 is superimposed upon the previous figure; and when this bill becomes the law, the Department of Defense will have available for the current fiscal year the total sum of $42,000,000,000. I am speaking in round figures in order to facilitate an overall understanding of the sums involved.

Of the $42,000,000,000 appropriated by Congress and available to the Department of Defense, only about $19,000,000,000, less than one-half, will actually be expended out of the Treasury this year. The remaining sums will no doubt be obligated during this fiscal year, and they are essential in order that obligations can be incurred and the program placed under way, but the actual money will not be withdrawn from the Treasury and spent until a much later date.

Now a few quick references to some of the provisions in the bill. It accelerates the antitank and antisubmarine program, so important to the defense of this country. It provides additional funds for the all-important radar fence.

It provides large additional funds for research and development in the field of guided missiles, and puts guided missiles in actual production for use by the services.

Additional funds for research and development are provided, bringing the over-all total for the year to $1,100,000,000.

It provides for a build-up of the United States Air Force from 58 wings to 68 wings, and paves the way for the 84-wing program in the next fiscal year. This action upholds and vindicates those of us in the House who have worked for years for a more powerful Air Force.

Additional aircraft for the Navy is not provided in this measure in view of the previous appropriations for this purpose, but additional ships will be taken out of moth balls, and the funds provided will insure more modern ships and a greater degree of readiness. The Navy will have 1,028 active ships in service.

Tanks in quantity are provided and other Army weapons through an over-all $4,300,000,000 provision for such purposes.

Under this measure the number of men in the Army, Navy, Air Force, and marines on June 30 would be 2,766,000 distributed as follows: Army, 1,264,000; Navy, 684,000; marines, 166,000; Air Force, 651,000. However, plans are now being worked out which will raise all these figures to higher levels and this is clearly required.

The bill provides the Army with $9,200,000,000, which, when added to previous appropriations this year, runs the over-all total to $16,500,000,000. For the Navy the corresponding figures would be three billion and ten and eight-tenths billion; for the Air Force four and six-tenths billion and thirteen and seven-tenths billion.

We all recognize that this is a dangerous world and that from day to day we are in grave peril, but I feel some well-intentioned Americans are unwittingly broadcasting to the world some very dangerous statements. Those who rush into print to say that we are in worse shape than we were the day after Pearl Harbor, those who proclaim that we have nothing to fight with and no defense plans in the event all-out war should strike tomorrow, those who shout from the housetops that we stand naked and defenseless before the world and intimate that the aggressor could bend us to his will in the event of war, those who say that the American people are frustrated, bewildered, and disunited—those who say things like that should weigh their words carefully lest they perhaps convince the aggressor that the free world is ripe for aggression and is waiting only to be plucked. Such untimely declarations when made without reference to other factors might possibly tend to incite the aggressor to full-scale attack. Yet we recognize that a balance in these matters must be found as it is urgently necessary that the American public be frankly informed of the dangers which confront us.

Now is the time to set the record straight. We hate war; we love peace and liberty; we do not want to fight. We are not prepared to wage all-out war at the moment. We do not propose to start a war, and we have no aggressive designs on any nation. If a full-scale war should start tomorrow we would be pushed back on many fronts.

No, no we are not ready for war—far from it—but I hope a recitation of a few fundamental truths will tend to get things in their proper perspective and warn the aggressor lest he be deceived by loose talk and miscalculate the will and the actual and potential might of the United States.

In conclusion, as a united and determined people, let us get on with the job of building up our defenses as effectively and as rapidly as possible. The time may be shorter than we think. Not one hour should be wasted. And as we devote our whole energies to the task of self-preservation and peace we can pray every day for the best while we rapidly prepare for the worst. The quick passage of the bill now before us is a significant part of the job at hand.

May I commend the subcommittee again for a splendid and prophetic job in holding most intelligent and incisive hearings on the subject of the necessary strengthening of our armed services in order that war may be avoided, and bringing to the Congress a clear picture and illuminating report of the huge sums provided and to be provided for vastly strengthening our national defenses, with the accompanying allocation of the funds to the three branches of the services—the Army, Navy, and Air Force. Every patriotic citizen to which this report is available should read it carefully and absorb its salient provisions.

Replacement of Secretary Acheson

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD BOLLING
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 20, 1950

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Lowell Mellett from the Washington Evening Star of December 19, 1950:

TO UNDERSTAND THOSE RESOLUTIONS, ONE SHOULD READ BETWEEN LINES

(By Lowell Mellett)

Reports from European capitals indicate that the resolutions adopted by our House and Senate Republicans demanding the replacement of Secretary Acheson have had a devastating effect among the governments with which we are associated in resistance to the threat of Russian aggression. The news from Washington, according to the dispatches, has been particularly upsetting in Brussels, where other foreign ministers are now meeting with Mr. Acheson to expedite the unification of Western Europe's defenses. The man who had given them leadership up to this point, or had led them to accept the leadership of the United States, is suddenly revealed as one unable to lead or speak with authority for his own people. Or so it seems to some of the statesmen with whom he has to deal.

BETWEEN-LINES THOUGHT

Our friends in Europe probably would be less disturbed if they were able to read between the lines of the two strange political pronouncements. If they could read them as cynical American observers read them, this is what they would find—the between-lines thought being presented in parentheses:

"In this critical hour confidence of the American people in their leadership is essential to our security. (The way to determine whether or not the people have this confidence is to try in every possible way to tear it down and then see if it still stands up. We have done this. We have abused, slandered, ridiculed, and misrepresented Mr. Acheson from the day he took office. That is to say, some of us have, some of the loudest and least responsible of us. The result is that:)

"It is completely obvious that Secretary Acheson and the State Department under his leadership have lost the confidence of the Congress and the American people and cannot regain it. (In other words, we have succeeded in convincing a great part of the American people that whatever mistakes have been made in foreign policy, whether or not they were mistakes in which we joined or even mistakes which we crowded the administration into making, the whole blame rests on Mr. Acheson.)

"NO IDEAS ON REPLACEMENT

"Recognizing this fact, we earnestly insist for the good of our country that Mr. Acheson be replaced as Secretary of State, that there be a thorough housecleaning in the State Department and changes in personnel and policies responsible for this lack of confidence. (In saying this we admit that we haven't the slightest idea of where President Truman can find, as a replacement, a man who can stand up to the treatment we have given Mr. Acheson. And we must not conceal our readiness, 'for the good of the country,' to subject any successor to the same treatment. We have no candidate of our own for the office. Some of us like John Foster Dulles, but Mr. Dulles is a Republican, and even though he thinks much like Mr. Acheson, we'd prefer a Democrat to work on. That also rules out Chiang Kai-shek, a favorite of one wing of our party. He's not a Democrat. As for the general housecleaning, we've got to have that. Having convinced a lot of the voters that the department is simply infested with Communists, the least we could settle for would be the ouster of some clerks and messengers. Our Mr. MCCARTHY would furnish the names.")

There is much more between the lines of the solemn resolutions, but no room for it here. Stated simply, these particular Republicans are against appeasement. Nothing the President could do would appease them.

Pay As You Go

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW JACOBS
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 20, 1950

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letters:

LEAGUE OF WOMEN VOTERS OF INDIANAPOLIS,
Indianapolis, Ind., December 15, 1950.

Hon. ANDREW JACOBS,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. JACOBS: The League of Women Voters of Indianapolis is very concerned about the effects of the present emergency on the domestic economy and is fully conscious of the dangers involved in allowing the present inflationary trend to continue unchecked.

It is important that measures be taken quickly not only to check the rising inflation but also to prepare to pay as we go for the increased defense program.

While the credit restrictions under regulations X and W and the September 22 Revenue Act of 1950 were steps in the right direction, it is increasingly evident that these measures will not be sufficient to control the inflationary trend, nor to meet the added defense costs.

Therefore, we favor whatever further tax increases and credit restrictions are necessary to help pay for defense needs and to help skim off surplus purchasing. We also feel that to be effective these measures must be taken immediately.

Respectfully yours,
SHIRLEY N. HARMAN
(Mrs. Charles T. Harman),
President, League of Women Voters of Indianapolis.

DECEMBER 19, 1950.

MRS. CHARLES T. HARMAN,
President, League of Women Voters of Indianapolis,
Indianapolis, Ind.

DEAR MRS. HARMAN: Last October 4, I wrote the President urging price and wage controls at once. I have also spoken for pay-as-we-go taxes, written the President urging such. You may recall I made a speech December 27, 1949, to that effect and was criticized editorially by the Indianapolis Star.

I am in complete agreement with your organization's views expressed in your letter of December 15. I will do all I can, which is indeed very little now. But I shall send a copy of your letter to the President and have it printed in the RECORD.

Very sincerely,
ANDREW JACOBS.

Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOWELL STOCKMAN
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 20, 1950

Mr. STOCKMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution adopted unanimously by Oregon Wheat Growers League at the twenty-third annual meeting, The Dalles, Oreg., December 9, 1950:

FOREIGN POLICY

During the past year a number of developments have reduced sales of our wheat and flour abroad. Canadian and Australian millers are selling flour in the Orient and Latin America at prices United States millers are unable to meet. Licensing regulations in Hong Kong, Singapore, and elsewhere exclude United States flour and give a monopoly in those markets to Canadian and Australian mills. These are part of the British Empire to which the United States gives billions of dollars through ECA. Flour purchased with United States funds for Korea is being milled in Japan from wheat produced in other countries.

The net effect of these and other developments is that all available wheat is bought from other exporting countries and the United States supplies only that portion of the world wheat market that cannot be supplied from other sources.

Bakers in the Orient and Latin America are becoming used to brands of flour from other countries. These have previously been established markets for Pacific Northwest flour. Such markets, once lost, will be exceedingly difficult to regain.

It is highly important to wheat producers that our mills be kept running and that we hold and expand markets for our wheat and flour in other countries.

We recommend, therefore, that the Wheat League do everything within its power to get our Government to take a more realistic, businesslike attitude toward promoting sales of United States wheat and flour abroad. Specifically, we recommend:

1. The use of the certificate plan, or export subsidies that will enable our surplus wheat and flour to compete freely on the entire world market, outside of, as well as within, the International Wheat Agreement.

2. Insistence that our wheat and flour be given an even break in licensing regulations of importing nations which we are helping to finance.

3. Requiring that, where the United States Government puts up the money, our flour and wheat be given the preference over flour and wheat from other countries.

Weapons for War Made in United States of America for U. S. S. R.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLIFF CLEVENGER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 20, 1950

Mr. CLEVENGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Van Wert (Ohio) Times-Bulletin of December 16, 1950:

WEAPONS FOR WAR MADE IN UNITED STATES OF AMERICA FOR U. S. S. R.

By way of London comes the information that Russia is building a balanced navy, which includes not only an enormous fleet of submarines, but also four battleships.

What Russia is doing, apparently, is adding to the long list of fighting equipment so generously supplied by the United States, and for which no payments were ever made. It will not bolster an American sense of security to again review this list.

Russia is reported to be especially strong in submarine craft. That fleet had its beginning with a donation of 205 such vessels from the United States, according to the list just announced in England.

During World War II the Roosevelt administration was enthusiastic in arming Russia against any future aggression by Germany. Here is a partial list of what was sent to the Russian Communists:

More than 15,000 fighter planes, more than 7,000 tanks, 51,000 jeeps, 375,000 trucks, 85,000 motorcycles, 8,000 tractors, 8,200 antiaircraft guns, 345,000 tons of explosives, 2,000 locomotives, 11,000 freight cars, 7,700 marine engines, 77 minesweepers, 26 liberty ships, 140 submarine chasers, 105 landing craft, four floating repair ships, in addition to the submarines already mentioned.

Much of this equipment has been passed on to the Chinese Communists. It was used to defeat Chiang Kai-shek forces and is being used against American forces in Korea. And, in case of war with Russia, American boys will be facing weapons of American manufacture, which were given away during a period when Washington policymakers were so dumb—to give them the benefit of the doubt—they thought Russia was yearning to help create a peaceful world.

TIMOROUS ALLIES

Americans awaken to the fact that the billions in gifts donated to this country's "allies" during the last 5 years, and before, is money down a rat hole.

Prior to World War II the western Europeans were hot after this country as an ally, to save their bacon. Failing to get the United States involved, England tried appeasement at Munich. While frantic efforts were under way to get this country into the war, England stiffened its backbone but France, Communist-infested, succumbed. Europe was saved when the Japs, following an ultimatum from Roosevelt, struck at Pearl Harbor.

Now this country has been dragged down to the point where it is compelled to fear Russia, must try to cajole England's communistic government and timorous France not to run out on its benefactor. England and France want to appease Red China, if not Russia. London recognized the Red China Government months ago.

Eisenhower rushed down to the Pentagon a month ago to assume command of the west European defense forces. But no forces appeared to command, and he returned to New York.

Stalin's strategy, like that of Hitler before him, is to divide and conquer. Current developments suggest that the Western World is divisible.

Capitol Cloak Room

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLAUDE PEPPER
OF FLORIDA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, December 20 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, on the 5th of December I participated in the Capitol Cloak Room program over the Columbia Broadcasting System network. I ask unanimous consent that a transcript of that program may be incorporated in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the transcript was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CAPITOL CLOAK ROOM

Mr. BANCROFT. Senator PEPPER, can a line be held in Korea?

Mr. DOWNS. Senator, should we bomb Chinese cities?

Mr. KENDRICK. Can we defend both Asia and Europe?

ANNOUNCER. Capitol Cloak Room, from the Nation's Capitol, CBS brings you another informal interview with a Member of Congress. Tonight's guest is Senator CLAUDE PEPPER, Democrat, of Florida. Senator PEPPER will meet with CBS Correspondents Griffing Bancroft, Bill Downs, and Alexander Kendrick. First, we hear from Mr. Bancroft.

Mr. BANCROFT. Senator PEPPER, welcome to Capitol Cloak Room. A member of the Foreign Relations Committee, you've just made a long tour of Europe and Asia and you've just left Korea a few days ago, so let's start with that. Do you think we can hold a line now in Korea?

Senator PEPPER. Well, I'm glad to see that our leaders have not given up hope. I saw those good fighting men of ours over there just week before last. I was with them in the camps and sometimes in the lines, and I know the stuff they are made of and, if those fellows have any sort of a decent chance, they will hold the line.

Mr. BANCROFT. Well, you think they can hold it if the Chinese Communists make this an all-out attack?

Senator PEPPER. Well, of course, it depends on how many troops the Chinese Communists throw in against them and it also depends upon what we are doing to the Chinese while they are crucifying our men.

Mr. DOWNS. Senator, do you have any doubt that the Chinese are not fully committed to this adventure?

Senator PEPPER. Well, one cannot be sure even now what their motive is. There are two or three assumptions that we might well make, but we can't be quite sure which one is correct. We never have been able to be sure what the inscrutable oriental mind is going to do in this situation. For example, this might be the beginning of an all-out puhs on the part of the Chinese Communists at the instance of the Russians to eliminate American and western influence totally from Korea and Formosa and, I think, thereafter Japan. In fact, the whole area of Asia. That would include Malaya and Indochina, and all the other areas where there is western influence today.

Mr. DOWNS. Well, do you think we can stop them?

Senator PEPPER. Well, we can stop them eventually. It would depend at what point we could stop them and how long it would take. The Japs started in 1941. Mrs. Pepper and I were at Pearl Harbor this last week and we saw there the hulls of the Utah, having several bodies entombed therein, and we saw the hulls of the Arizona, that has over a thousand bodies therein. When they had damaged eight of our battleships and eight of our cruisers by another attack of dastardly character, it looked pretty bad, but eventually we were in Japan a little while ago and we saw, not Japan dictating peace upon the White House steps, as they said they would, we saw American forces in occupation in Japan. It took a long time, but we did it.

Mr. DOWNS. Well, Senator PEPPER, did you talk with General MacArthur and what was his view on this?

Senator PEPPER. Well, I talked with General MacArthur twice. Mrs. Pepper and I had lunch with the General and Mrs. MacArthur on Friday of the week that we arrived there and then I went by to pay my respects and to say good-by to General MacArthur on Monday evening of last week, that is, Monday evening, the 27th. Well, General MacArthur, I think, like our commanders in the field, like all who had to deal with this problem, has had to try to divine what was in the inscrutable thinking of these Chinese Communists and nobody can be sure—for example, when their troops are massed across the Yalu River, whether they are massed there for defense or whether they are massed there in preparation for an attack. Well, of course, we knew they were up there. General MacArthur has announced that many times, as have his Intelligence officers. We know today that there are many submarines and many airplanes in the Russian area that might be launched against us any time, but I dare say few people would venture to be sure that they are going to do it. We don't know.

Mr. DOWNS. Well, do you think General MacArthur was right in this in launching this offensive?

Senator PEPPER. Yes, I do think he was right. I spent Thanksgiving day and Friday, the day following, at the headquarters of General Walker and up at the lines. On Thanksgiving afternoon, before the attack began Friday morning, at 10 o'clock, I went with General Walker, a great general, and his aides are General Millburn and General Church, and we visited the regimental headquarters of the Nineteenth Regiment and some of the company headquarters and then the next morning I flew over the lines during the time of the advance of our forces. Then * * * saw the tank columns and infantry columns moving forward, our artillery, and the like. The interesting thing was that even that day, with our forces moving forward, approaching contact with the enemy, in the Eighth Army there was a total of only 19 casualties, so, even at the end of the first day, our leaders were not able to determine what kind of resistence they were going to get. They had been sending out patrols for days and even those advance patrols had hardly been able to establish any contact with the enemy. There was considerable evidence to believe that they were steadily drawing back. Now, whether they changed their mind, as they seemed to have, when we crossed the thirty-eighth parallel and didn't attack them, but waited until later or whether they were drawing us in is a matter of opinion. I don't know——

Mr. KENDRICK. Senator, speaking of the thirty-eighth parallel, at the United Nations today, 13 Asiatic and Arab countries issued an appeal to the Chinese Communists to stop when they got to the thirty-eighth parallel. What do you think of the chances of that?

Senator PEPPER. Well, I think that's the kind of weak-kneed appeasement which has been preceded by some other appeasement of the same character and which has contributed somewhat to the aggression that the Chinese Communists are committing today. For example, while we were in Korea and in Japan, we were constantly reading newspaper dispatches, telling us that certain powers, other than the United States, were recommending that we yield and that we not go altogether to the Manchurian border but we have a neutral area there. Well, anybody could see that if we were already willing to concede a neutral area of an indefinite width, that they had gained by their resistance, that they'd probably gain greater reward if they resisted more and by the same logic, if they attacked in force, we'd make yet further concessions to them, but they're exhibiting strength at a crucial time, I regret to say, that a lot of people who haven't seen this thing through have exhibited weakness and if there is anything in the world that these people will exploit it's weakness.

Mr. DOWNS. Well, Senator, that's the military argument. I mean, but there's also a diplomatic argument, one of which is that has been put up and is now being considered, as you well know, that we cannot lick the Chinese nation, we cannot take them on as ground armies.

Senator PEPPER. Well, as I said a while ago, there are people who thought that we couldn't lick Japan after Pearl Harbor, but we didn't quit and we didn't apply to Japan that we'd settle an armistice with her if she wouldn't sink any more ships of ours and we didn't think then for sure that we could defeat Hitler, but we didn't offer a Munich to him as Mr. Chamberlain had done in 1938. We fought it through together without thinking of appeasement and we won. Now, in this case, I think the situation is analogous. The Chinese Communists today are appealed to, we are told, by the press, by a group of 13 nations, as you've just said, headed by whom? Headed by the Honorable Prime Minister of India, Mr. Nehru.

Mr. KENDRICK. Did you see him when you were out there?

Senator PEPPER. Yes. Yes. Mrs. Pepper and I had a very pleasant lunch with the Prime Minister and talked with him the larger part of an afternoon.

Mr. KENDRICK. What was your impression, Senator?

Senator PEPPER. Well, Mr. Nehru, with all the distinction and credit which he deserves, is in my opinion lacking in reality. He seemed to have no more concept of the danger that his nation and other peace-loving peoples experienced from communism than I have of the prospect of you shooting me at we sit here calmly this evening. He seemed to be totally unaware of the nature of communism and just speaking about the role that India was playing as the western window of Communist China and he thought the Communists of China were like some people, some husbands like to call themselves the misunderstood husband and he was going to be the man who would interpret these misunderstood, kindly intentioned Communists to the Western World.

Mr. DOWNS. Senator, could I interpret your remarks made about Mr. Chamberlain and the certain nations that have advocated the buffer zone and not crossing the parallel, which, obviously, you're referring to Britain, are you comparing Mr. Attlee's mission here to Washington with Mr. Chamberlain's mission to Munich?

Senator PEPPER. No, no. I would not disparage Mr. Attlee's visit by making such a comparison. Mr. Attlee is a very great man and a wise leader and he was an associate of Mr. Winston Churchill and the British Cabinet during the war and I know that he advocated going right through to the finish, which we finally gained, and I can't believe that he would ever advocate or countenance our going back to the days of Chamberlain whom he partially succeeded, but I wanted to just say one other thing about, if I might, about Prime Minister Nehru, with all respect and deference. I noticed a little while ago, when the same aggressive Chinese Communists, without any provocation at all, marched into Tibet, right on the border of India, that Mr. Nehru again, with great sincerity, appealed to the Chinese Communists to stop their aggression upon the little country of Tibet. Did they stop? Well, I wonder why they'd be likely to yield now when they didn't yield to the entreaty to stop invading little Tibet.

Mr. DOWNS. Senator PEPPER, you see no answer to any of this except an all-out war, is that correct?

Senator PEPPER. I don't see necessarily an all-out war, but I do see the necessity of the peace-loving peoples establishing such vigorous unity that ours shall be a superior force and they shall not be able to overcome our unity and our superior force.

Mr. DOWNS. How do we get a superior force?

Mr. KENDRICK. How do we do that? Do we bomb Chinese cities, for instance?

Senator PEPPER. Whether we bomb Chinese cities or not is, in my opinion, a military matter, but we have pursued the most unrealistic course, gentlemen, in this war. I was on board the carrier, the Philippine Sea, happened to be on it there at the same time that our distinguished Secretary of the Navy was there, Secretary Matthews, and we saw these helldivers, these dive-bombers, and the jets, go off of the deck of this carrier to their missions, their bombing missions, and then we saw them come back and we heard these men, who had just been under fire from the Chinese Communists on the other side of the Yalu River, tell about having by the limitations of the United Nations to fly along, trying to bomb those bridges in an area where they had a right to go and, without the privilege of shooting back, they were constantly under vicious fire from the antiaircraft batteries of the Chinese Communists on the Chinese side of the Yalu River. Well, these MIGS, these very fast Chinese-jet bombers, that they probably got from Russia, the way the North Koreans got all their other equipment, some of these North Korean prisoners told me the other day over there at Pyongyang, these MIGS would dash out across the Yalu River from the other side and get in a blow, a burst, at our bombers or our jets and before our people could get in position to reply they had darted back across the river and our men were forbidden by the limitations of the United Nations to pursue these planes that had attacked them or silence these batteries that were shooting at them and I saw one plane on the deck of the Philippine Sea come miraculously back with half of its wing nearly shot away from these Chinese antiaircraft guns on the other side of the river.

Mr. DOWNS. You think we should carry the fighting into Manchuria?

Senator PEPPER. I think General MacArthur should be authorized to retaliate against Chinese attacks in the way that he and the great military men think is militarily desirable to save these men of ours that they are crucifying over there—

Mr. DOWNS. Would you do that without UN authorization?

Senator PEPPER. No! No! I think all that we'd do, such as all we have done has been * * * should be with the order of the United Nations as our authority for doing it and, by the way, today is a great crisis in the United Nations, but, if the United Nations will remain firm, instead of getting frightened, instead of getting panicky, if we will remember that there's a principle involved in this matter, a very vital principle, of whether the nation can commit violent, atrocious, unprovoked aggression and get away with it or not. I say a principle is inolved. Now, we have stood up, the United Nations have stood up magnificently, the whole peace-loving world, three of them, when on the 25th and the 27th day of June they stood up like men instead of mice and denounced the aggressor and called upon member nations to put the armed strength in the field to throw the aggressor back. Now, what kind of a rule are we going to establish * * * that it's wrong and will be punished, if a small nation like North Korea aggresses, but it's a matter about which they may have immunity and immunity, if it be a large and dangerous and determined nation that aggresses, then we are going to have one rule for the little aggressor and another rule of immunity for the big aggressor.

Mr. KENDRICK. Senator, what happens to Europe while we're concentrating on Asia? That's what Mr. Attlee is here to find out and——

Senator PEPPER. I'm glad you asked that question. That depends on what Europe does to help the peace-loving people in Asia. There's a very great fallacy, I'm afraid, that's fallen somehow into the minds of some of the Europeans. They seem to be afraid that the United States will dissipate its strength in Asia. That we might call upon them to squander their strength in far-off Asia and leave them unprotected against Russian aggression in Europe. I'd like to say to them, in my humble opinion, the one assurance that Russian aggression will come to destroy them is if nothing is done effectively to stop Russian promulgated aggression in Asia. If Russia, through the Chinese puppets of hers, can get away with stealing and robbing North Korea and South Korea of their liberty, killing and plundering those people, and then all we do is shiver in our boots until maybe they stop, why, then, what can they do but in their cynical way proceed, knowing that if they put up enough force somewhere else that we'll weaken again. Nothing in the world but Munich all over again——

Mr. BANCROFT. Isn't there a practical side to this, though? Can we really accumulate enough strength to defend both Europe and——

Senator PEPPER. Yes, there is a very practical side to it. That's the reason I say that the United Nations should give General MacArthur authority to retaliate against the encroachments of the Chinese and fight the kind of battle that we are qualified to fight. Of course, we are not going to fight a land war with the hordes of Asia. Why, we couldn't win the war if we killed a hundred of theirs every time they killed one of ours. We haven't got enough, no doubt, that we could put in the field there, but, suppose General MacArthur is authorized to bombard by air and naval power Chinese cities and says to the Chinese Government, this de facto Communist Chinese Government, "you're killing Americans and Britishers and Turks and United Nations people by your aggression in North Korea in a land where you outnumber us, we will let you feel how it tastes to be the victims of B–29's and B–36's and jets and——"

Mr. BANCROFT. And atom bombs, too, Senator?

Senator PEPPER. If it became appropriate. I regret very much that the subject of the atom bomb's use has been brought into the Korean situation. Why, there's nothing in the world but a (one word unintelligible) sequence of hills up there, little mountains, as it were, and these people are all concealed ofttimes in the caves and under the trees and the like and scattered over multitudinous mountains and large areas, if you were to drop a bomb it wouldn't kill——

Mr. DOWNS. Well, Senator, can we stay on the peninsula? I mean, right now we are retreating. What is your information? You came back last week, what is your information, are we going to be kicked off, are we going to have to withdraw, are we going to have to make a (interruption) or what?

Senator PEPPER. I started to say, Mr. Downs, a minute ago that in talking to these North Korean prisoners, one of whom was a colonel and the other a full colonel, I said: "What of our weapons did you dislike the most?" and they said, "those jets," which they call the "rascals." That seemed to me the worst word in their vocabulary, the rascals. That's in my opinion what most of them are. But they didn't seem to like these jets. Now, if General MacArthur were turned loose to use these jets in the way that they dislike the most, it might slow them down a little bit over there in Korea, so, of course, if the time came that it became desirable or appropriate from the military standpoint to use the atom bomb, why I think with the knowledge and approval of the President and the United Nations, especially the President, that he should have authority to use it. However, that's our big gun, you know, and you don't waste your big guns on that. That's when you're (faded out). We may have the need for our big guns a little while later, if we find we are in contact with bigger game, so I don't want to squander them. General MacArthur could do a great deal to the Chinese coast with American warships and with jet planes if he had the authority to do it and we could have stopped, no doubt, a great deal of this migration across the Yalu River if General MacArthur had had authority to go bomb those bridges from both ends (interruption) ever get to just one end.

Mr. DOWNS. Senator, if we get pushed off, pushed out of Korea and pushed off the continent, then do you think we can win a war or stop the Communists simply by air bombardment, naval bombardments?

Senator PEPPER. I realize that the plight we're in today is a very dangerous and a very desperate one and that it's going to take all the courage and sacrifice that our heroic men can summon for us to hold that difficult terrain, suprised as we have been by the aggression of a new power. However, if we can hold, remember, we didn't have but a small perimeter down at Pusan, but we held and we counterattacked. We've got superiority in the air and superiority in the sea in our excellent fleet that's out there, so I'm hoping that we can hold a line from which we can counterattack at the appropriate time. Now, I started to say a while ago that I thought this thing might be upon one or two or three motives. One is, it might be an all-out effort to drive all the western nations out of the whole of Asia and eventually out of Japan. Second, it might be just a holding action, to make us exert and exhaust ourselves if possible. That's unlikely, however, or they would have stayed up in the hills where their own defense wouldn't have cost them much and would have cost us a great deal. I think probably the reason that's uppermost in their minds is that they are going to frighten us so much, or force us so hard, as agents of the Russians, as a part of Russian strategy, that we will seek an over-all settlement. In other words, they'll get us around the table in another Munich in which they'll get everything and we'll come out of it with lost opportunity and humiliation. Now, it seems to me that that's probably what they've got in mind, and here these gentlemen from India and these Arab countries, who of all people, need the help of the United States and the strong United Nations members, here they come along on bended knee and say, "Won't you please stop at the thirty-eighth parallel? Well, suppose they stop. How long would they stay stopped? What forces would hold them there? Would we have Mr. Nehru constantly ready with his (one word unintelligible) Arab and Asian resources to file another petition and entreaty as soon they started to move again? You see how unrealistic that is. Now, you say, "What do you offer?" Well, frankly, I don't think there's any brief answer that anybody can give except a constant enlargement of our strength and power, increase in our unity among nations of good will and peaceful disposition and, above everything else, here at home, forgetting politics and merging our people into the kind of fighting unity that we exhibited during the war that——

Mr. KENDRICK. Well, Senator, that brings up this question. Today, some of the Republican Senators were complaining that they hadn't been let in on what's going on between the President and Mr. Attlee, that they weren't—that their advice wasn't being asked. Is that so?

Senator PEPPER. Well, I know that representatives of the Republican Party, of the Foreign Relations Committee, and the Armed Services Committee, certainly, and no doubt, upon other committees, have been kept fully informed of the military situation. Tonight's papers—tomorrow's—tomorrow morning's papers will carry about General Bradley having been up to talk about the military situation with the Armed Services Committee, consisting of nearly as many Republicans as Democrats, as they've been to the State Department. If anybody wants to go down and talk to the President about it, I'm sure that he'd be more than glad to——

Mr. DOWNS. [Both speaking (unintelligible.)] Complaint. They don't complain that they haven't been filled in or briefed on the situation, but that their advice has not been asked.

Mr. KENDRICK. That decisions are being made and they're being informed of the decisions after they are made.

Senator PEPPER. Well, now, these gentlemen know perfectly well the constitutional character of our Government. The division between the executive and the legislative and the judicial, and they know perfectly well that somebody has got to act in the role of President and that that President has got to contact agencies of the Government and such sources of opinion as he thinks wise and they know very well also that that President in our great democracy would allow any of these responsible leaders to come and talk to him about the subject and give their ideas at any time, but, what's he going to do? Are you going to have a committee run the war? I don't think that anybody has suggested that a committee is the way to run a war. Somebody has got to make the decisions, but these gentlemen over there in the Congress have every right to repudiate any action of the President they dislike. They have every right to go give him their advice. He can't sit there all day with the head of the sewing circle.

Mr. DOWNS. Well, Senator PEPPER, do you feel that the American people have been told outright exactly what is happening, how serious the matter is, and what they can do about it?

Senator PEPPER. I think the American people are being told the truth because the American press and radio and television are giving the American people better coverage than they've ever had in any war. As a matter of fact, the military officials have told me here in Washington, since I've been back, since Saturday night, that actually what you read in the newspaper comes fresher from the front lines than they are able to give you in a briefing. Why? One of your courageous reporters over there, and I want to pause to pay tribute to the sacrifices of life as well as limb which have been made by the intrepid newspaper and radio and television reporters that have been covering this war for the American people—more newspapermen, and that includes radio and television men, have lost their lives in this war than lost their lives in the Pacific phase of the European—I mean of the World War II, so I say that we have utterly no censorship of the press. You don't rely upon the president of the Department of Defense, commander of the Army and Air Force, to tell the American people, the press is telling them exactly the dilemma that we face over there today. Now, if the President hasn't been able to penetrate the veil of the future and tell the American people just exactly what he's going to do to eliminate this jeopardy that we face, it's because he's only human and he cannot penetrate the impenetrable veil of the future, which is unknown. President Roosevelt couldn't after Pearl Harbor have told the American people either just what he was going to do, but they knew he was going to fight and he was going to stand for the principles that we believe in as a Nation and eventually we were going to win and that's exactly what President Truman, in my opinion, will——

Mr. KENDRICK. Well, Senator, all we do down here is report what the various leaders of our Government say and do, and hasn't it struck you that some of the leaders of our Government have been very hesitant to really lay it on the line? I mean, they talk about controls as something that may occur 6 months from now or 9 months from now, but they never really impress the public with the seriousness of the situation.

Senator PEPPER. Well, I think this is true, Mr. Kendrick, and I think you'll understand the reluctance of the Government to impose these governmental controls unless we come to the point of absolute necessity. You remember that we didn't impose a great many of the controls in World War II until a number of months had passed and now if these Chinese Communists had not come into it on the twenty-eighth in such force as they did with their counterattack, why, the Korean war would have been over by now. We'd have been up on the Manchurian border. We have 145,000 troops in their armies as prisoners and there's—as General MacArthur said—the North Koreans had been defeated, and then a new enemy comes in, but we didn't know that they were coming for sure, and why go and impose all these controls and set up a great administrative bureaucracy unless the emergency really demands it and——

Mr. KENDRICK. Don't you think the emergency has arrived?

Senator PEPPER. Well, I don't know but what it's here, and I think probably the next few hours will tell us the gravity of the situation and then, if it goes on the next few hours as it appears, then I think the only thing that the President and the Congress can do it to tell the American people that we are set to the most grim task that we've ever faced in our national history and whatever be the sacrifice, we're going to have to see it through. It'll be blood and sweat and tears for a long way.

Mr. KENDRICK. Well, that's what it has been, Senator, ever since we crossed the thirty-eighth parallel, and isn't it about time that someone in an official capacity, other than we correspondents, tell the people that?

Senator PEPPER. Well, I think we are approaching that, and I believe that the President is going to tell the American people frankly just the nature of the dilemma, but I started to say it's blood and sweat and tears now, but eventually I believe, it's a stronger United Nations and probably the best hope of a permanent peace we've ever had.

Mr. DOWNS. Senator PEPPER, I would like to ask just this one thing about your own personal plans, now that you have been defeated after 14 years in the Senate, do you plan to stay in politics or get back in, or what?

Senator PEPPER. Well, whether a man gets into politics, you know, is not always left entirely to his own discretion or choice. I'm going to become, I hope, a very busy practicing lawyer right after the first of the year, and as a citizen I'll always try to serve my country to the best of my ability whenever the demand comes.

Mr. BANCROFT. Well, I'm afraid that's all the time we have and, Senator PEPPER, we certainly do appreciate your being with us here tonight on Capitol Cloak Room, and thank you very much, Senator PEPPER.

Senator PEPPER. Thank you, Mr. Bancroft.

ANNOUNCER. Columbia has again brought you a meeting in Capitol Cloak Room, presenting a Member of Congress through informal interview. Tonight's guest was Senator CLAUDE PEPPER, Democrat, of Florida. He was interviewed by three CBS correspondents—Griffing Bancroft, Bill Downs, and Alexander Kendrick.

Maurice Moskovitz, Man of Achievement

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCK R. HAVENNER
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 20, 1950

Mr. HAVENNER. Mr. Speaker, I have received a letter from Mr. Webster K. Nolan, prominent San Francisco newspaperman, concerning the outstanding achievements in citizenship of another noted San Franciscan, Mr. Maurice Moskovitz. It has been my pleasure to know Mr. Moskovitz for many years, and I am glad to request the privilege of having this well deserved tribute published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. Nolan's letter follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., December 9, 1950.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN HAVENNER: Today I read a dispatch in the wire-report about the awarding of the Government a certificate of achievement for outstanding accomplishment to a Menlo Park, Calif., doctor and professor at Stanford University, for his constructive efforts as a Tokyo army headquarters biological and natural resources consultant.

Right here in San Francisco is an outstanding citizen. Mr. Maurice Moskovitz, who for more than a quarter century has consistently devoted his energies to the betterment of the American way of life.

Sixteen years ago, Maurice Moskovitz initiated and devised the plans for title one of the FHA, the emergency provision of 1934 calling for Government-sponsored loans to property owners for renovation, repairs, remodeling and painting of properties in order to provide farspread and immediate employment to millions of worthy workingmen.

The extraordinary success of that immediate relief plan of 1934, still in force, is historic. You were instrumental in bringing it to the attention of the late great United States Senator Hiram W. Johnson.

The letters exchanged at that time between the White House and Mr. Moskovitz are at hand, notably the exchange of correspondence with the late Mr. Louis McH. Howe, secretary to the late President Franklin D. Roosevelt, as well as many letters from distinguished leaders, Congressmen and major national organizations commending Mr. Moskovitz for his efforts in behalf not only of the unemployed but for the small businessman. Mr. Moskovitz himself is a prominent realtor in this area.

Recently Mr. Moskovitz was appointed a director of the Golden Gate Bridge district and his first pronouncement was that he would strive for cutting in half the bridge toll, which, he said, could be accomplished if that enterprise is operated on a sound business basis.

Since certificates of achievement are in order, as the grist from today's news mill indicates, certainly recognition of the sustained, sound and inspiring efforts of esteemed citizen Maurice Moskovitz ought to be spread upon the minutes of Congress and formal affirmation be sent him in some suitable form.

Sincerely,

WEBSTER K. NOLAN.

Total Mobilization

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE D. AIKEN
OF VERMONT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, December 20 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I am sure that many Members of the Senate are acquainted with Mary Spargo, who for several years reported for the Washington Post. Miss Spargo now conducts the Vermont News Round-Up for Station WCAX, in Burlington, Vt. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, the Round-Up for December 16, which I am sure will be of interest to many people.

There being no objection, the broadcast was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Good evening. Tonight there is only one real news story in Vermont. Leaders of this State are unanimous in a demand for total, all-out mobilization right now.

Before I give our listeners a round-up of Vermont thinking in the present crisis, I'd like to switch back a minute to 10 years ago. History has a curious trick of repeating itself, and the present situation seems to me to be an almost uncanny parallel of the situation Vermont and the Nation were in during 1940 and 1941.

In what Vermont regarded as the tense days of 1940 I had been doing newspaper work in this State, and then I left to do a similar task in Washington. In Vermont in 1940 there was a deep consciousness of the seriousness of the world situation. War with Germany and Japan was regarded as inevitable. When I got to Washington I was astounded as the lassitude of the Nation's Capital, Washington, it seemed to me, was still asleep.

Some months after I arrived in Washington—on September 17, 1941—several months before the fateful Pearl Harbor attack of December 7, the Vermont State Legislature voted a bonus for the Vermont National Guard, and in so doing declared that a state of war existed.

Everywhere in Washington it was being said, "You Vermonters are a belligerent lot, aren't you? What are you going to do, take on Germany all alone in that little State?"

My answer then was, "It's not a question of belligerency." Vermonters simply are able to recognize the side of a barn when they see it. Being a people accustomed to freedom, they cherish it enough to fight against all odds to keep it. The average Vermonter is a realist, who doesn't shut his eyes when he sees the muzzle of a gun poking around the side of a barn, hoping the gun will be gone when he wakes up.

Today this Nation is up against an antagonist who makes Hitler look like a minor-league player, and once again we find conservative Vermont way out ahead of Washington in looking for measures to defend the freedom of its people.

Here is the score. Governor-elect Lee E. Emerson has already called over Station WCAX for total mobilization, national-service registration, universal military service, wage, profit, and price controls.

Vermont's senior Senator, GEORGE D. AIKEN, says we are at war. He wants all-out efforts in every direction—national service registration, universal military service, and every other conceivable step; nothing will do but all-out methods right now, AIKEN says.

And Vermont's junior Senator, RALPH E. FLANDERS, also endorses total, all-out mobilization for war, provided the term is understood to include mobilization of all our psychological and spiritual resources. And by that, Senator FLANDERS, who has been devoting much study to foreign affairs, wants it to be understood he means a stepped-up campaign for the people of this country to get the voice of democracy behind the iron curtain to the people of Russia and all its satellite countries. That should be, Senator FLANDERS insists, the main job of our State Department right now.

Representative CHARLES A. PLUMLEY is another who says we are at war. He wants to have the democratic nations use every weapon at their command.

Maj. Gen. Merrit A. Edson, Vermont's commissioner of public safety, and head of civilian defense, joins the call for all-out mobilization. Edson, Vermont's only Congressional Medal of Honor winner, does not believe any half-way program will meet this situation.

President William Carlson, of the University of Vermont, is calling for universal military service right now. He was the first college president in the United States publicly to advocate such a step. Dr. Carlson wants to see every young man and young woman in the United States serve this country for 2 or 2½ years when he or she reaches the age of 18 or graduates from high school, whichever comes first.

"We are now at war," Dr. Carlson said today, "and we will have to take every single step we can to survive. This is my position and it is the position of the University of Vermont."

Incidentally, Dr. Carlson, a newcomer to Vermont, comments that Vermonters have a deeper grass roots understanding of world problems than people of many other States. He believes Vermonters in general are better informed because they sit around the kitchen fire talking world issues instead of gossiping about their neighbors.

The Very Reverend Daniel P. Lyons, president of St. Michael's College, was not long behind Dr. Carlson in urging military service.

Today, Father Lyons has a special message for the people of Vermont.

Commenting on President Truman's address to the Nation, Father Lyons said:

"I personally feel that the President is now convinced that it is no longer possible to do business with Russia. Most of us, I am sure, concur in this, for an atheist and a Christian never did stand on common ground. However, I see no reason for any of us to get panicky. There is always hope. While preparing for the worst and hoping for the best as the President said, let us all remember that divine providence still rules the world. If enough people pray for the conversion of atheistic Russia, there shall be peace."

To us in Vermont there is something very heartening in the rallying of all our leaders in a determination to face facts as they are and take every measure to meet the crisis.

Perhaps by the grace of God something of this same stubborn, rocky courage will communicate itself to the groggy, weary, confused leadership of the Nation's Capital.

I cannot forbear from reminding my listeners of the speech made by President Calvin Coolidge in Bennington on September 21, 1928:

"If the spirit of liberty should vanish in other parts of the Union and support of our institutions should languish, it could all be replenished from the generous store held by the people of the brave little State of Vermont."

Recommendations of the People of Kansas on Tax Issues

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK CARLSON
OF KANSAS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, December 20 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, the Kansas State Chamber of Commerce has submitted to me their recommendations on war emergency taxation for 1950 to 1951. These recommendations have been studied by the Kansas State Chamber of Commerce, and this organization, speaking for 2,400 business and professional people of Kansas, reflects through these recommendations the thinking of the people of Kansas on the vital tax issues of the day. I ask unanimous consent that these recommendations be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the recommendations were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RECOMMENDATIONS ON WAR EMERGENCY TAXATION: 1950–51

First, it is incumbent on the Government itself to take the first necessary step toward sound pay-as-we-go financing by cutting its nonwar spending to the bone, thus following the very advice its spokesmen have already given to the Nation's workers, housewives, and businessmen. The Government should also refrain from initiating new nonwar spending programs during this period when the needs of national defense are paramount, and it should postpone peacetime projects where shortages of labor and material exist.

Moreover, military expenditures should be constantly scrutinized in order to avoid unnecessary and wasteful outlays of funds for these purposes.

In other words, Congress should require the Government to demonstrate a bona fide need for additional revenues before acting to impose new taxes of any kind.

Second, in the event Congress then decides that additional tax revenues are needed to finance the war effort and maintain governmental solvency, the Kansas State Chamber would offer the following recommendations:

1. ALTERNATIVE TO THE SO-CALLED EXCESS-PROFITS TAX

The so-called excess-profits tax should be opposed in principle because it is administratively and economically unsound. Such a tax in peacetime is, of course the first step toward limitation of profits and the destruction of the incentive system. Any possible benefits that may be claimed for the enactment of such a tax are grossly exaggerated. The imposition of a so-called excess-profits tax can only result in increased costs to both the Government and the public generally. On the basis of past experience it has been demonstrated that an excess-profits tax discourages incentive for prudent management and encourages waste and inefficiency in operations to further contribute to the inflationary spiral. This type of tax is bound to penalize small businesses, especially the rapidly growing progressive companies and industries in favor of those that have been laggard or static.

Under any conditions such a tax would be detrimental in promoting the expansion of production so vital to the full development of the defense requirements of the Nation. Even with the application of complicated formulas and the use of various relief devices, it has been almost impossible to develop a fair and sound basis for measuring the normal profits which under no circumstances should be subjected to a discriminatory excess-profits tax.

Any abnormal profits which may be realized from the execution of Government contracts relating to the defense program can be effectively prevented through efficient over-all renegotiation, with the amount recaptured going to the Treasury. Over-all renegotiation has the advantage of allowing losses on some contracts to be offset against profits on the others and does not take away all of the profit incentive as do present repricing policies.

An excess-profits tax is costly to the Government to administer and greatly increases the compliance costs of the taxpayer as evidenced by the thousands of cases unsettled and in litigation under the law in effect at the termination of World War II. No logical basis appears to exist for the adoption of this type of tax when more expedient and simplified means of raising any additional needed revenues from corporations are available.

In lieu of a so-called excess-profits tax, and to avoid imposing too heavy a burden on small business, the Kansas State Chamber recommends a war-emergency tax on corporations in the form of a percentage applied to the combined normal and surtax paid by a corporation.

In the event such a tax is imposed, the normal corporate income-tax rate should be established at 18 percent, with the surtax rate remaining at 20 percent as now provided for the year 1951 in the 1950 Revenue Act. Thus the war-emergency tax, where possible, would be a percentage rate added to the total amount of the normal and surtax computed at such rates.

2. SUGGESTED EXCESS-PROFITS TAX FEATURES IF SUCH A TAX IS TO BE ENACTED

If, despite the many known inequitable and harmful effects of so-called excess-profits taxation, Congress should persist in enacting such a tax, then the measure should contain the following features:

(a) The general structure of the law should be the same as that of World War II, with which taxpayers are familiar. By this we mean that the excess-profits credit should be based on either invested capital or average earnings in a base period, at the taxpayer's option. The law should provide adequate relief provisions patterned after those contained in the former law, but expanded and revised where more equitable treatment can be achieved with less administrative difficulties.

(b) The income base period should be the 4-year period from 1946 to 1949, inclusive, with the growth formula and with the adjustment of one low year, patterned after the law in effect during World War II, with provision for adjustment to net increase or decrease of capital subsequent to the base period.

(c) Normal and surtax should be deducted in determining excess profits. Here again the normal corporate income-tax rate should not exceed 10 percent, as a protection to small businesses, and the surtax should remain at 20 percent as adopted for the year 1951 under the 1950 Revenue Act. Thus we would have a maximum 38-percent combined normal and surtax rate base from which to compute any excess-profits tax.

(d) Full credit should be given for borrowed capital, with corresponding disallowance of deductions for interest on borrowed capital. The previous law defined borrowed capital as "indebtedness evidenced by a bond, note, bill of exchange, debenture, certificate of indebtedness, mortgage, or deed of trust, and the base included 50 percent of such borrowed capital."

(e) Full credit should also be given for base-period earnings. The previous law allowed only 95 percent of the average base-period income. There is no justification in contending that corporation profits were actually excessive during the years 1946–49, in the light of the expanded economy with sustained high-level employment, production, price levels, and national income.

(f) The credit on invested capital should be at least that provided in the 1940 act which was 8 percent of invested capital.

(g) Accumulated earnings after the effective date of any excess-profits-tax law should be permitted to increase the invested-capital base and should also be permitted to increase the earnings credit.

3. ADDITIONAL EXCISE TAXES

If it should be necessary to raise more revenue than the present system will yield, even if augmented by additional taxes on corporate incomes, then there should be an expansion of the field of excise taxation as a defense measure. Such additional excise taxes should be imposed on all products except food.

4. TAX-EXEMPT ENTERPRISES

The State chamber's position favoring taxation of many types of enterprises now enjoying a tax-exempt status should still stand.

5. TRANSACTIONS TAXES

The State chamber still opposes the imposition of any transactions tax.

Why We Have Good Judges

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FORREST C. DONNELL
OF MISSOURI
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, December 20 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Why We Have Good Judges," from the Kansas City Star of Saturday, November 11, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHY WE HAVE GOOD JUDGES

In the last round-up of election news we note that the judges squeaked through on a "yes" vote of about 7 to 1. This refers, of course, to the Jackson County vote on circuit and higher court judges who hold office under the nonpartisan court plan.

If Missouri still had the old political system for judges they would have been out in the splatter of the campaign since early last summer. In Jackson County none could have been elected unless he had received machine endorsement before the primary. And according to the record under the old system the machine never liked to support a judge unless it had some political strings on him.

After the primary of a political system you would have seen Democratic and Republican candidates for the bench campaigning against each other. Last Tuesday all Democrats would have been elected regardless of relative merit.

The judicial election on the nonpartisan ballot was a very different story. So little was heard from the judges during the campaign that the only danger was that the public might forget to vote on them. Now that they have one-sided approval the judges go into their new terms entirely free from obligation to any politician or anyone else.

When the nonpartisan court plan was new, some of the judges were afraid of it. In the first elections held on the "yes" or "no" ballot, friends of the judicial candidates waged campaigns for their support. But experience with the plan soon showed that there was no purpose in campaigns. When a reasonably good judge asks public approval to stay in office the voters are glad to approve him.

The only real objection to the method is the fact that it virtually assures a judge lifetime tenure. Still, tenure under the plan isn't quite as certain as the life appointments to the Federal courts. We haven't heard that many Federal judges abuse their security. And the over-all effect of the Missouri system has been excellent. The plan needs only a decent retirement provision to make it ideal.

Death of Curtis Longino Waller, Judge of the Circuit Court of Appeals of the Fifth Circuit

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLAUDE PEPPER
OF FLORIDA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, December 20 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, on the 11th of July one of the outstanding jurists of this country, one of the noblest and finest men who ever lived, with whom I had once the honor of being a law partner, died. He was Judge Curtis L. Waller, of the Circuit Court of Appeals of the Fifth Circuit. The University of Florida Law Review dedicated its last issue to Judge Waller, and I have the honor to submit those dedicatory remarks at the end of this statement.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that they may be incorporated in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On July 11, 1950, a judicial sun, in the full luster and glow of noonday brilliance, after a brief flicker and pause, dropped suddenly behind the horizon of life into eternity and immortality. For on that day, Curtis Longino Waller, of the Circuit Court of Appeals of the Fifth Circuit, Florida's highest ranking member of the Federal judiciary, died, after a brief illness, at 63. Into the grave with him went the hearts of a countless host who admired him for the virile strength of his mind and loved him for the grandeur of his character and the noble beauty of his spirit.

Appointed as United States district judge for the northern and southern districts of Florida in 1940, he was elevated to the circuit court of appeals in 1943. His judicial career climaxed a rich and full life which began in Silver Creek, Miss., where his family was rooted and revered, and an uncle was governor.

He took his literary work at Mississippi College and his law degree at Millsaps College. He was a high-school teacher; secretary to the gifted Pat Harrison in the House of Representatives in Congress; an aviator in World War I.

Returned from the war, he immediately gained distinction at the bar of Mississippi. He served in the Mississippi House of Representatives. In 1924 he moved to Tallahassee, Fla., and at once assumed leadership in an eminent Leon County bar.

His counsel was sagacious, his thinking astute and profound. His character, about which all of his life no man ever dared to whisper, won profound respect for every utterance he made to client or court. He was thorough, and when his preparation was finished, sure of his case. He had the genius as a lawyer of catching phrase and homily or humorous rhetoric which endeared him alike to court and jury. His standing at the bar and in the community caused him to be drafted against his will to serve Leon County in the house of representatives in the legislature and to accept appointment as State attorney of the second judicial circuit, for a brief period.

He had an enviable aptitude for the bench, for he had that balance of judgment, that innate sense of justice, that courage of conviction, as well as that saturation in legal principle and precedent, which makes the judge. To a judicial mind he brought a gentleman's code and warm heart. His happy diversion from labor was fishing and he wrote intriguing fishing stories for national sportsmen's magazines. In the camp or in the friendly circle which he so much loved, he had no superior as a storyteller.

He was too faithful a disciple of the law not to follow it but he was too just a judge not to rebel at wrong, even what he thought was wrong law. He believed in social justice and progress and as a citizen he supported liberal men and liberal movements, but when he sat as a judge he was the shield of the individual and woe to those pressing down upon the citizen who fell upon the poniard of his pen. As a district judge he had the faculty to grasp the issues, to rule promptly and forcibly and to dispatch the court's business both quickly and well. As an appellate judge he spurned verbosity, he scorned empty rhetoric and cut through the confusion of fact and word with the lance of a penetrating mind and what Mr. Justice Glenn Terrell called "incisive, pointed, and direct statement."

In one of his dissenting opinions, Judge Waller said: "I hesitate to ascribe to Congress the absurd design to tax a gift to a babe in arms because his estate must be managed by someone sui juris, exercising the powers of a guardian or parent, while a gift to an adult, requiring no managing third party, is tax free. Congress likes adult voters, but surely not that well." Fondren et al. v. Com. of I. R. (141 F. 2d 422).

But he could put a romantic shaft upon his arrow: In Crews v. U. S. (160 F. R. 2d 747), he began the opinion of the court: "The beautiful Suwannee River—the mention of which calls to memory a plaintive melody of strumming banjos, humming bees, childhood's playful hours, a hut among the bushes, and a longing to go back to the place where the old folks stay—was the scene of the cruel and revolting crime that provoked the gesture of dealing out justice that is this case."

His judicial reputation was rising all over the country. The law he loved has lost one of its finest and best.

We became friends shortly after 1925 and, until he went away, our lives, like our hearts, were close together.

When he was lowered beneath the gentle pine which is his sentinel in Tallahassee, there came back to my mind the noble words of Antony over the body of Brutus at Philippi:

"His life was gentle, and the elements
So mix'd in him that Nature might stand up
And say to all the world, 'This was a man!'"

And if we add "and a great and just judge," there is a fitting epitaph for Curtis L. Waller.

Well does the University of Florida Law Review, edited by those destined to become builders of the law, dedicate this issue to one, who in the language Dean Pond once used, "has left in the edifice of the law so many stones bearing his own craftsman's mark."

Congress Should Give Us an Adequate Merchant Fleet

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WARREN G. MAGNUSON
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, December 20 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, a very fine and well-written editorial entitled "Congress Should Give Us an Adequate Merchant Fleet," which was published recently in the New York Inquirer of December 18, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESS SHOULD GIVE US AN ADEQUATE MERCHANT FLEET

One of the major national problems which the Eighty-second Congress, which convenes next month, should tackle and solve is that of the American merchant marine.

The United States should have a mercantile fleet greater than that of any other land on earth, not as a matter of luxury but of vital necessity.

We need such a fleet from the standpoint of economics, defense, and national prestige. It is the duty of the statesmen in our National Capital to guarantee our having a merchant marine in every respect worthy of the United States of America. Yet those men have consistently refused to give due attention to our mercantile shipping needs. The costly lessons taught us by the First World War and since that conflict passed into history, as to the role which our merchant marine should always be prepared to play in national and international life, have gone for nothing, as far as Congress is concerned.

Interesting and instructive information as to our merchant fleet is contained in a dispatch from Washington, December 10, to the New York Times. It tells us:

"A steady decline since 1946 in the amount of United States foreign trade carried in American flag ships was reported today.

"The decline was cited in a statement issued by the Joint Committee for the American Merchant Marine, an organization sponsored by maritime labor and management and the Federal Government.

"The report showed that in 1946, American flag vessels carried 67.6 percent of United States foreign trade; in 1947, 59.8 percent; 1948, 54.8 percent; 1949, 49.8 percent, and in 1950, based on the January–June figure, 46.2 percent.

"The report also called attention to the fact that Russia in 1950 was tenth on the list of maritime nations based on tonnage. Russian merchant ships were numbered at 437 with a gross deadweight tonnage total of 1,824,000.

"The joint committee said that while the United States active seagoing merchant marine was noticeably higher in total tonnage since 1939, 'it is woefully weak in fast modern passenger-carrying vessels quickly convertible to troop transports in event of emergency.'

"It was noted that in seagoing tonnage now being built for the more important maritime nations of the world, the United States 'is at the bottom of the list,' surpassed even by its former enemies of World War II and by the principal recipients of its various aid programs."

American labor and capital, and the American people as a whole, have a vital interest in the welfare of the American merchant marine.

Our present position of the mercantile shipping world is entirely unworthy of this great Nation of ours. It is of vital national importance that the new Congress, at the earliest possible moment, take up the problem of the American merchant marine and that it devise and put into operation a merchant shipping policy that will insure our possessing a mercantile fleet fully capable of serving the requirements of the Republic in peace and war. Such a fleet must outclass, in tonnage and quality, every other merchant fleet in existence.

Notwithstanding the many handicaps under which it is operating (and these include discriminatory measures enforced against it by foreign countries) the American merchant marine is giving excellent service to passengers and freight forwarders alike. It is for Congress to decide whether it will be enabled to play, in the American order of things, the all-important role dictated by common sense and national honor.

Foreign countries cannot be blamed for having such a low opinion of us because of the manner in which the lawmakers in Washington, elected to the House and the Senate by the people of the United States, have treated our merchant shipping policy.

The Eighty-second Congress should turn over an entirely new leaf as far as the American merchant marine is concerned, and insure that the Republic shall possess a mercantile fleet wholly commensurate with its position in the family of nations.

Two Hundred and Fiftieth Anniversary of the Founding of the City of Detroit

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. BRICKER
OF OHIO
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, December 20 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. BRICKER. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON], who is absent on an assignment by the Senate, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, a statement regarding the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the city of Detroit. A year-long celebration of that event will commence in Detroit on January 1. As a Senator from Ohio, a neighbor of the State of Michigan, I am personally pleased to join in salute to Detroit and its long history of accomplishments.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

January 1, 1951, will mark the beginning of one of the most impressive civic celebrations in the history of this country. The occasion is the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the city of Detroit, the oldest major city west of the Alleghenies. Detroit's two hundred and fiftieth birthday festival will be a year-long celebration of that city's history and a rededication of its human and physical resources for a future of peace and freedom.

Detroit has played a unique role in the history of the United States. It was founded in 1701 by Antoine de la Mothe Cadillac to assure France's control of the great northern territories. Within a few years it became one of the most important ports in the new world. Not only did Detroit control access to the north, but it also was a center for the fur industry from the day of Cadillac until the time of the American Fur Co.

Later, in the nineteenth century, the lumber industry of the Northwest was born in the Detroit area. As the forests slowly receded, Detroit's long climb to its present position as a city of industry began. Detroit is now known as the industrial center of the world, sending its products to the most remote corners of the earth.

Detroit has earned many laurels. It has been called "Detroit the Beautiful," "Dynamic Detroit," and the "City of Destiny." All of these terms are appropriate; but today, faced with the threatening visage of totalitarianism on every side, the title "Arsenal of Democracy" which was earned during the two World Wars, is perhaps most suitable.

We are threatened by an international holocaust of terrible proportions. Our hearts go out to the boys and men fighting on Korean battle fronts to preserve the life and ideals we believe in. Our debt to them can never be expressed, much less paid.

It must be remembered, however, that this is a war not only of man against man, army against army, but also a war of supplier against supplier. In the battle of supplies, America has never been defeated. We have the greatest production potential in the world, and much of the credit for this fact must go to Detroit. Were it not for the factories and people who man these factories of Detroit, the last war might well have ended differently. Fortunately, however, the facilities of that great city have always been ready for periods of crisis.

During the ensuing year, Detroit will commemorate the part it has played in our history. Detroit, a living, working example of our American philosophy, will display to the world the physical and cultural benefits of a free, democratic society and its readiness to serve the Nation.

How Can We Stop the Soviet Union?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 20, 1950

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, so much has been said during the past few months which has been indecently critical of our Secretary of State, Dean Acheson, and so little has been said in his defense, that perhaps in order to make a true and correct evaluation of this splendid public official, we should take a little time and endeavor now to secure a fair and correct index of the man and his statesmanship by reading the radio address which he so splendidly delivered on November 28, 1950.

I had occasion a few days ago to reread the same more carefully in the December 7 issue of the Machinist and was much impressed by its force and clarity in dealing with the first subject of the hour.

It appears that Secretary Acheson encountered his first bellowing reactionary resentment when he stated in substance that he would still stay by his friend, Alger Hiss, even though he had been convicted by a jury and sentenced by a trial court. As a lawyer, everyone knows, or should know, that if a defendant after conviction appeals a case, which he has a perfect right to do, the presumption of innocence does and should still prevail because the judgment pronounced by the trial court on the jury's verdict is not final in any sense of the word and does not settle definitely the issue of innocence or guilt.

It, however, seems that certain people have neither the ability nor the inclination to give full force and effect to the great presumption of innocence accorded to every accused person not finally convicted of crime. They regard a judgment of a lower court a final judgment, even though an appeal to a higher tribunal has been perfected.

Ordinarily a person is to be complimented if he stands by a friend in his dark hour of trouble, but in Secretary Acheson's case, misguided men seem to follow not the example taught by the Nazarene to lay down his very life for a friend, or the exemplification of true friendship as disclosed by Sidney Carton, in Charles Dickens' book The Tale of Two Cities when he changed places in the death-cell with Darnay, the husband of Lucie Manette and suffered death by the guillotine in Darnay's place and stead.

Some people today in spite of the finer examples of the past, and the better teachings of the present, seem to think that a friend should be abandoned in his great hour of need before his case in the courts of men has been concluded. These people are perhaps devotees of the verse:

> What is friendship but a name,
> A charm that lulls to sleep.
> A shade that follows wealth and fame,
> And leaves the wretch to weep.

The speech which I have heretofore referred to is as follows:

HOW WE CAN STOP THE SOVIET UNION—SIX STEPS IN THE STRATEGY OF FREEDOM AS EXPLAINED BY DEAN ACHESON, SECRETARY OF STATE, UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, IN A NATION-WIDE RADIO ADDRESS ON NOVEMBER 28, 1950

The questions raised by these acts of (Communist) aggression in Korea go far beyond the contours of this small and remote peninsula. They have to be viewed as part of a world picture. To be fully understood, they must be seen as part of the world-wide operations of the international Communist movement.

The increasing boldness of the international Communist movement, and its willingness to use overt aggression, and to accept the deliberate risk of war, make it increasingly urgent for all American citizens to face squarely the danger that confronts us, and to give vigorous and united support to the measures we must take to meet this danger.

Those who control the Soviet Union and the international Communist movement have made clear their fundamental design. It is to hold and solidify their power over people and territories within their reach, however ruthless the means required.

The danger to the rest of the world created by this design arises out of the belief made amply clear in Bolshevist political writings that the holding of power by the rulers of the Soviet Union requires the complete subversion or forcible destruction of the countries now free of their control.

They are encouraged to act on this belief by the illusion that, in so doing, they are helping along the inevitable course of history. According to the Bolshevist interpretation, history points to the collapse of non-Soviet states and their replacement by Soviet-style and Soviet-controlled states. Conflict is anticipated in Bolshevist theory as inevitable.

The hostility of Soviet intentions, taken alone, would not produec so grave a threat. But the combination of these intentions and Soviet military power creates very grave danger to the survival of free nations and free institutions, a danger which must not be underestimated.

All governments which are now free, and all responsible citizens of free societies must face, with a sense of urgency, the capabilities for conquest and destruction in the hands of the rulers of the Soviet Union.

The problem we have been called upon to solve, therefore, is: What course of action will enable us to maintain our freedom and bring about a peaceful resolution of this world crisis; or, if despite our best efforts aggression does take place, will provide a basis for defeating it?

Our essential purpose is, as it has always been in our history, to preserve our free institutions, so that freedom and justice may survive and continue to flourish.

We wish to do this peacefully, because peace is the climate in which our free institutions flourish best. But we have shown in our history that we hold these values so dear that if we must, we will fight for them.

The course of action we have chosen is to join with our allies in building the strength of the free world—as a bulwark against Soviet aggression.

The purpose of this strength is not aggression. It is the very opposite. It is to deter such aggression.

This involves building military strength, but it requires no less the buttressing of all the other forms of power—economic, political, social, and moral—and the utmost resolution and unity among the free nations of the world.

Over a period of time the rulers of the Soviet Union, confronted by a strong and confident free world, may be obliged to abandon their expansionist aims.

To build the strength of the free world is a hard course. It involves great effort and much sacrifice both by our own people, and by all the people of the free world. It offers no promise of relief from these burdens in the near future. It makes no guarantee of peace. But it is rooted in the principles by which we live, and it offers us the best realistic approach to the problem of peace, and the preservation of our freedom.

The main elements of the strategy by which we are seeking to carry out this course of action—the strategy of freedom—are now well-established as national policy. They have emerged as practical responses to the problems we have encountered, and they have found general support in the Nation.

There are six main elements in the strategy of freedom.

First is the development of an international order for the preservation of peace and freedom, under the United Nations.

The Charter of the United Nations expresses the universal aspirations of mankind, and the organization itself is a symbol of these aspirations.

But the United Nations is also more than a symbol. It is a means through which we can take practical, day-by-day steps toward the building of a stable international community.

As an organization in which most nations participate, the United Nations can also help to bring about the accommodations of interest and the adjustments of differences which are essential to peace in a world of change.

Our action in Korea is intended to support the authority of the United Nations against aggression. In the current session of the General Assembly, we have initiated a number of measures designed to increase the effectiveness of the United Nations action against aggression. We intend to do our full part in helping the United Nations to grow in strength.

The second element in the strategy of freedom is the development of regional groupings, within the framework of the United Nations. To ensure their collective security, free nations are engaged in cooperative defense measures, not possible on a universal basis at the present time.

The keystone of the defense system of the free world is being built in the North Atlantic community, and among the states of the Western Hemisphere.

A whole network of cooperative institutions has been developing among the free nations of the North Atlantic and Western European area, each a practical response to a felt need. The problems they face are extremely complex, but progress has been made toward overcoming ancient national hostilities, and in developing a common will and a sense of confidence in the potentialities of the North Atlantic community, working together as a community.

In this hemisphere, the accomplishments of the Organization of American States in promoting unity of action have been remarkable. Support of this organization is fundamental to our policy.

The essential ingredient in these regional developments has been a sense of community interest among neighbor nations. The development of further regional organizations depends in the first instance upon the existence of this community sense among the people of other areas.

The third element in our strategy of freedom is the rapid building up of military strength at home and among our allies. I stress the word "rapid" because the period of greatest danger is directly before us. Our defense must not only be strong enough, it must come soon enough.

There is only one test of whether our defense preparations are adequate: that is to measure them against a sober calculation of the danger which faces us.

So measured, the defense efforts of the United States and other free nations are inadequate. A greatly increased scale and tempo of effort is required on the part of all free nations to enable them to overcome this inadequacy at the earliest possible moment.

The fourth element is economic cooperation. This has a dual character. It contributes powerfully to the building of our defenses against external attack. It also is an instrument for helping to build healthy societies in which the vitality and the promise of freedom find practical expression—in comparison with which the decadence and despair of Communist tyranny is starkly exposed.

Although the amount of resources available for economic assistance is limited by the defense requirements imposed upon us by Soviet action, even under the burden of rearmament, free societies can more effectively provide for human well-being and advancement than tyrannical regimes. The productive power of freemen, who are aware of the dangers that face them and who are determined to meet the challenge to their freedom, cannot be matched by authoritarian societies.

With our technical assistance, the resolve of the free peoples of Latin America, Asia, Africa, and the Middle East to better the conditions of their lives can become a powerful drive against the age-old banes of poverty and disease and the political instability which often accompanies them. Men everywhere have awakened to the opportunities for progress which modern science and technology have opened. We can help them to help themselves, and it is in our interest to do so.

Our technical assistance is not philanthropy, for here our principles and our self-interest coincide. As the people of underdeveloped areas rise from poverty, not only will our own economy benefit, but also and even more important the real promise of freedom will expose the false promises of Bolshevik imperialism, and the peoples of these countries will grow in their recognition of the common interest and purpose of the free nations.

So far as possible, economic cooperation, like defense cooperation and collective security programs, is being carried on through the United Nations and regional organizations in order to strengthen international institutions devoted to peace and security.

The fifth element in the strategy of freedom is a readiness at all times to negotiate just settlements of international disputes and to find just accommodations of conflicting interests. Our experience has demonstrated that the Soviet rulers cannot be expected to accept fair and equal negotiation so long as they feel capable of imposing their own terms or exacting their own price. Their concept of negotiation is that it should record the facts of power rather than the requirements of justice. We shall not seek to use our power in this way, but as the free world develops strength, the Soviet rulers may find it advantageous to adjust differences equitably rather than to seek to impose their demands.

The free nations must always be prepared to enter into genuine negotiations, and even to take the initiative in efforts to bring about honest negotiation.

If the issues are clear, freemen will not be prey to unrealistic expectations, nor to propaganda abuse of the negotiating process. It is in the long perspective that results may be expected, not in the fits and starts of shifting tactics.

Because our earnest desire is peace, we shall remain constantly receptive to genuine negotiation. With the confidence that comes of strength and the humility that comes from our devotion to Christian principles, we shall be endlessly patient in working for peace. And we shall at the same time be endlessly alert to defend the bases of our national life.

The sixth element in the strategy of freedom is a firm adherence in all our actions, at home and abroad, to the moral values which give meaning to our lives.

We are a young country, an enthusiastic people, and despite our great interest in material progress, we are idealistic.

We do not always present our best side to the world. In our enthusiasm and drive we often do not take care to make ourselves understood, and expect others to recognize us for what we are. We have launched a greatly expanded information program to bring knowledge of ourselves to other peoples, which the President has called the Campaign of Truth.

It is our purpose to carry to all parts of the world the facts about what is happening in America and in the world, because it is a fundamental part of our democratic faith that people, if informed of the truth, will make sound judgments.

What is even more important than what we say to the world is how we conduct ourselves, at home and abroad. The force of example and action is the factor which finally determines what our influence is to be.

If we are to be worthy of the leadership that derives from our power, we must be sure that we are true to the values and principles upon which our society is founded. It is the example of democracy at work, vigorous, healthy, respectful of its first principles, growing in freedom and justice and opportunity, that can inspire ourselves and others to meet the tasks ahead with hope and confidence.

Without this, which depends on every one of us, on the everyday conduct of each citizen, the strategy of freedom would become as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal.

These are the elements of our national foreign policy of the strategy of freedom. This is the course by which we seek to avoid war and to secure peace.

No one can guarantee that war will not come. The present crisis is extremely serious. Whether reason will prevail is only partly for us to decide. We must hope and strive for the best while we prepare for the worst.

This is a responsibility, not just of a few public officials, not just of the Congress, but of the whole American people. The qualities we must demonstrate—steadiness, moderation, restraint, constancy of purpose, and flexibility in action, imagination, wisdom, maturity—these qualities are possible for us as a Nation only if the American people participate as individuals in striving to make our society worthy of the hopes that free men everywhere have placed in it.

A deep understanding of the forces we are dealing with, and the role we must play, must be acquired by each of us. Every single individual has a share of this responsibility.

The six elements of the strategy of freedom—support of the United Nations, development of regional organizations, the rapid building up of our strength in partnership with our allies, economic cooperation, readiness to negotiate, and a firm adherence to the fundamental purposes and principles of our society—constitute a national policy, not a party policy. They have emerged from a long process of discussion and consideration as the practical requirements of a policy adequate to the problems which confront us. They are rooted in our traditions. They find general support in both parties.

It is right and proper that there should be differences of opinion among us about the execution of this policy, and about questions of emphasis, priorities, application, and administration. No one has a monopoly of wisdom, and the vigor and vitality of a democratic society derives from free discussion and debate and the consent which flows from understanding.

However vigorous our debates may be, it should be made clear to all that our country is united in its determination to hew to the strategy of freedom which is our national policy.

The Nation's peril is our challenge. The united will of the people must be our answer.

Mail Pay

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERBERT H. LEHMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, December 20 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, in the Washington Post of December 14 there appeared an editorial discussing the proposed separation of straight airline subsidies from the cost of transporting air mail. As the Senate knows, there are several proposals to this effect now pending before the Congress. I ask unanimous consent to insert the interesting editorial on this subject in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MAIL PAY

What started out as a relatively simple proposal to separate air mail pay from subsidies to the airlines generated an almost unbelievable amount of confusion before the House was through with it. The Heselton bill passed by the House on Monday is weak in some respects, but it meets many of the objectives of the administration and the Hoover Commission. It is obviously a compromise, as the 66–0 vote indicates; however, it does serve to place subsidies to the airlines in the open and apart from reimbursement for carrying the mail. Moreover, Chairman EDWIN JOHNSON, of the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee, has promised to press for enactment of a similar bill in the Senate, though committee action so far has been blocked by Senator BREWSTER.

Aside from the objections of a few diehards who resisted any separation whatever, most of the discussions centered on how mail pay should be determined. The airlines stood behind the rejected Hall bill, which would have required the Civil Aeronautics Board to fix a reasonable rate without direct reference to cost. A considerable concession was made to this stand in the Heselton bill as finally passed. All reference to cost allocation as between mail, passengers, and freight was eliminated; the bill merely provides that the CAB shall determine "reasonable and necessary cost" plus a fair return to the airlines.

Although this is not as strong as a legislative directive to the CAB on how to appraise costs, it certainly implies that the CAB must go thoroughly into cost analysis. There is no warrant for accepting the present service rates paid to four of the big airlines, as necessarily valid. Studies now in progress in the CAB indicate that the Board will be able to come up with at least average costs for various types of aircraft well in advance of the March 31, 1952, deadline. It will be important in this connection for the CAB to arrange a system of long-term contracts which will facilitate payment without endless litigation.

Quite properly the Heselton bill encompasses foreign as well as domestic operations of American carriers. Despite the feeling of some airlines that subsidies on foreign operations might become political targets, Congress and the public need to know the facts. Another salutary provision of the bill is a restriction on the payment of subsidy to lines carrying the mail. Several cargo carriers which had pleaded for operating privileges on the ground that they would not ask a subsidy later changed their position and sought to be included. This would have thrown the concept of regulation into a cocked hat.

Whether the separation of mail pay from subsidy will actually save money is a moot question. That, however, is not the purpose of the legislation. Many considerations such as national defense and public necessity enter into the determination of subsidy, and it is well to keep the determination flexible. But subsidies have no real relation to mail pay, and they ought to be justified individually on merit. When subsidies are in the open there, of course, will be the danger that they will become enmeshed in politics, but that is not a valid reason for keeping them hidden. We hope that the Senate will quickly follow the lead of the House so as to give the CAB a start in meeting its enlarged responsibility.

Unique Appeal to Santa Claus

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY C. DWORSHAK
OF IDAHO
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, December 20 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Unique Appeal to Santa Claus," which appeared in the December 11 issue of the Eugene Register-Guard, published in Eugene, Oreg.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNIQUE APPEAL TO SANTA CLAUS

Ever since Francis P. Church wrote the famous reply to Virginia O'Hanlon in the old New York Sun, editors young and old have been striving for new and effective ways to express the spirit of Christmas. (Many years ago we decided it is impossible to improve on the story of Christmas as it is related in the gospels of St. Matthew and St. Luke, so we reprint those Scriptures annually.)

In the last issue of the Emerald, before exams and the Christmas holidays, Student Editor Anita Holmes has printed a unique appeal to Santa Claus which we take the privilege of copying:

"DEAR SANTA—TAKE, DON'T GIVE

"Don't give us anything for Christmas this year, Sir Santa. We don't want a Cadillac or a fur coat or a vacation at Sun Valley.

"We only want you to take things away from us this December 25, Mr. Claus. The greatest gift you could deliver would be the removal of some of that which we already have.

"TAKE AWAY DISTRUST

"When you clean distrust from every heart, you'll take war away from our twentieth century. And you'll remove forever that schism separating ours and the Russian world. What a great gift that would be—disappearance of distrust.

"TAKE AWAY POVERTY AND HUNGER AND WANT

"With one sleigh-bell ring, sweep away our slums and empty stomachs and yearnings for a higher standard of living. But don't let anybody tell you that communism will be the eradicator of poverty and hunger and want.

"TAKE AWAY IGNORANCE

"This is a big order, but if you could possibly do it, most other ills would go too. Incidentally, Santa, if you happen to have a spare brownie assigned to this project, he might do away with final exams at a certain Oregon school.

"TAKE AWAY PETTINESS

"Take the smallness out of people. Make them forget their crafty ways, and look to their neighbors rather than themselves.

"TAKE AWAY SELFISHNESS

"Put it back in Pandora's box, and surely you will have removed evil's greatest root. If you can't give us any of these other 'take aways,' please do something about selfishness.

"With it gone, Christmas would truly be here."

Miss Holmes has expresed what millions of people are feeling with the approach of Christmas, 1950. The Scriptures tell us that "it is more blessed to give than to receive" and that has always been interpreted as the spirit of Christmas. But in order to achieve the true spirit of giving, some things need to be taken away from us and Miss Holmes has listed them accurately. We have an idea that this little piece of hers will be reprinted in newspapers from coast to coast and it may become one of the "minor classics" of the season. It carries an idea which may endure long after her authorship is forgotten.

The AMA Shouldn't Lie

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 19, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, during this fall's campaign, the American Medical Association spent millions of dollars to confuse our public health needs and block all proposals to fill them. There is still an amazing amount of misinformation in circulation on these subjects.

With permission to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD, I attach an article which does much to put the discussion of these issues on a straight factual plane. It is entitled "The AMA Shouldn't Lie," by Oscar Ewing, Federal Security Administrator, which appears in the official magazine of the American Federation of Labor, the American Federationist, in the December issue:

THE AMA SHOULDN'T LIE

(By Oscar Ewing)

Serious illness costs more than you can afford to pay. That is, unless you belong to the one American family out of five with an income of more than $5,000 a year; or unless you have no income at all and can qualify as a charity case.

National health insurance would enable you to pay for good medical care by setting aside a portion of your wages each time you're paid, just as you do now to get the social-security protection of old-age and survivors insurance.

Sickness is unpredictable. Your next illness may cost you anywhere from a few dollars to hundreds or even thousands of dollars. National health insurance would operate on the sound American principle of putting aside a portion of earnings as protection for the future. It is simply an extension of social security to cover medical care.

When illness strikes, you would not have to go into debt or onto charity in order to pay doctor and hospital bills. You would not need to put off seeing the doctor through fear of being unable to pay the bill. Seeing your doctor before an illness becomes serious would help him head off disaster and keep you in better health.

In the heat of the recent political campaign, national health insurance was shamefully misrepresented by reactionary groups. National health insurance is not a plan to socialize medicine. The doctors would not work for the government, nor would the Government tell them how to practice medicine. There would be no change in the relationship between patient and doctor—except for the removal of the present dollar barrier. A program which proposes to better the health of every American deserves studied consideration rather than name-calling.

Under national health insurance, 1½ percent of your wages would be withheld and your employer would contribute a like amount, just as in old-age and survivors insurance. These payroll taxes, paid by workers and employers across the country, would help to build up a fund out of which would be paid the doctor and hospital bills of the worker and his dependents.

Let us suppose, for example, you become suddenly ill—a sharp pain in the abdomen. Your wife suggests you had better see a doctor. You aren't held back by the fear of "Can I afford it?" because you've already been paying for the right to medical care through payroll deductions. So you decide to go to see a doctor—or, if you're feeling quite ill, you phone and ask him to drop around.

You can choose any doctor who is taking part in the national health insurance plan. It may well be the same family doctor you've always called, or wanted to call, in emergencies.

Your doctor diagnoses your condition, perhaps after consultation with a specialist, as appendicitis. He sends you to a good hospital, where a skilled surgeon performs the operation. With good nursing care, you are back on the job in a couple of weeks. And you don't have the worry of "How am I ever gaing to pay for it?" The doctor's bill and hospital bill will be paid from the national fund which you and your employer helped build.

It's as simple as that. Your insurance would entitle you and your dependents to home and office calls by your doctor, treatment by specialists, hospital and nursing care up to 60 days, eyeglasses, hearing aids, costly medicines, X-rays, and laboratory tests. It would also cover, to a limited degree, dental care and home nursing.

Fees and rate standards would be established by a board in your own community made up of local citizens and, of course, representatives of the health professions. Strictly professional matters would be decided by local councils of doctors. A Federal board would establish broad standards to assure that the system operated without discrimination and that only accredited doctors and hospitals took part.

Perhaps you are now covered by voluntary health insurance. These plans serve a useful purpose, but they don't pay all your sickness bills. They also cost too much to meet the needs of low-income groups. As a matter of fact, 86,000,000 Americans still have no health insurance protection of any kind.

Operating costs and profits in individual commercial policies run over 60 percent, leaving less than 40 cents from each premium dollar to pay your medical bills. Overhead in the group commercial plans runs about 30 percent. The strictly nonprofit voluntary plans show a better record. But even here the overhead for hospitalization plans (like Blue Cross) runs to about 15 percent of permiums; for surgical-medical plans (like Blue Shield), it runs about 23 percent.

Very few voluntary plans will give you anything like complete protection. Under most plans you must still dig into your own pocket to pay for the doctor, special nursing, expensive medicines, and anything beyond routine care. Very few plans offer preventive medicine, inoculations, prenatal and postnatal care, medical care at home, or periodic check-ups.

Actually, the Blue Cross hospitalization plan pays only 21 percent of the average family's medical bills. Blue Cross and Blue Shield, providing both hospitalization and doctors' services, pay only 35 percent of the family's medical bills.

National health insurance, however, is only a part of the President's program for raising the levels of America's health. Enabling workers and their families to pay their medical bills will insure greater protection of the Nation's health, but we also need more doctors and hospitals, an extension of public health services, intensified research, and means to return the handicapped to productive jobs.

We have made great strides in the past 50 years in reducing the toll of disease. The average child born this year can look forward to about 20 years longer life than one born in 1900. We have virtually wiped out smallpox, diphtheria, and typhoid fever. In our better hospitals lives of more mothers and infants are being saved than ever before.

We are proud of our progress, but we cannot call it good enough. These figures offer some idea of a few of the problems yet to be solved: at least 8,000,000 of our people are in need of treatment for mental disorders, 190,000 die every year from cancer, 460,000 from heart disease; some 40,000 babies die every year in premature births.

There is a tremendous job to be done for the Nation's children. Half a million have rheumatic fever or heart disorders; another 500,000 have orthopedic or spastic defects; 1,000,000 have defective hearing; 4,000,000 have visual defects; 20,000,000 need dental attention.

Ill health is costing America $27,000,000,000 a year in lost wages and production—$8,500,000,000 in medical and health costs. At a time when we are working to gear the Nation for defense, 1,500,000,000 days are being lost each year through illness. Nearly 3,000,000 persons are totally disabled, their productive ability lost to the Nation.

Of course, we can't hope to solve these problems overnight. But thousands of our deaths are preventable, and much could be done to reduce illness and disability. We could, for example, do a better job if more of the country were brought up to the level of medical care found in the more progressive States. Too often your chances of recovering from an illness depends on where you live. Our best hospitals are found in the large cities, where there's more wealth. These centers also attract the bulk of our health personnel—doctors, dentists, nurses, and laboratory workers.

The distribution of doctors varies as much as 1 for every 500 persons in Massachusetts or the District of Columbia to 1 for every 1,500 persons in Mississippi or New Mexico. In two counties out of every five there is no accredited general hospital. There is no full-time health department in one-third of our counties, in which 40,000,000 people live.

We are making progress, yes; but we still need to extend good medical care to more people who can't get it or can't afford it. We must keep improving our defenses against disease and disability, just as we strengthen our defenses against other threats to America's welfare. Our citizens' health is a vital part of our Nation's strength. That's why, along with national health insurance, the President has recommended other measures needed to fill in the gaps in American medical care.

The Hospital Survey and Construction Act is enabling us to increase our hospital facilities, especially in areas of need. It provides Federal funds to help States and communities build new hospitals and health centers. Since passage of the law in 1946 over a thousand new hospital projects have been started. This is progress, although we really should double our present number of hospitals.

As a matter of fact, only 14 out of every 100 counties in the United States meet the accepted standard of 4½ general hospital beds for each 1,000 of population. Your chance of getting into a hospital when you or someone in your family becomes seriously ill may depend on how rapidly this program goes forward.

We need to extend protective health services by seeing that every county has a full-time health department. Each community can strive to improve its own health services. Often State or Federal aid will be needed.

A good health department serves as the watchdog of your community's health. Among the services it should provide are food and milk inspections, water pollution control, home nursing care, mass case-finding to disclose unsuspected diseases, venereal disease treatment centers, crippled children's services, and maternal and child care clinics. There should be one public-health nurse for every 6,500 persons, but there was only 1 for every 63,700 in 1948. Your own health is more fully protected in a city or county with an up-to-date health department.

You undoubtedly have read about the new treatments that have been developed as a result of medical research. No one could fail to be impressed by the miraculous results obtained from the use of such drugs as sulfa, penicillin, and cortisone. Congress has reflected the public's enthusiasm by providing additional funds for research, notably in cancer, heart disease, and mental disorders.

The National Institutes of Health of the Federal Security Agency have developed into the world's foremost laboratories for medical research. Federal funds are also being used to assist independent medical research projects in American hospitals, universities, and other institutions.

We are still in need of more research in the chronic diseases which attack the aged. We need greater study of the hazards which menace our children and infants.

Federal funds invested in medical research pay human and financial dividends out of all proportion to cost. Yet until recently we were spending more research money on plant and animal diseases than on human diseases. The chance of restoring a member of your family to health may depend on the progress we make in medical research.

It is an inexcusable loss to American productivity to deprive physically disabled persons of jobs because proper medical care or rehabilitation services are not available. With no way to support themselves, these people become a problem to their families and must often rely on public support.

Fortunately, we are making headway in preparing these citizens for jobs through our Federal-State program of vocational rehabilitation. In the past 6 years some 280,000 disabled workers have received medical care and training for jobs which match their abilities rather than their disabilities and actual placement.

There remain, however, perhaps 1,500,000 persons who need rehabilitation. More Federal funds invested in this program would be many times repaid, not only in the taxes paid by citizens who become productive workers but in the strengthened morale of these workers and their families.

To operate an enlarged health program, we shall need, of course, more doctors, dentists, nurses, and other health personnel. We shall need 20 percent more doctors. The shortage of dentists is even greater. And we need 42,000 more nurses right now.

A bill was recently passed by the Senate which would enable our medical schools to expand their facilities and which would provide scholarships for deserving medical students. When the bill came up for hearings in a House committee, it met strong opposition from the American Medical Association and was shelved. This seems incredible, in view of the fact that we face a national emergency and must draft doctors for the armed services.

Of course, the AMA will continue to use the bulk of its high-powered and expensive ammunition to fight national health insurance, the heart of the President's program for improving the Nation's health.

Curiously, the AMA is stanchly supporting the voluntary plans, which it once called "socialistic, communistic, * * * inciting to revolution." It has a long record of opposing progressive legislation. It was against old-age and survivors' insurance, unemployment insurance, workmen's compensation, public-health services to control tuberculosis—and even the reporting of communicable diseases.

In October the AMA alone spent $1,100,000 to fight national health insurance. It will continue to try to make you think that adoption of the President's program would destroy the very foundations of America.

American workers are familiar with these time-worn reactionary devices. They will not be fooled.

The fight to adopt a health-insurance program to meet the needs of all Americans will go on.

Withdrawal From Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES P. KEM
OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, December 20 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, a thoughtful editorial entitled "Time To Get Out," appeared in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat for December 11. I ask unanimous consent to have this editorial printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TIME TO GET OUT

The welcome news is received from east Korea that some 60,000 UN troops, most of them Americans, are being evacuated in orderly fashion from the Hungnam area which fronts the wild terrain where they were trapped for 2 weeks.

This makes much more sense than the Truman-Attlee statement that "Korea will not be abandoned," and the Attlee statement early in the week in London that he has good hopes the UN forces will be able to hold a stabilized line.

It has been clear for some time that the UN's meager forces cannot expel the Communists from Korea. There are too many of them. The odds against us in manpower are probably 10 to 1. Besides, the Reds are fighting in a terrain which they know and in weather to which they are accustomed. And they are bountifully supplied with arms and material by Russia.

So, the realistic view is for the UN to get out of Korea with the least possible loss of men and equipment, mark the campaign off as a military defeat, accept the loss in prestige and face that accrues to the whipping, and deploy our strength to other areas, after which a calmer, more intelligent assessment of the facts can be made.

The first stop is Japan which we can and must make impregnable. The Allied navy and air force which should make Formosa inaccessible from the China mainland, can be used for this defense. And it strikes us as completely irrational even to consider at this time the plan for extending all-out aid to Chiang Kai-shek and assist him in a frontal attack on China proper.

When all our men are out of Korea—and there is bright prospect that they can be evacuated without a Dunkerque—there will be time for President Truman, Secretary Acheson, Secretary Marshall, and the leaders in Congress to reexamine American foreign policy, to reflect on the fantastic extremes to which it has brought us and to consider ways and means of doing the best thing next.

It should be evident to all, including Mr. Truman, that the so-called Truman Doctrine has not worked out as originally conceived. He took in too much territory in his ambition to patrol the globe, stop the Communists in their tracks wherever they appeared and be a kind and generous father to all the peoples of the free world. It brought us to the brink of world war III in the Orient. It revealed that the billions we have spent in Europe have not brought us one friend who will stick with us to the bitter end. Such tenuous alliances as we now have in West Europe are threatened. And it demonstrates that those who are our elected or appointed leaders, have guessed wrongly both as to the enemy's determination and means to carry it through, and our capacity to make good our claim to be the champion of all mankind.

Most seriously, the present debacle has provoked the question as to how far, under the Constitution, the President can go in deciding and implementing foreign policy without the consent of Congress. Ever since Mr. Truman committed our armed services to combat in Korea, it has been said that this was an act of declared war without a congressional act. The result has been confusion and doubt in the public's mind as to our leadership, the concomitant of which is a wavering confidence in the President himself.

Perhaps in the face of an emergency, and if the pressure is eased in Korea, a clearer definition of aims and methods can be obtained. Yesterday's consultation at the White House was a step in that direction.

It is high time the United States knows where it is going and how it proposes to get there.

Perhaps Casey Should Lower the Boom on the American Medical Association and Not the Individual Doctors Who Are Its Virtual Captives

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 20, 1950

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to give due publicity to an article which appeared in the Jewish Press, of Omaha, Nebr., on Friday, October 20, 1950, and which was written by Mr. Leonard Boasberg.

It presented to the reading public perhaps an approach to the correct viewpoint which the American people should heed. It points out a great culprit which stalks abroad in our land today holding as virtual captives, the members of the medical profession and seeks to cripple the Nation in this great crisis hour. I predict that the day will come when the name "American Medical Association" and the individual doctors, too, who belong to it, if they do not free themselves from its tenaciously wicked grasp, will be as a hiss and a byword at every crossroad throughout the length and breadth of our land.

The article is as follows:

DON'T TAKE MY WORD FOR IT—PLEASE BE KIND TO DOCTORS, THEY NEED YOUR PATIENCE

(By Leonard Boasberg)

Unless you have a streak of cruelty you'll use your best bedside manner with doctors these days, and you'll tread softly and unbelligerently when you see one coming, averting your eyes as you would, perhaps, for an adolescent girl with a particularly bad case of acne, or for a hunchback, or a leper.

Doctors need all your patience now and perhaps for some time to come, for they're mixed up—whether they will or no—with one of the crassest campaigns of confusion ever perpetrated on the American public, a campaign backed by some of the most unsavory elements in America.

I refer, of course, to the American Medical Association's $1,100,000 (plus $19,000,000 or so in tie-ins) concentrated propaganda drive aimed at convincing us that compulsory health insurance equals socialized medicine, equals socialism, equals communism.

That's tripe, and the AMA knows it. Compulsory health insurance is compulsory health insurance, and it's no more socialistic than compulsory education.

Socialism isn't communism, either, and if there's a doctor in the house who thinks it is, I can only refer him to the history of the world for the last hundred years or so.

Socialists and Communists have been battling each other ever since Karl Marx came out with that melange of fact and nonsense, brilliancy and blindness that he called communism. First thing the Communists do when they take over a country is to liquidate the Socialists, and most Socialists are well aware of that fact. Socialist Britain is our best friend and closest ally in the entire world, fighting side by side with us against the North Korean Communists, and Socialist-minded neutrals—as in India, Israel, and Indonesia—are among our best potential allies.

Send them off into the wild red yonder and we can kiss our liberties good-by.

That full-page AMA ad said that in America 70,000,000 people are protected by voluntary health insurance. Trouble is, they don't mention how well protected these people are or how much this insurance costs or anything about the other 80,000,000 people in America. (A pronational health insurance group, the Committee for the Nation's Health, estimates that only 3,500,000 people are adequately covered by voluntary plans. I don't know one way or the other, but the AMA's wild statistics are somewhat less than helpful in clarifying matters.)

The AMA's medicine men are also praising to the skies the Blue Cross. Somehow, they would be a bit more effective if people didn't remember that only a few years back the AMA was calling THAT socialistic.

I know a good many doctors, and as I've said here before, I've never met a doctor I didn't like. I respect them for their intelligence, I envy them for their knowledge, I honor them for their selflessness—and I pity them for their union.

The bitter truth is that a doctor has about as much chance of opposing high AMA policy as, so I am given to understand, a coal miner has of opposing John L. Lewis.

A doctor—one of the best—told me the other day that if he came out for Congressman EUGENE O'SULLIVAN he couldn't get into a hospital in Omaha. And O'SULLIVAN says doctors are telling him the same thing. All of which is passing strange, because O'SULLIVAN is against compulsory health insurance.

Although I object to the AMA's tactics, I'll defend to the death its right to oppose socialized medicine, which I oppose too, and compulsory health insurance, which I favor now that I've read the AMA ads.

I won't, however, defend it's right to passively exclude from its membership doctors who don't measure up to certain standards of color.

Now technically the AMA doesn't exclude Negro doctors. But you can't be an AMA member unless you're a member of a State AMA society, and there's the rub. A few days ago the Medical Society of Virginia again turned down Negroes, and that keeps them out of the AMA.

If the doctors of America, as the AMA advertisements claim, are so "dedicated to serve their fellow citizens at home and their comrades in uniform, wherever service in this Nation may take them," and if the thing they're so "ready to fight for—to sacrifice for—to die for—is not the alien way of life of socialism, but the prideful security of a free and self-reliant people," it seems to me that they could do something about the Negro doctors of America who are barred from the AMA despite their professional qualifications.

It must be embarrassing to doctors—especially Jewish doctors—to notice the company the AMA keeps. One of the AMA's favorites is Fulton Lewis, Jr., latest addition to your local solo's crew of columnists. With George Sokolsky, David Lawrence, Dorothy Thompson, Victor Riesel, Bruce Barton and Louis Bromfield, they need him like a hole in a headline.

Fulton Lewis, Jr., is the man who, according to documents seized from the Nazi Foreign Office by Allied forces in Germany, offered free advice to Adolf Hitler on how to end the war in 1940.

He's the man to whom George Racey Jordan (remember him?) brought that cock-and-bull story about wartime atomic shipments to Russia, a story which, Life magazine declared, no reporter worth his salt could have taken seriously. But Lewis did.

But ghoul writer John T. Flynn, who thinks America is going to hell every time a Democrat gets elected to office, is the AMA's prize package.

America Firster Flynn, one of Merwin K. Hart's buddies, has been identified by Friends of Democracy, Inc., as a leader of America Action, Inc., which it terms a smokescreen organization for Nationalists, pro-Fascists, anti-Semitic, and anti-Catholic hate mongers.

Flynn, in 1945, wrote: "Behind the successful drive to disgrace and remove Gen. George S. Patton from his army command in occupied Germany is the secret and astoundingly effective might of this Republic's foreign-born political leaders, such as Justice of the Supreme Court Felix Frankfurter, of Vienna; White House Administrative Assistant Dave (Devious Dave) Niles, alias Neyhus; and the Latvian ex-rabbinical student now known as Sidney Hillman.

"An honest birth record spelling out the names of the paternal grandfathers of this triumvirate would be interesting even if the educated Christian-American couldn't read it."

Shades of the Chicago Tribune.

Discussing the famous Patton slapping incident, he declared: "What was not reported at the time was that the soldier who got slapped was of Jewish descent and that the general, hot and fatigued and fresh from the the fighting front used the words 'yellow-bellied' or 'yellow streaked,' linking them up with a direct reference to the patient's racial background."

He claimed that Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau and Frankfurter bellowed in the White House and the various breast beaters, world savers, and payroll patriots, safe in their Washington foxholes, howled for the dismissal of Old Blood and Guts.

There wasn't a word of truth in the story and O'Donnell was forced to retract the whole thing.

And that's the kind of a guy whose book the Road Ahead, the AMA wants us all to read.

Oh, doctor.

When He Cometh

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CECIL M. HARDEN

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 20, 1950

Mrs. HARDEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting a sermon delivered on Sunday, December 17, 1950, entitled "When He Cometh." The sermon was delivered on the Sunday morning following the President's declaration of a national emergency by the Reverend Edward L. R. Elson, D. D., minister, in the National Presbyterian Church, Washington, D. C. This sermon deserves widespread recognition, and I recommend it to every Member of this body. Dr. Elson's sermon follows:

WHEN HE COMETH

"Jesus came into Galilee preaching the gospel of the kingdom of God."—Mark 1: 14.

This Lord's day finds us at worship on the first day following the declaration of a national emergency. Several years ago, Robert Merriam wrote a book about the Battle of the Bulge, which he called Dark December. The title of that book has lost some significance. This is dark December. Our days are as dark as they were following the first Battle of Bull Run, if not, indeed, the gravest in the history of our national existence.

But this is also Advent—a time when we look for the shining star and the light of the world. Against the darkness of the hour our Lord's coming shines with a new incandescence. Why did Jesus come into the world? What did He come into the world to do? What was the central purpose of His ministry?

When Peter was growing old, he dictated to his stenographer, Mark, the meaning of the ministry of Jesus and the impression He had left upon his life. You find his account in the Gospel of Mark, undoubtedly the first account of the ministry of Jesus to be written. Having thus reflected in the quiet calm that comes with the years, he concluded, "Jesus came into Galilee preaching the gospel of the kingdom of God" (Mark 1: 14). That was His message and His mission. That sentence summarized what, according to those who heard Him frequently and knew Him intimately, He came to do. He came preaching the gospel of the kingdom of God.

At the very opening of His ministry you see Him going into the synagogue at Nazareth, taking up the scriptures and reading from the Prophecy of Isaiah: "The spirit of the Lord is upon me, because He hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; He hath sent me to heal the brokenhearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord" (Luke 4: 18–19). And then He announced, "This day the scripture is fulfilled in your ears." The kingdom of God had come in Him. He was the kingdom in miniature. The man and the message were one. The program and the person were inseparable. The rule of God in the hearts of men—that was the kingdom He proclaimed.

Everywhere He went He revealed God and interpreted God to men. Up and down the country He went urging men to repent and to put God at the center of their lives. It was seeing God, and having fellowship with God that was the burden of His appeal. He bore witness of this truth in Himself. As a lad, who remained in the temple when His parents had gone homeward, He said, "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" God was His only concern. When as a man His disciples feared He might be hungry. He exclaimed, "I have meat to eat that ye know not of, for my meat is to do the will of Him that sent me." At last when His work was done and He went to His cross, He cried out, "Father, unto Thy hands I commend my spirit." Everything He was and everything He did was to reveal the perfect God-centered, God-conscious life. That is the meaning of St. Paul's words, "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself." The theologian, John, put it, "The word became flesh and dwelt among us."

He came not with a set of sociological blueprints, or economic programs, or political theories. He offered no human utopia. He was no Titan who did many things. He did one central thing perfectly. He revealed the life of God in the life of man. Men pleaded with Him to lead a revolution, to command an army, to destroy despotism, to sit upon a royal throne. He was asked to demonstrate His physical power—to turn stones into bread, to throw Himself down from the temple—to use material power. He kept on quietly talking about the kingdom of God and demonstrating it in Himself. Into a world of political intrigue, social ostracism, and cruel slavery, He came preaching the gospel of the kingdom of God. That was His message. That was His chief concern. The kingdom and the King were one.

So He sent out His disciples. They proclaimed the gospel of the kingdom of God. God in Christ had done a mighty work, they said. The King had come. They knew that His kingdom was to be in the hearts of men. It could not be elsewhere until first established there. They said wicked men had rejected this King, had tried to dethrone Him, attempted to destroy Him—but that He lived—that He called men to follow Him—to obey Him. In the name of the King they called for repentance and entrance into the kingdom—the kingdom in which God rules the hearts of men.

That gospel brought an upheaval in social, economic, and political life of a world that was falling to pieces. When men are born into the kingdom of God and the love of God, something happens. Men in the kingdom of God can be slaves neither to institutions or men. That is why the gospel launched the birth of freedom. When men put God at the center of life you can trust men. When a world makes the God of Jesus paramount, then the world can be trusted. It was to preach the gospel of the kingdom of God and to redeem it for the kingdom that Jesus came into the world.

II

Too often we have misunderstood the meaning of the kingdom. We have gotten the sequence wrong. We have tried to bring in the kingdom without the King. We have attempted to frame sociological programs, political platforms, and economic reforms and called them the kingdom of God. Church leaders have said we must do this because it is based upon the Sermon on the Mount. We have mistakenly presumed that the Sermon on the Mount was uttered to a miscellaneous throng. The truth is that the ethical pattern of the Sermon on the Mount was presented to the disciples who had withdrawn from the multitude to a mountain retreat. "And seeing the multitudes, He went up into a mountain: and when He was set, His disciples came unto Him. And He opened His mouth and taught them, saying * * *." The words were spoken to men who recognized and accepted the King and were ready to live in the kingdom of God. They were not spoken to unredeemed, uncommitted men. It is one thing to apply the Beatitudes to the people for whom they were intended. It is quite another to assume that they are yet a national policy. To expect a spiritually mature individual or group to live by these exacting standards it quite a different thing from supposing they are God's will for a spiritually miscellaneous nation. The standards of the kingdom belong to those who acknowledge the King and live in the kingdom.

It is because we have attempted establishing the kingdom without the King that the church shares with the rest of mankind in guilt for the present tragic world. Too many have thought that the kingdom of God is simply a world order without war. The prophesies which Jesus said He came to fulfill and the sermons which He preached all mention something more than the absence of war—they talk about justice, and righteousness, freedom from poverty, sickness, slavery, and especially the emancipation of man from sin.

Some churchmen have said, "If only we can have a world in which peace prevails we will have the kingdom of God." If we can avoid shooting—if we can escape coercion, then we will have the kingdom—mankind will be reconciled.

But do you have the kingdom? Would you have the kingdom even if there were no coercion, no shooting, and only that kind of peace? Do you have the kingdom when there is slavery? Do you have the kingdom when personality is defamed? Do you have the kingdom when truth is suppressed? Do you have the kingdom when international fellowship is obstructed by the imprisonment of millions behind an impenetrable iron curtain? No, peace, in the sense of no shooting, does not guarantee the kingdom of God. The only way to the kingdom of God is to put the King on the throne of the human heart.

The church has been right in insisting that we share food and clothing, medicines and tools with the dispossessed and underprivileged of the world. It has been wrong in supposing that this material satisfaction would bring in the kingdom of God. The church has been right in insisting that international conflicts be resolved by peaceful adjudication through the United Nations. It has been wrong in supposing that such efforts should not be adequately imple nented by military force—a judge cannot carry on a trial or accomplish a sentence without coercion—the police force.

Pacifist churchmen and lobbyists have promoted resolutions in church convocations and have so successfully lobbied before the Congress as to inhibit the adequate preparation of our Nation to reinforce United Nation actions and support our own international commitments. They thought the kingdom of God has chiefly, if not only, the characteristics of peace.

A distinguished son of a Presbyterian minister, Dr. Karl T. Compton, in 1947, recommended on behalf of the President's Commission, that we establish immediately a more robust military organism. This Commission said, "We recommend the adoption of universal training because we are convinced that weakness on our part not only involves our country in grave risks, but also weakens the United Nations on which rests our best hopes for lasting peace. A weak and irresolute America is an invitation to failure. A strong and resolute America is the best guaranty for our safety and for the success of the United Nations." Dr. Daniel L. Poling, Father Walsh, and the scientists and economists on the President's Commission joined in proposing a sturdy and comprehensive program. That was long enough ago to have done something about it.

The President did his part. Others of us, despite our hate of war and the acknowledged moral hazards of extensive military training programs, felt our Nation had no other choice at this period of history.

But the resolutions of church conventions and the pacifist lobbyists prevailed. Twenty churchmen and educators said that the notion that "weakness invites wars" and that therefore the United States should remain strong was a "trite and unbelievable oversimplification of history." In the days when the Commission's report was under discussion, every public opinion poll showed overwhelming public approval of military training. But Congress refused to act. So successful were the pressure groups and the lobbyists, nothing was done. And now we are paying the price. The good intentions of the educators, and well-meaning but mistaken churchmen do not help us now. Young Americans without adequate training or sufficient reinforcements are being killed. They are not helped now by any claim that preparation for military action in this kind of world is "a trite and unbelievable oversimplification of history." The question now is, who oversimplified the interpretation of history?

It is clear now, if it was not clear before that the crisis is more than a clash of ideologies and economic theories, though it is that. We are in danger of being unable to deal with realities, including moral realities. "The United Nations, the United States, the whole free world is threatened by men who have acquired tremendous military power and who do not seem to understand that weakness on the part of their prospective victims is an assurance of peace," said an editorial in the Washington Star last July. That editorial was prophetic.

The church has its own guilt. We have remained silent when we should have spoken. And too often when we have spoken we have said the wrong thing.

We should have asked for repentance—from selfishness, pride. We should have called for even more generosity and more sacrifice—for more missionaries and greater restoration funds. We should have insisted that our Nation share generously with others and assist in their physical reconstruction—even beyond the generous things we did. We should have been more insistent that even Russia participate in that assistance. And we should have insisted that all such assistance be given and administered in the spirit of brotherliness.

To say that this person or that group is now guilty is not true and it is of no avail. Confronted with the claims of the kingdom of God, of christian discipleship we are all guilty. We are all in the same condemnation. We wanted our young men home in 1945. We wanted prosperity, our gadgets, our comfort, and luxury. We wanted peace without the price of peace. We were blind to the irreconcilability of colliding ideologies. We thought Soviet communism wanted peace when it was something else they wanted.

On this advent Sunday, we are called back to faith in the kingdom of God—the kingdom into which men are born again—with new motives and new purposes. The kingdom of God and the kingdom of the United States are not the same thing. We know we are not perfect but we are striving for improvement. The kingdom of God and the kingdom of Stalinism are not the same thing. We know that they are forever irreconcilable. But to faith in the kingdom of God we must cling anew. Advent means that God once entered our fleeting life. We know what He is like and what we ought to become.

There is an eternal purpose toward which all events move. As Lincoln put it, "The Almighty has his own purposes." Even if the worst comes; if civilization becomes a shambles, there will be a remnant of the redeemed. And if we have been an unworthy instrument in establishing His kingdom on earth it may even be that God will raise up another people unto Himself.

We know the kingdom can come. Once it did come in Christ. We see what life can be when God is in it fully.

No matter what comes—God is.

No matter what happens—God is God.

We cannot despair whatever the circumstances. We have seen the King once in history. His kingdom standeth sure. "I am Alpha and Omega," saith the Lord.

Letter to a Soldier in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL H. DOUGLAS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, December 20 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter to a soldier in Korea read by the Reverend A. Powell Davies, D. D., at All Souls' Church, Unitarian, Washington, D. C., Sunday, December 17, 1950. I do not feel adequate to express myself on this letter, but would prefer to let it speak for itself. It carries a message of the greatest importance to all of us.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LETTER TO A SOLDIER IN KOREA

DEAR FRIEND: You say near the end of your letter that you do not expect an answer. That is very good of you. Probably you would not complain if I selected from my desk some magazine articles, news-cuttings, reports of speeches, and the like, and sent them to you with the thought that you would find them much more useful than my merely personal opinions.

Let me be honest with you: I have been tempted to do that very thing. But I can't get away with it. You are entitled to a personal answer, a complete and truthful answer. Indeed, if you chose to demand it, you are entitled to such an answer not only from me but from every grown person in the United States.

You say that you do not know what you are doing in Korea—what made it necessary in the first place. You wonder whether any good has come of it. The Korean people, you tell me, both North and South, are much worse off than if the United Nations had never intervened. Millions of them are refugees, walking the winter roads alongside your armies, but with nowhere to go. Uncounted multitudes have died, and the same fate awaits a vast number of survivors. Your best friend was killed. He had a sweetheart, the girl who had waited for him since his senior year in high school. They would have been married this Christmas. He had everything to live for. You ask me what use it was, his dying, and what was gained by such a sacrifice.

I shall try to answer these questions—faithfully and to the best of my ability. But there is something I have to say first. This letter is being written in a warm room, not out of doors in zero weather. My feet have not been frost-bitten. I have not lost several nights of sleep. If I walk down the street I shall see not homeless refugees, but the usual crowds busy with their Christmas shopping. You can see what I'm driving at, I'm sure. It is something that you may have to take into account as you read what follows. You are there where the fighting is; I am not.

The only thing I can say for myself is that I share your protest. I am putting up the same fight against bitterness that you are. With you, this fight is recent and intense; with me it has lasted a long while and I am not so driven by it. But then, as I say, I'm here in America; I might feel just as you do if I were in Korea.

I have to admit that people here are just as you describe them. They do know in a vague, unhappy way that we are being defeated in Korea. Nevertheless, the war is not quite real to them. They see it, so to speak, through a glass, darkly; it does not meet them face to face. Last week, for instance, there was a wildcat strike, tying up the railroad terminals. Under normal conditions this strike might be defensible. In our present situation, it was outrageous. The fact is, however, that the strikers meant no harm; they just don't understand about Korea. It is the same with the automobile manufacturers. Their profits have been large, and that is the way they like them. Perhaps you would, too, if you were an automobile manufacturer. But when the Government asked them to wait and talk it over before putting up their prices, they flatly refused to do it. The war you are fighting has not come close enough to frighten them. It will, sooner or later, but at present, Korean battles seem to be fought chiefly in the newspapers. These people have not seen phosphorus thrown into an ambulance; to them, a Communist is something exposed by the Un-American Activities Committee, not a fanatical soldier, snuffing out the life of your friend.

You must understand that this is America, just the same as always. The people here have not been shocked, as you have, into a grim sense of realities. What most of the people are concerned with, just now, is Christmas shopping. I don't know what you think of that; I don't know what I think of it myself. A few weeks ago, when you thought you might be home for Christmas, it must have been pleasant to imagine all this Christmas shopping. You would have been a part of it, buying presents for your relatives and friends just like the rest of us.

Those long lines of slow-moving vehicles, retreating toward the coast, the rear-guard action, the sudden ambush, the bridges blown up in front of you, the endless trek of refugees—people here don't see them, just as you might not have seen them if you had stayed in America. I do not mean that people don't read the news, but that they don't visualize it. They have not watched the bulldozers push the earth over the graves of the dead; they have not seen blood on the snow.

That is part of the answer to your question. You are in Korea because Americans refused to face realities. If our country had maintained its strength at the end of the Second World War, the entire course of history would have been different. But then, so would America. Millions of the population would have been under arms. The prosperity of these recent years, for whatever it may have been worth, could never have happened. The boys who wanted to come home—just as you do, now—would, in many cases, have had to remain abroad. Would you have been in favor of these austerities? If you had been in a position of leadership, would you have insisted upon them? If you had, your leadership would have been repudiated. The America of the last 5 years is the America the people have wanted. It is the America they still want.

From what you write, it is also the America you want, yourself. You would like, that is, to keep it that way if you could.

And here comes the point where we need some clearer thinking. It is useless being embittered about the aftermath of World War II. We were unequal to our responsibilities; that is true. But on the other hand, there was a great deal that we did do. We were far from niggardly with our national resources. More than any nation ever did in the past, we gave of our substance to those who needed it. Until we saw that we were being made fools of, we gave as freely to Communists as to all others. Only slowly did our people realize what they were up against. They wanted peace. They thought that most other people wanted peace. They believed the Kremlin wanted peace. This may not have been intelligent or wise, but it was surely not discreditable. Little by little, the truth became plainer; finally, it became too plain to be mistaken, and the people understood.

That is why you were sent to Korea; because a time had come when Communist aggression could no longer be tolerated. It was a dangerous decision—the United Nations intervention in Korea. Even from the beginning, it was evident that the Chinese armies might support the North Koreans. But what was the alternative? To allow the Communists to seize Korea? If we had done this, without a fight of any kind, no nation in the world would have trusted us. It would have been surrender, piecemeal surrender, to Communist aggression. Our loss would have been greater, far greater, that way. And the Communist menace would have come closer to America without our seeing—without the world seeing—in full and final plainness—the brutal purpose of the Kremlin.

That is why you went to Korea. There was no help for it. We had to make a stand somewhere. The United Nations had to make a stand. Besides being a moral necessity, it had become a question of survival. The remaining free nations have no chance whatever unless the Communists are halted.

But you ask a second question. You want to know whether any good has come of it. You are in retreat. You have not achieved the purposes for which you went there.

Here, like yourself, some of what I say must be said in bitterness. For the last 2 years at least, it has been clear that we have needed to rearm—and on a scale sufficient to protect our interests. In my own view, it was clear much sooner, but in any case, after the Communist seizure of Czechoslovakia, it was inexcusable to hesitate. Our military leaders should have known what they were up against, and have provided accordingly. They failed to do it. Their goals were in the future. They should have known the time was then, not 1952. The Congress bears an equal share of blame. In utter blindness, the majority in both Houses insisted upon politics as usual, indeed, upon politics much worse than usual. This was criminal stupidity.

To answer your second question, then, I shall have to say that you might not have been defeated if your leaders had provided what was necessary. This would have meant, however, that you yourself would have needed to leave civilian life much earlier. So would thousands of others. I do not know how you would have felt about that. I just mention it because we have to be honest with ourselves—all of us. The leaders should have known better—that is what leaders are for. Nevertheless, I think they did what the people wanted.

I do not believe, however, that your defeat—even if it turns out to be entirely such—means that the effort was useless. It had to be tried. Some day, it will have to be tried again. There is no chance whatever that the world can remain "half slave, half free." What you have done in Korea has committed us for the future. It is true, as you say, that besides our own losses there are millions of Koreans who are refugees. There are also those who have died. It is a staggering thing to count up all these miseries, to stand and face this awful suffering. Yet, the answer is a clear one. Unless we are willing to surrender to the Communists, we must accept the facts of war for what they are. Our cause is lost already if blood and tears can break our resolution.

As I promised at the beginning, I shall be honest with you. I think that much worse is before us than you have seen in Korea. I think it possible that before long we may be driven out of Europe just as we are now being driven out of Korea. The truth is, you see, that our leaders even now are not realists. They think that 40 divisions, or 60, or maybe 80, can stop the Russians in Europe. This may be so, but for my own part, I admit that I don't see how. We are told that the Germans, the French, the Italians, will put up a strong resistance. Perhaps they will, but there is no reason at present for thinking so. The people of these countries will only fight to win if they believe they can win, and they will only believe they can win if they see United States strength fully mobilized and extended.

This does not mean that we ought not to have an alliance. The Atlantic Alliance is extremely important. But it does mean that until we trust in ourselves rather than in others and are ready to invoke our entire power and our whole might this alliance will not help us. It is America that must save America. American aircraft, American industry, American production, American men and women, fighting for victory in a war of survival. The nations with which we are allied are faint-hearted. War has wearied them. Multitudes of their people have given up; they do not believe in us, they do not believe in anything. They are in despair. These people will only fight by our side if they believe it is the winning side. It is our courage that must save them, not their courage that can save us.

At the present moment, they do not believe that ours is the winning side. They see what most Americans are blind to: that it is not certain that we can even defend the continental United States. They remember what we have forgotten; that wars are not won by dollar appropriations but by force in being; they know that we shall not win command of the skies by airplanes on drafting boards but only by those that we can put into the air. Far better than most Americans, they know how imminent is our danger. They are waiting to see how we use our time—not counted in years, but in months and weeks. They know the time is now.

So I can answer your question in this way: I can tell you that good has come of the defeat in Korea to the extent that we have lost some of our blindness. It is a terrible thing that your best friend had to die for this. But that is the way the world is, and it is uesless being bitter about it. We tried to win a war in Korea without having what it takes to win; if we understand this fact and act upon it, it may save us. But we shall have to do better than we are doing now. We shall have to realize what our people—yes, and most of our leaders, too—seem unable or unwilling to realize. There can be blood on the snow in America, not just next winter but this winter. It is something that the country would wake up to, astonished and stunned, just as it has to Korea. Our civilian defense, our provision for disaster control, are almost nonexistent. Tasks like these, immediate and urgent, are being set aside for squabbles. We are not doing well. I have to tell you this, simply because it is true. But I can also say that we are doing better than we were, largely because of Korea. If we are saved, we shall owe it to your friend who was killed—to him and all who died in Korea. We shall owe it to you, too, and the miseries you are undergoing. This is what you must understand, my friend, and let it melt away some of your bitterness.

You must know that soldiers die not only because there is evil in the world, but also because there is blindness and stupidity. Nor is this all. War comes because people are too hopeful, because they are generous and do not recognize their enemies. It is not a simple matter—this question of how war comes. Much of our trouble in the past has arisen from not knowing this. That is why your church has given you so little that helps you. The churchmen have not understood. They have thought that war was something that could be cured as a thing in itself, instead of as a part of everything that ails us. Some of the churchmen are now trying to decide whether the atom bomb is more immoral than a bomb made of TNT. The only comment on this controversy that would make sense to you or me is that of Prof. Robert M. Hawkins, of Vanderbilt University School of Religion: "Any weapon is inhumane," he says, "and I would rather be blown up with an atom bomb than bayonetted."

He is exactly right. Any weapon is inhumane. War always was, is now, and always will be cruel, barbarous, sickening, and revolting. Atomic energy, because it represents a towering achievement of science, a new dimension of human possibility, is especially repugnant to us when used as an instrument of disaster. We are in the grip of evil necessity and it does no good to disguise the fact. But if we are ever to break the power of this necessity and be free men again, free to build a better, gentler, happier world, we shall have to grapple with reality on its own terms.

That is what your battles in Korea are teaching us. We are awakening—and I hope it is not too late—to what reality requires of us. I say we are awakening, but this is not true of all of us. Some of us, my friend, are sick, spiritually sick, and it is a sickness unto death. In the hearts of some of us, hidden and disguised, there is despair. Those who are afflicted with this sickness are not willing to make the effort, reality is too much for them, the struggle has overwhelmed them already.

It was Dean Inge, whose understanding of history has seldom been surpassed, who once said that "resignation is the disease from which civilizations die." This disease is rampant among us. It takes the form, in many, of a tenacious clinging to hopes and aims that belong to yesterday; of blind resistance to what would save us. Deep in their hearts, they are resigned; if they cannot have the world that pleases them, they are willing to have no world at all. In others, this disease is a renunciation of principle, an inward dissolution of conviction. They do not love freedom, they do not love justice; they have room only for resentment at the harshness of events. I hope with all my heart that what you are doing in Korea will help to cure us of this disease.

One of our Senators, Senator LYNDON JOHNSON, of Texas, stated the matter extremely well in an address to the Senate last week: "Is this," he asked, "the hour of our Nation's twilight, the last fading hour of light before an endless night shall envelop us and all the Western World? That is a question which we still have in our power to answer. If we delay longer we can expect nothing but darkness and defeat and desolation. If we answer the challenge with courage and confidence, and with the ability of which we are capable, we can, I am sure, triumph over our foes."

That is exactly right. You did not go to Korea, my friend, on an isolated venture. You are the beginning of the main battle. You, together with the rest of us, both there and here, are settling the question of survival. A long night of barbarism or a new morning of civilization—that is the question you are settling.

Some of your more detailed inquiries I have not answered. I am not equipped to speak, for instance, about mistakes of strategy or of generalship. I have opinions about these things but I doubt that I should venture on them in this letter. If we assume, as perhaps we should, that mistakes have been made, we ought to recognize, I think, that the Chinese armies would have intervened in any case. So the result would have been much the same. As to this, the plan followed out was made years ago in the Kremlin.

I was in Czechoslovakia, you know, when the Communists seized the Government of that country. When I returned to America and reported what I had seen and heard, giving it as my conviction that it was a further stage in Soviet aggression, there were many who would not believe it. Yet, we read this week a full admission in the words of their Deputy Prime Minister, Mr. Fierlinger. Plans for the new Czechoslovakia, he says, were "made in Moscow" even before World War II ended. "Stalin in the Kremlin," he continues, "with ingenious foresight, drew the outlines of our new Czechoslovakia—(and) a new government was prepared to take over our new state."

I mention this because we must understand that plans have also been prepared for Germany, France, and Italy. This is still in the future. But the plans for Korea, and for Chinese action in Korea, are being carried out. Since we could not have won with the forces we were able to commit, there is not much gain in blaming strategy or criticizing generalship. The Chinese would have come in any case.

Let me say again, we must keep in view the main struggle, the struggle we still can win. If we win that one, victory will come to us in the others, also.

But we must possess the will to win; we must be spiritually fit for the conflict. I confess to you with shame that here in Washington we are not spiritually fit—not yet. But I am not without hope. I think things are a little better. I am glad you like the poetry of Walt Whitman. So do I. Do you remember his lines about America:

"Not for success alone;
Not to fair-sail unintermitted always;
The storm shall dash thy face—the murk of war, and worse than war, shall cover thee all over
In many a smiling mask death shall approach, beguiling thee—thou in disease shalt swelter,
The livid cancer spread its hideous claws, seeking to strike thee deep within;
Consumption of the worst—mortal consumption—shall rouge thy face with hectic:
But thou shalt face thy fortunes, thy diseases, and surmount them all
Shalt soar toward fulfilment of the future
The Soul—its destinies."

I believe that and I know you do. If we are bitter at times, it is a clean sort of bitterness and washes away some of the heartache. But the fact is that we believe—and deeply—in freedom and justice and a decent world, and we know that the power to win that world is in us—and in the people of our country.

I await eagerly the news that you are safe. When you are back in this region, come and see me. Meanwhile, write me again if you feel like it. And don't be gentle. Tell me what you really think. We in America will only be saved by the truth that hurts.

With every best wish,

Yours very sincerely,

A. POWELL DAVIES.

Study of Congress Needed by American School Children

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES R. HOWELL
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 20, 1950

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Speaker, the Trentonian, daily newspaper of Trenton, N. J., on December 7, 1950, published a column by Harman W. Nichols, the distinguished United Press correspondent, describing the study program of the Committee for Congress, which seeks to make better study facilities available in our schools and colleges about the actual work and functions of Congress and its Members.

Because of the worthiness of this endeavor by a group of experienced Washington newspapermen to strengthen our representative form of government with a better knowledge of the Congress of the United States, I am pleased to request unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD publication of this column, along with a query about it from one of my constituents.

Complete information about the educational program of the Committee for Congress, and its Congress Study Council, which plans to use Your Congress Magazine, and all available educational and information media, press, radio, television and motion pictures, to carry the story of Congress to students in and out of school, can be obtained from the Committee for Congress, 1060 National Press Building, Washington, D. C., ME-2214.

The column and the query follow:

(By Harman W. Nichols)

WASHINGTON, December 7.—It's a crying shame that the school children in Bee House, Tex., Farmer City, Ill., and Ulrich, Mo., don't know the first thing about how our Congress does its work.

A youngster wrote in the other day and wanted to know in which room in the White House the Supreme Court meets.

Well, maybe we can straighten this all out.

We now have a nonprofit, nonpolitical group known as the Committee for Congress. It's a brand new thing and has on its board of directors a flock of veteran newspapermen and commentators who have observed the goings-on in Washington for many years.

OUTFIT IS NOT PHONY

The outfit is not phony. It doesn't expect to pay any big dividends to stockholders, but it is putting out a little publication called Your Congress Magazine, at 1060 National Press Building, Washington, D. C.

The idea is to educate the public on what goes on here.

Hal. J. Miller, the moving force behind the project, is a familiar figure on Capitol Hill. He and his wife, Virginia, did a lot of research. They found that there wasn't a single high school in the country which dug into the inner workings of Congress. At least, not to the point where the students—or public—had an inkling of how a congressional committee works.

Or what comes out of a conference (a vague term, at best). Or what a Senator or Congressman is supposed to do besides say "Here" when the Vice President, who is President of the Senate, or the Speaker of the House of Representatives, calls the meetings to order.

SUPPORTED BY CONGRESS

The committee has the backing of many Members of Congress. Representative CHARLES E. BENNETT, of Florida, said:

"There is great merit to the program—and a need for the full understanding of the workings of the Government. This is particularly true in the trying international situation."

Representative F. ERTEL CARLYLE, of North Carolina, said he thought the new committee would serve a very useful purpose.

NO INFORMATION AVAILABLE

Representative M. G. BURNSIDE, of West Virginia, a former professor of political science, pulled out the stops and said that although he tried to teach his students the fundamentals of how Congress acts, he never was able to. No information from Washington available.

One Representative who doesn't want to be named blamed the press for the lack of interest in Congress.

"The newspapers and radio poke so much fun at Senators and Congressmen that a lot of Members crayfish into their shells and don't fight back," he said.

"This new program by the Committee for Congress sounds like a good idea. Maybe some of us now can stick our necks out and fight back."

The column was accompanied by this written memorandum from Carl Schielke, 23 Jarvis Place, Trenton 8, N. J.:

DEAR MR. NICHOLS: Please forward my name to the Committee for Congress so that I can subscribe.

Some Newspaper Criticisms of the Advertising Campaign of the American Medical Association and Its Selfish Activities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 20, 1950

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, the October 15, 1950, issue of the Des Moines (Iowa) Sunday Register published in its open forum the following letter concerning the advertising of the American Medical Association during the last political campaign:

A READER TAKES ISSUE WITH MEDICAL SOCIETY ADVERTISING—SAYS HE AND NEIGHBOR ARE NOT RUNNING AMERICA

To the OPEN FORUM EDITOR:

A short time ago there appeared in the public press an announcement that the American Medical Association would spend a large sum of money on advertising against public health insurance. The first ad appeared October 8 in This Week magazine, page 4, entitled, "Who Runs America?" and ends with the statement: "You and Your Neighbor Run America." I take issue with this. My neighbor and I do not run America. Who does? The lobbyists, such as the American Medical Association, who have millions to spend for advertising and influencing lawmakers.

Perhaps if my neighbor and I had an equal amount of cash to spread around among the elected personnel of Government, we might have an equal voice in running America. As it is, we have just two votes, my neighbor and I, pitted against the millions of dollars worth of influence at the disposal of the American Medical Association, the National Association of Manufacturers, the United States Chamber of Commerce, and the American Bar Association, to mention but a few. To cite an example of the influence of these powerful lobbies, look what happened to the cost of living after controls were removed at their behest.

WEIGHING THE FACTS

The ad says "the people weigh the facts." I wonder if the people ever get any facts to weigh. I'm sure the AMA and their millions are not going to present both sides of the question. For example, will they tell us how much AMA restricts medical training unfairly? Will they dare tell us how much of the Nation's wealth is controlled by insurance companies? Would they dare tell us how much the assets of the insurance companies increased from 1910 to 1930? From 1930 to 1940? ($26,000,000,000 and an average of $3,000,000,000) yearly from 1940 to 1950—by approximately $60,000,000,000 to date?

The point is, that their assets doubled in 10 years. If these assets were controlled by the people (who weight the facts), there would be adequate funds to insure everyone against failure in health. The ad says "hundreds of voluntary health insurance plans are in healthy competition," etc. My neighbor and I want to know why the duplication of effort. Why not have one over-all system similar to GI insurance?

HEALTH INSURANCE

The ad also says "70,000,000 Americans are protected by voluntary health insurance." My neighbor and I want to know why the other 80,000,000 of Americans can't afford the same protection; what happens to the rest of the insurance companies' assets? So voluntary health insurance takes the economic shock out of illness does it? Would the benevolent AMA please explain why it is that whenever an insured "victim" is treated, the physician's fee invariably matches the amount of insurance?

My neighbor and I therefore ask the American Medical Association to get down to earth and tell the truth in their monster advertising campaign. Tell the people just what they have against health for everyone, tell them why they obstruct and object to the educating of more doctors, explain why there is a shortage of nurses, and adequate hospital facilities. Could it be that they do not want us to know?

LLOYD R. FISH.

MOLINE, ILL.

The League Reporter, which is the official publication for Labor's League for Political Education, in its December 11, 1950, issue carried the following news items concerning the selfish activities of the American Medical Association:

MEDICAL PROFESSION ABUSES LEAD TO NEED FOR HEALTH PROGRAM

Why is national health insurance necessary? You've heard lots of answers to that. The American Medical Association (AMA) pours millions of dollars into its lobby fund to give you answers—false ones.

The reason is simply this: The medical profession is not cleaning up its abuses. Whenever a powerful group touches the lives of thousands of people, it must provide an adequate service for them, or it will be done by a group who will.

In this way abuses in the sale of stocks led to the establishment of the Securities and Exchange Commission. And abuses by huge financial operators of subsidiaries led to the Holding Company Act.

The medical profession will have to be guided economically by a national health insurance program, so everyone can have adequate medical care.

The medical profession has the knowledge to cure most of the ills of every American. But only one out of every five persons is able to take full advantage of these benefits.

There are 40,000,000 people living in communities without full-time health services. Thirty thousand more doctors are needed. There are only one-half the hospital beds that are needed. Forty percent of the counties, with 15,000,000 citizens, have no hospitals at all.

With national health insurance you would have needed X-rays immediately. Your financial situation wouldn't first be investigated. Your health would come first. There are about 325,000 people dying each year who could have been saved had they received prompt diagnosis of their ailments and proper treatment.

If you needed a doctor after midnight, you wouldn't have to wait until morning to see one. National health insurance would mean available doctors at all times.

If you needed glasses, the optometrist wouldn't check first to see how many dollars you had in your pocket. Under national health insurance, you would receive them promptly.

Hospital costs may be $20 a day for a serious illness or accident. Such costs can lead easily to a bill of $1,000 or more. How many families can afford to pay this high cost of health?

With national health insurance, everyone would be covered to receive medical care. Those who couldn't be insured because of joblessness would be eligible for treatment through insurance payments made for them by a public agency.

The program would provide services to prevent disease as well as to diagnose and cure it.

Specialized treatments, eyeglasses, and dental care would be equally available under the plan.

The AMA, while ignoring the glaring abuses of the medical profession, lamely tries to label national health insurance "socialistic," or some other unpopular term, in an effort to disguise its real purpose.

The only alternative the AMA gives is the insurance plans which are limited in coverage meet only part of the costs and make no provision for preventive treatment.

BISHOP HITS AMA HEALTH PLAN FIGHT

Methodist Bishop Gerald Kennedy, of Portland, Oreg., says no one in England, not even the doctors, would do away with that country's health-insurance program.

Following a recent visit to England, Bishop Kennedy reported that the Labor and Conservative Parties are fighting over who should get credit for first thinking of the plan.

Bishop Kennedy also attacked the assinine tactics the American Medical Association (AMA) is using to fight national health insurance.

"One thing is certain," added Bishop Kennedy, "one way or another, we are due for a change. Things are going to be improved because the public will demand it, and the AMA cannot prevent it no matter how large a slush fund it raises in an effort to stand pat."

MEDIC RIPS INTO DOCTORS

"The doctor who has a license to practice medicine and joins a county medical society is usually fixed for life.

"Unless he is convicted by a court of some criminal offense, he can continue to enjoy the rights and privileges of responsible doctors even though he, himself, practices overcharging, neglect of patients, and nonsupport of organized medicine."

That's a doctor talking. Those comments are from a speech by Dr. Hamilton W. McKay, of Charlotte, N. C., to the annual meeting of the Southern Medical Association on November 14 in St. Louis.

Dr. McKay was president of the Southern Medical Association, the Nation's second biggest medical group, during the past year. Only the American Medical Association (AMA) itself is larger.

"If the people cannot convince themselves that organized medicine is taking vigorous steps to correct its own shortcomings, they will insist that the initiative for action be transferred to other hands," Dr. McKay went on to say.

"He (the doctor) simply does not know that it isn't enough to do a good scientific job; he is a bungling novice in the art of human relations with his patients, who are, after all, his greatest assets and medicine's stock in trade. * * *

"Our competence is being weighed against the American standard of competence in other professions. Our charges are being weighed against the budgetary demands of other services which are essential to life in America."

AMA KEEPS YOUTHS FROM M. D. TRAINING BY OPPOSING AID

"Are we to haul down our flag and permit the American Medical Association (AMA) and the other reactionary interests of this country to continue to utilize the present international crisis as a smoke screen for their selfish policy of scarcity in medical personnel?"

That important question was asked by Federal Security Administrator Oscar Ewing in a speech at a meeting of the Harlem Interracial Platform on November 26 in New York City.

"The time has come to remind the doctor-politicians of their Hippocratic oath—which binds them, morally at least, to teach the art of medicine to all who desire to learn it.

"Those who would limit medical education in this time of scarcity are honoring their ancient and honored oath in the breach rather than the observance."

For 2 years the AMA has opposed legislation being backed by the A. F. of L. and other liberal groups to give medical schools some money from the Federal Treasury so they could train more doctors.

DOCTORS STOP CO-OP BY USING LAW WHICH ALLOWS MONOPOLIES

Remember those American Medical Association (AMA) ads that the daily papers ran last October?

Remember how they talked about "liberty," "freedom," and "the voluntary way"?

"Just how free is the free enterprise organized medicine is talking about in its current * * * propaganda campaign has been graphically demonstrated in Staunton, Ill.," reported the St. Louis Post-Dispatch on November 18.

"There a group of citizens wanted to establish a cooperative hospital which would have provided, among things, prepaid preventive medical care to the members of the cooperative.

"But this inevitably would have affected Macoupin County doctors' pocketbooks, and the physicians would have none of it. They have prevented the cooperative from operating, with the help of an Illinois law which not only permits medical monopolies, but makes them mandatory.

"The legislature at Springfield decreed last year that no medical service plan corporation can be formed unless a majority of the trustees are doctors.

"And to rivet the control of organized medicine over such plans, the law also says that none can be formed unless a majority of the doctors in the area to be served agree to participate. * * *

"The law says, in short, that doctors, and only organized doctors, shall decide what fees are to be charged and how much or how little service they must provide their patients.

"A very strange sort of free enterprise this."

PAPER TELLS DOCTORS TO CORRECT ABUSES

"A timely warning to the medicos has come from one of their profession, Dr. Hamilton W. McKay, of Charlotte, N. C. * * *

"Dr. McKay's advice is sound and sensible. This newspaper has opposed the Truman health insurance plan—but not without repeatedly urging the doctors themselves to take the lead in correcting conditions that prompt support for that plan."

That's what the Pittsburgh Press said about Dr. McKay's speech in an editorial published on November 18. The Pittsburgh Press, a Scripps-Howard paper, is about as liberal as the Chicago Tribune.

Attacks on Acheson Are Beyond Politics

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL W. SHAFER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 19, 1950

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks I include a timely discussion by Gould Lincoln, noted political writer, concerning the current controversy over attacks on Secretary of State Acheson and his policies. This article, which appeared in the December 19 issue of the Washington Star, follows:

ATTACKS ON SECRETARY ARE DECLARED BEYOND POLITICS

(By Gould Lincoln)

The retirement of Secretary of State Acheson, under his own steam, seems the way out of the present controversy over the conduct of our foreign policies. You can argue until the cows come home whether President Truman or the Republicans in Congress are responsible for the unfortunate situation which sees Mr. Acheson representing this country at the Brussels Conference of the North Atlantic Pact Nations, under the shadow of a vote of "no confidence" by large majorities of the Republicans in the Senate and the House. But the situation is there, and something should be done about it.

The Republicans in Congress argue that the Secretary of State had lost the confidence of the American people—and that this was shown by the elections held in many States in November. They contend, indeed, that the election results were a mandate to get rid of Mr. Acheson, and that Mr. Truman stubbornly insisted on retaining his Secretary of State. They say further that they waited for more than a month before they unlimbered their guns and in party conference demanded the retirement of Mr. Acheson. They were unwilling, they continue, to compromise with principle or to see the will of the people disregarded.

DEMOCRATS ANXIOUS, TOO

It is admitted that a majority of Democratic Senators have been as anxious to have Mr. Acheson retired from office as have the Republicans. Some of them were saying recently that they wished Mr. Truman had changed his Secretary of State well before the election—and if he had done so, Democratic candidates would have had a better chance on election day.

President Truman got rid of Secretary of Defense Louis Johnson, when there was great public pressure against Mr. Johnson on the ground that he had failed to keep up the defenses of the country. There were plenty to say, and did say, after the resignation of Mr. Johnson, that Mr. Truman had eliminated the wrong man, and that he should have let out Mr. Acheson. In the state of temper of the voters last summer and fall, if Mr. Truman had held on to Mr. Johnson, as well as Mr. Acheson, as he had said he intended doing, the election results might have been even worse for the administration.

The argument made against the action of the Republicans in Congress on the Acheson matter cries to the heavens that this is no time for a divided country, with the war clouds rolling up faster and faster; that to undermine the effectiveness of a Secretary of State about to confer with our North Atlantic allies against Communist aggression is to play into the hands of the enemy, and break down the confidence of our allies. A great deal depends, however, on whether it is wiser to have the confidence of the American people in a Secretary of State, at this critical period, or more advantageous to make it appear to our allies and enemies abroad that the people are solidly back of a man in whom many Americans have no confidence.

FINAL RESPONSIBILITY

Mr. Truman, as Chief Executive, is finally responsible for the handling of our foreign relations and for our foreign policies. To a degree, therefore, it can be argued that it is really immaterial who is his Secretary of State—his messenger boy; that it makes little difference whether the Secretary of State be Dean Acheson or Chief Justice Vinson (who has been mentioned many times as a successor to Acheson) or another. Mr. Truman is the final arbiter, with all the decisions in his hands. Under such a hypothesis, Mr. Truman may contend, if he wishes, he is justified in keeping Mr. Acheson if he desires to do so.

However, the Secretary of State is the first officer of the President's Cabinet. Not only is he expected to advise the President wisely on foreign affairs and policy, but it is his duty to deal directly with foreign nations. Whether justly or unjustly, Mr. Acheson has been held responsible by many Americans for a policy in the Far East that has resulted in the strengthening of the Communist grip on China and the Korean war. It was this belief that aided the Republicans in the November elections, and helped to swell the totals by which Republican candidates were elected to the Senate. It has been obvious for a long time that a bipartisan foreign policy—such as that which prevailed during the Second World War and even 2 years ago—would be out of the question if Mr. Acheson remained as head of the State Department. His retention by the President was a challenge to bipartisanship.

The charge is made that the Republicans have seized upon Mr. Acheson as a whipping boy for the President himself, since there is no way to get rid of Mr. Truman before the elections of 1952, except through impeachment proceedings, and it is not practicable to impeach a President because of disagreement with his foreign policy. Their attack on Mr. Acheson, it is charged further, is pure politics. It goes, however, far beyond partisan politics, in the opinion of such men as Senator IVES, of New York, and impinges on the safety and future of the people.

Is National Unity To Be Subordinated to Political Interest of Republican Party?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 20, 1950

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include herewith the following article written by Joseph and Stewart Alsop entitled "Decline of This Republic," which appeared in the Washington Post, December 20, 1950:

DECLINE OF THIS REPUBLIC

(By Joseph and Stewart Alsop)

Anyone interested in finding out about the decay of American politics, should read the real story behind the Republican resolution demanding the dismissal of Secretary of State Dean G. Acheson. These reporters happen to believe that Acheson must be sacrificed, so that the country's Government can work again. But this by no means lessens the shock of the stories that have now seeped out of the House and Senate Republican conference chambers.

As to the House, what happened was about what you might expect. In the party steering committee, retiring Representative JAMES WADSWORTH, who sometimes seems to be the last American politician to care very much about national interests, was alone in warning that it was not helping to stab the Secretary of State in the back just before a major international conference. In the larger meeting of all the House Republicans, they took no vote. The anti-Acheson resolution was passed by a sort of unanimous howl, or yell, for blood.

The proceedings in the Senate, as might also be expected, were both more complex and vastly more meaningful. In brief, the Senate Republican steering committee, headed by Senator ROBERT A. TAFT of Ohio, had prepared a resolution much milder than the violent condemnation of Acheson howled through in the House. But Senator TAFT made no move to defend his handiwork when substitution of the House resolution was immediately proposed by Senator JAMES P. KEM, of Missouri, whose foreign and defense voting record is virtually indistinguishable from the unlamented VITO MARCANTONIO's.

Senator TAFT instead reserved his opposition for another substitute offered by Senator LEVERETT SALTONSTALL, of Massachusetts, and a number of other Republican moderates. This resolution made no mention of Acheson by name. It called only for changes in Government to promote national unity. And it particularly emphasized restoration of bipartisanship and consultation between leaders of all parties in this time of dire national peril.

On this resolution, speaking, of course, within the Republican family, Senator TAFT revealingly remarked that he disliked the whole idea of consultation. When the Republicans were consulted, he pointed out with perfect logic, they shared in the responsibility for what was subsequently done. But when they were not consulted, he continued, they could praise or blame the administration, particularly blame, as the outcome might suggest was most advantageous.

In short, in the view of Senator TAFT, which found much favor with his colleagues, national unity was to be subordinated to the political interests of the Republican Party.

Without TAFT to fight for it, the original steering committee draft resolution had few friends. The substitute of the moderates received only 15 votes in the conference. But a further issue was raised when Senator HOMER CAPEHART, of Indiana, another man with a foreign and defense voting record like KEM's, proposed a further amendment to the House resolution. The Capehart amendment demanded that Acheson's replacement as Secretary of State should be pure and unsullied by any contact with the development of American foreign policy in the last 5 years.

This was, of course, a naked attack on all responsible bipartisan-minded Republicans like Senator Arthur H. Vandenberg, John Foster Dulles, and Paul G. Hoffman. Senator WILLIAM KNOWLAND, of California, one of the guilty men, pointed this out to Senator CAPEHART. Senator CAPEHART replied simply that confession was good for the soul, and that the sooner the Republican Party got back to outright, all-out, unqualified isolationism the better it would be.

CAPEHART was at least beaten, and a sweetening mention of national unity was at least added to the Senate resolution to please the moderates. In this form, the retirement of Acheson was ringingly demanded.

Among the Senators so voting, a large majority, of course, knew that their action would arouse the Missouri mule in President Truman and make Acheson's retention more likely; these men indeed would be deeply disappointed if the President followed their advice and deprived them of their political target. A large majority among the Senators voting also realized that they were embarrassing national policy at the Brussels meeting. And, finally, a substantial minority among the Senators voting, including the loudest bellowers about Acheson's "softness toward communism," possessed foreign and defense policy records almost indistinguishable from the editorial lines of the Daily Worker.

Outstanding Americans Praise Hays-Judd Speaking Tour in Behalf of United Nations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. PERCY PRIEST
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 19, 1950

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call to general attention a splendid and timely project of two distinguished Members of the House of Representatives from opposite sides of the aisle.

The gentleman from Arkansas, Mr. BROOKS HAYS, and the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. WALTER JUDD, are at this time engaged in a Nation-wide joint speaking tour in support of the United Nations and bipartisan efforts to strengthen it.

They conceived this project weeks ago before the gravity of the world crisis had been fully revealed. The need to demonstrate the vigor of nonpartisanship on fundamental foreign policy was never greater. By their joint work in building support for a stronger UN, these two men have earned the praise and gratitude of the Nation.

No Members of Congress have been more ardent in their support of the UN than Mr. HAYS and Dr. JUDD. Earlier in this Congress they introduced a resolution to declare it to be a fundamental purpose of our foreign policy to strengthen and support the UN, and confer upon it powers sufficient to repel aggression. One hundred and eleven Members of the House and twenty-three Members of the Senate joined with them in cosponsoring this resolution. Their action was prophetic, for a crisis has arisen which can only be fully met by a stronger UN. Belatedly, the UN has begun to acquire some of the strength Representatives HAYS and JUDD sought to give it almost 4 years ago. For their foresight, and their heroic faith in the ultimate achievement of a rule of law in international affairs, we are all grateful to Representatives HAYS and JUDD.

The public response to the Hays-Judd tour has been gratifyingly favorable in every city in which they have spoken. In addition, a group of outstanding Americans has taken occasion to express some of the gratitude they feel to these two great exponents of international sanity and order. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the text of a letter addressed to our distinguished colleagues by over 100 leading citizens:

DECEMBER 3, 1950.

Hon. BROOKS HAYS,
Hon. WALTER H. JUDD.

DEAR CONGRESSMEN: The announcement of your forthcoming speaking tour, in support of the United Nations and efforts to strengthen it, comes as a heartening demonstration of the continued vitality of nonpartisanship on basic foreign-policy questions. As American citizens concerned for the welfare and security of our Nation, we recognize that the future of the United States is inexorably bound up with the future of the United Nations.

It is vital for the preservation of democracy and freedom that every American citizen understand the pressing need to equip the United Nations with the power to prevent war. Your speaking tour will bring understanding of the issues to wide audiences. You are making a great contribution to the future peace of the world.

We commend the high statesmanship of your undertaking and wish you every success in your efforts.

Agriculture Is Contributing to Our Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. S. J. CARNAHAN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 20, 1950

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith the following article published in the Missouri Farmer, Columbia, Mo., entitled "Agriculture Is Contributing to Our Foreign Policy," by F. L. Moritz:

AGRICULTURE IS CONTRIBUTING TO OUR FOREIGN POLICY

(By F. L. Moritz)

Foreign relations and affairs, to an average Missouri farm family, is something that is decided upon in Washington by the State Department and instrumented by career-conscious diplomats. This generally accepted conclusion is not far from fact, but with one exception.

This exception is the interchange of "grass root" diplomats between the United States and 16 free nations participating in the Economic Cooperation Administration's program of exchanging international information. These "grass root" diplomats of whom we speak are just plain people even as you and I.

They are sincere, hard-working, curious citizens of their nations, dedicated to gaining a knowledge and understanding of American agriculture. They are visiting these United States to get an inside viewpoint on our way of life. They are observing technical methods used in agricultural production, studying agricultural extension programs, participating in group discussions, attending farm youth group activities, visiting farm organizations and practicing democracy while living with farm families in every State in the Union.

The foreign farmers participating in this exchange of ideas are present in the United States as part of the ECA program and through the International Farm Youth Exchange. Since the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948 was signed by the President, nearly 2,000 foreign agricultural specialists and farmers, both young and old, have visited the United States.

Missouri has been host to 37 of these foreign agricultural trainees. Some of these trainees have lived right in your community during the last 2 years for a period up to 3 months in some cases. They have been accepted by leading farmers as a member of their family. They have observed and worked with standard farm equipment, become familiar with our soils and crops, visited local community activities, and have lived as Missourians live.

"GRASS ROOTS" DIPLOMATS

Missouri, too, has sent "grass roots" diplomats to Western Europe in reciprocation. These mutual exchange trainees from Missouri, however, have been fewer in number. Last year, Van Eitel, from Adair County, spent about 6 months as an international farm youth exchange delegate in the Netherlands and in France. This year, Scott Sawyer, a Missouri University agriculture graduate, has spent all summer in Europe and returned to the United States in November.

Scott was one of 42 IFYE delegates representing 26 States who visited and worked on farms in 14 countries participating in the ECA program of exchanging ideas and skills through a two-way traffic system. In addition to IFYE delegates, other farm leaders and agricultural specialists have visited Europe and other continents. A Missouri example is Arnold Klemme, extension soils specialist, who attended the International Soil Congress held at Amsterdam, Holland, and later visited Germany and France observing agricultural production methods. In addition to Klemme, 10 other delegates registered from Missouri at the International Soil Congress.

This transformation from a Nation of isolationists to one of encouraging partnerships with the remaining free countries is twofold in purpose. First, interaction with peoples of other countries will lead to a better understanding and accordingly to a higher standard of living for the world through this exchange of technical skills and knowledge.

Secondly, and this is not in order of importance, this better understanding between free nations accomplished through the exchange of ideas by observers rather than statemen is our strongest bulwark against communism both abroad and at home.

EXPRESSES OUR NATIONAL INTERESTS

Our foreign policy is one expressing our national interests. Our national interests are an increase in standards of living; eliminating the threat of wars; and protecting individual freedom through a democratic form of government.

There never has been a time in the history of our Nation when we could go about the business of promoting our national interests free from the threat of destructive forces. These destructive forces stem from groups both within and outside these United States. These forces have and will continue to try to profit at the expense of the freedom and well-being of our citizens and of people who still remain free from oppression in other lands.

Applying these basic principles on the home front and abroad is what the ECA, in cooperation with extension services and farm organizations, is doing with this two-way traffic system of international information.

Down in Barry County on the Henry Arnaud 80-acre diversified farm is a typical agricultural trainee by the name of Michel Mousnier from Burgnac, France. Michel is a farm lad of 22 who has the equivalent of a high-school education. He also has spent some time in the French Air Academy and a year in the French Foreign Legion in North Africa.

Michel's father owns a farm of 240 acres, half tillable and half in pasture land. They practice diversified farming, owning 100–120 dual purpose beef cows with the majority entered in the Limousin (breed) herdbook. Grain crops are produced following a soil improvement program. Five families, including 10 men, are employed on the farm to do the work.

According to standards in France, Michel's father is a large landowner and could be classified in the upper middle-class group of farmers. Production per man employed on the farm is low, however, when compared to American standards. For example, Michel spent 3 months on a 250-acre diversified farm in Minnesota before coming to the Henry Arnaud farm in Barry County, Mo.

LEARNS BY DOING

On this 250-acre farm following diversified farming operations, one man and his family do all the required work and management. Here is the major difference between French and American agriculture, Michel observed.

Total production per man in America is at least five times greater than in France. In the United States, 20 percent of the population is engaged in farming and 10 percent of this group produced 90 percent of the food, while in France 50 percent of the population live on farms. This means that the over-all standard of living among the farm population in France is low—almost in the peasant class.

The reason United States farmers are ahead of French farmers in production per man is rather obvious. French farms are not mechanized as are United States farms. French farmers are highly skilled in crop production and soil conservation, but they lag behind United States farmers in putting farm production on an assembly-line basis.

Of course, to think that Michel could go back to put his father's farm on a management and production basis like United States farms is out of the question at the present. These five families now engaged in agricultural production would have to find a livelihood in industrial areas. This would be almost impossible (to any large degree) since France also lags behind in industrial development.

ECA is working on this also with the European Recovery Act. Industrial equipment and technical skills are being exported from the United States to all free nations cooperating with the ECA program. In fact, more ECA money is being spent on industrial equipment and rearmament than for agricultural industrialization and education. France, in truth, is an exporter of agricultural products.

This brings us back to Michel Mousnier again. What is he gaining in the United States that he can take back to France and put to some immediate practical use?

First, he can take back part of our philosophy of life. He can apply immediately our democratic way of doing things. He can use and recommend our individualistic approach in solving current French farm problems. His working knowledge of our agricultural extension service and how it functions can be told at group meetings. His insight on our youth group activities will be valuable when he and fellow workers start organizing similar units.

Michel's observations of farm organization effectiveness in Missouri can be compared to his own French farm organizations to good advantage. Technical knowledge and skills picked up will lead him to greater initiative in confronting relative conditions at home. Many other items of first-hand knowledge that we just take as a matter of course can be used and applied on his own French farm, in his own community and for the well-being of the free French nation.

Michel is getting a splendid opportunity to acquire these pieces of our United States in Missouri as he did in Minnesota. Michel attended the American Royal with Barry County agent, Blake Carpenter. He spent a day with Henry Arnaud at the Barry County Poultry Improvement Day held in Monett in October. He visited the Producers' Creamery Co. at Monett, where the vast fluid milk marketing system in southwest Missouri was explained to Michel. Farm Action Days and Pasture Improvement programs have also been on Michel's scheduled itinerary.

Michel is also learning how we work. In fact, when county agent, Blake Carpenter and myself drove in the front gate of the Arnaud homestead, Michel was busy digging potatoes in the family garden.

Michel has his eyes open for American practices, skills, ideas, and social customs that he can put to use in his own community.

We are also profiting through this mutual exchange of people and ideas. Perhaps the realization that our form of government and our way of life is our most valuable asset is worth all ECA funds now being spent. Technical knowledge—about soil conservation, crop production, research, and so forth—will put us years ahead in our thinking. Europe, incidentally, is about 50 years ahead of United States farmers in soil conservation, crop production, and land-usage programs.

Michel Mousnier and the nearly 2,000 agricultural trainees and observers of American agriculture are going back with a strong faith in our democracy. They will be better prepared mentally to meet the ever-increasing onslaught of communistic propaganda. Their attitude will be fortified with the knowledge that only under a democratic system of government can they have a nation of free people—free from oppression, hunger, and want.

Communism thrives best in a vacuum of ignorance, in a place of want, and always by force. ECA is eliminating through its point-4 program many of these communistic breeding spots. It is costly to the United States taxpayer—more than $11,500,000,000 for the first 3 years. This aid has been in the form of butter and guns, education and administration, industrial equipment, and loans—and men.

Our desire to promote the growth of freedom in the world through the interaction of Michel Mousnier and the Henry Arnaud family in Barry County is only an infinitesimal step in the direction of securing independence for the remaining free nations and showing interdependence necessary between nations to discourage communistic aggression.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 20, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to enclose the following article from the American Federationist, December 1950:

EDITORIALS

(By William Green)

NO MORE APPEASEMENT

A grave situation has grown out of the intervention of Communist Chinese troops in Korea. The United Nations forces, after terrific fighting and bloody sacrifices, reached the thirty-eighth parallel where they rested and awaited orders to subdue aggression in North Korea. Later, when they moved toward the northern border of North Korea, they found themselves opposed by huge armies from Red China.

The United States called upon the Security Council to require the Peiping regime to withdraw its armies and to send representatives to answer charges of aggression. The American delegate said that Red China should be summoned—not invited—a position which reflects American feeling. Our troops have borne the brunt of the battle to defeat the Communist aggressors, armed with Soviet equipment, in Korea, and we cannot dishonor our citizens who made the supreme sacrifice to oppose brutal aggression rather than yield on principle.

The time is long past for appeasement of Communists anywhere. Our Army fought with Nationalist China as an ally in the Pacific battles to defeat Japanese aggression. It was a bloody war, and before it was ended the diplomats had made concessions to Stalin at Yalta that made possible his bringing continental eastern Asia within the Russian orbit. Stalin also demanded and received concessions in Europe that enabled him to place Eastern Europe in his empire.

We liberated Korea from Japanese control. Before its conquest by Japan, Korea had had an independent government for several thousands of years. Then the United Nations permitted Stalin to control half of the country, while we became responsible for South Korea.

The Security Council decided to invite the Peiping government to have a representative attend the meeting of the Council to discuss complaints of armed invasion of Formosa. On November 8 the Security Council extended an invitation to the Chinese Communists to attend the Council's meeting to discuss General MacArthur's documented charges that Red Chinese troops had intervened to aid North Korean forces against the United Nations. The United States representatives on the Security Council opposed the first invitation and argued that the second should be a summons instead of an invitation, but they did not vote against it.

The Kremlin is unquestionably responsible for the present grave situation. The Kremlin has a treaty of alliance with the Chinese Communists. Molotov was sent to Peiping to arrange plans shortly after the United Nations acted to repel the aggression in Korea. Mao Tse-tung has been conferring with other Kremlin agents. The aggressors in Korea have been using the latest Russian weapons during the recent fighting. The Communist Chinese delegation has come to Lake Success by way of the U. S. S. R.

Thus it is clear that our real enemy is Communist Russia. The Kremlin is responsible for the invasions of South Korea, of Tibet and Indochina. The Kremlin interferes with Austrian police, impedes Berlin traffic, manufactures munitions in East Germany and arms the East Germans.

The United Nations is anxious to avoid war with Red China. The United Nations received a request from Tibet for protection against the Kremlin-inspired invasion by Communist Chinese armies. The United States cannot afford to involve all of its forces in fighting Soviet satellites when we are needing to prepare against the real enemy—Stalin and the Politburo. Neither can we afford to aid the United Nations in enforcing its authority if that agency does not carry through to a settlement based on principles of its Charter.

The feeling of the people of the United States toward any foreign policy of appeasement of communism was expressed emphatically in the recent elections and in the large numbers of citizens who turned out to vote. Whatever necessitates conscription of American boys must be based on sound moral principles.

THE ELECTION

Returns from the election were disappointing in that we failed to defeat some candidates hostile to effective unionism. On the other hand, the election was gratifying in that it revealed the preponderance of American citizens who regard defense against the Communist international conspiracy as the major issue before our Government.

Both in the House and in the Senate prominent persons who fell short of direct opposition to Communist agents and machinations were defeated. The House Member who never failed to follow the Communist Party line was ousted. With our boys dying on the battlefield, American citizens are bitter against that nation which is prepared for war, which instigates aggression, which robs smaller nations of their freedoms and which never honors its obligations. Labor made definite gains in many of the less conspicuous contests.

From this experience a few principles for future action become obvious. The main ones are these: Our efforts to gain legislative acceptance of the functions necessary for effective trade-unionism must be directed and controlled by trade-unionists for trade-unionists, and trade-unions must be the agencies for educating trade-union voters.

The American Federation of Labor has no desire to form a political party or to dominate an existing political party, but party conventions must heed our requests for necessary correction of injustices to labor and grievances from slow and inadequate action against administrative evils.

The American Federation of Labor is not retiring from political activity. It cannot do so in a democracy which expects and permits every group of citizens to provide its own welfare. The American Federation of Labor has been in politics since its organization in 1881, but it has been and is in politics in support of principles of labor and the national welfare and in support of those who have proven themselves friends by supporting our objectives.

The American Federation of Labor is a reasonable, experienced, democratic institution—an integral part of our Nation—deliberately fashioned to operate as a free, democratic institution in a democratic society.

DEFENSE AND CONTROLS

All consumers are conscious of inflation. They get the story of inflation in its destructive effects on the purchasing power of their dollars. Rising prices are the consequence of inflation.

In the last war we were able to conceal the effects of inflation to a considerable extent by controlling prices and wages. But demand left the controlled markets for the black and gray markets—free markets with high prices measuring inflation. After the war, in order to return to civilian production with expansion of facilities to meet new needs, we lifted the controls on prices, wages, and consumer credit. Prices quickly rose to black-market heights, while wages trailed behind.

To the inflationary effect of the low-interest rates maintained by the Treasury were added the inflationary forces of industrial expansion, price support for farm products, our high investments in European recovery, and new peaks in consumer credit. We learned from that experience the primary causes of inflation—cheap, unlimited credit (that is, money inflation) and scarcity of supplies of commodities in proportion to demand.

Police action to defeat aggression in Korea in addition to the rearming of Western Europe in accordance with the Atlantic Pact found our economy at peak levels of production, employment and national income, with no reductions in the national debt. The impingement of war-production demands on metals already made scarce by unprecedented activity in the construction, automobile, and television industries added to inflationary forces. Because defense production limits civilian production, buyers, in order not to be caught short, began purchasing for anticipated needs. And again prices moved upward.

In a short time wage earners' dollars shrank 4 to 5 percent. Unions are trying to recoup the losses in purchasing power suffered by working people and provide against future losses. Not to do so would mean lowered standards of living without retarding inflation.

In August, Congress passed the National Production Act of 1950 and increased income taxes. The Production Act authorizes controls for consumer and real-estate credit. It also authorizes the stabilization of prices and wages and necessary expansion of production facilities. The Federal Reserve Board has curbed consumer credit. Construction activity has slowed down.

In order not to increase the national debt, we should try to pay for defense on a pay-as-you-go basis. Congress, of course, is responsible for appropriate fiscal policies and the Treasury can deal with money inflation or commercial credit. The degree of inflation is the result of policies in all of these fields.

To prevent inadequate defense production, Congress has authorized the President to requisition facilities to expand or increase the number of defense-production plants. Expanded facilities mean increased employment and increased consumer buying power impinging on scarcer consumer goods. The President was given power to proceed by voluntary methods and, when necessary, by mandatory methods. The President was also given ample powers to enforce the act.

Defense production is now about 5 percent of our total economy. New defense appropriations will raise this proportion substantially. What it will be ultimately depends on the plans and policies of the Kremlin. We know defense production will be with us for years. If the international tension stops short of war, defense production must be integrated with civilian production. If war comes, civilian production will be restricted.

In either event, the normal way to deal with American citizens is to give them the facts of need and ask them to accept additional responsibility. As pointed out in the beginning, inflation is the cumulative effect of many forces. Any program designed to deal with inflation must therefore be directed and made effective by these same groups working together on a coordinated program.

Neither the Federal Reserve Board, the Treasury, nor single industries, nor single unions, nor farm groups, acting independently, can control inflation. But meeting together to face facts, to agree upon a program and to allot responsibility for carrying out plans, voluntary industrial agents can organize to control and check inflation. The crux of voluntary controls for the common interests and welfare is inclusive organization for planning and for executing plans jointly.

In the long period ahead we must prepare to guard our free institutions at home and be alert to attacks on liberty throughout the world. Our economy must have flexibility as well as sureness of output. This requires wholehearted cooperation that comes from having a common goal and sharing responsibility. We must keep free from control by bureaucrats who in the long period of defense might become so firmly imbedded in our national life as to make return to free economic agencies well nigh impossible.

The National Production Act requires voluntary controls first. The first step is to organize voluntary groups with authority to cooperate. These groups should work out the machinery of voluntary controls. No effort has yet been made to utilize voluntary controls.

Defense production and war production need the same type of cooperation as inflation controls. Conversion orders should have the benefit of consultation with workers and management in the process of their development as a safeguard against mistakes and friction.

We urge as basic policy the fullest use of voluntary industrial organizations in the policy making for defense production.

Correspondence With the President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. F. EDWARD HÉBERT
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 20, 1950

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Speaker, by permission of the House, I submit this exchange of correspondence which speaks for itself:

DECEMBER 5, 1950.

Hon. HARRY S. TRUMAN,
President of the United States,
The White House,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The present crisis in which we are living is naturally of great concern to every American, and it is in that connection that I respectfully submit a suggestion to which I hope you will agree.

In these times of indecision and unrest it is most imperative that our people become united and solidified in the common cause of the preservation of our accepted way of life. To that end I suggest that you, as President of the United States, call upon the churches of America, Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish, to set aside a Sunday between now and Christmas, to appeal to Almighty God for guidance and wisdom in what I believe to be the Gethsemane of our existence.

I believe that now is the time for our people to set aside whatever differences of opinion that might exist in a unified effort for ultimate success in our fight to continue the freedom of the free peoples of the world. I believe and suggest that the spiritual leaders of our nations be called upon to set aside a Sunday on which the respective pastors shall urge the people of this country to join in prayer to the God of their belief to give to our responsible officials, political and military, the wisdom and the courage, to arrive at the right and proper decisions. At the same time I believe that our religious leaders should explain to their flock the ideals and principles for which we are fighting, and for which many are offering up the supreme sacrifice.

Certainly we are engaged in a crusade as important as any in which our forebears ever participated. Our modern crusaders, under the banner of the United Nations, are fighting just as hard and as vigorously and as courageously, to gain the Holy Grail of individual liberty and freedom as any knight who went forth in the armor of his time.

I do hope, Mr. President, that you will see fit to concur in this suggestion, and ask the churches of America to set aside a Sunday prior to Christmas, the feast day of the nativity of the Prince of Peace, to call upon God in this fight against a godless ideology. And where should the peoples of the world look for help and assistance in a fight against God except to God Himself.

It is my sincere belief that the psychological effect on the American people and the peoples of the world would be a terrific impact in the cause which we all espouse and in a united Nation to fight the forces of evil which threaten us at the moment.

I do hope I have your concurrence.

Cordially yours,

F. EDWARD HÉBERT.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, December 7, 1950.

Hon. F. EDWARD HÉBERT,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN HÉBERT: I appreciate very much your letter of the fifth, and I am enclosing you a copy of my Thanksgiving proclamation, inviting your attention to the windup of that proclamation beginning, "Now, therefore." I think that effectively answers your suggestion.

I am extremely sorry that the sentiments expressed in your letter were not thought of before November 7, when the campaign in your State, Utah, North Carolina, Illinois, and Indiana was carried on in a manner that was as low as I've ever seen and I've been in this game since 1906.

Sincerely yours,

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

DECEMBER 8, 1950.

Hon. HARRY S. TRUMAN,
President of the United States,
The White House,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I am stunned by the contents of your letter of December 7 in reply to my letter of December 5.

It is indeed exceedingly regrettable that you failed to grasp the real purpose and intent of my suggestion, but it is even more regrettable that you saw fit to gratuitously inject political distemper in your reply.

Respectfully yours,

F. EDW. HÉBERT.

Doctors "Bungle," Doctor Says

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 19, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, with permission to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD, I attach the following editorial from the November 21 issue of the Milwaukee Journal. What it says about the medical profession warrants attention not only from members of the profession, but from the rest of us.

DOCTORS "BUNGLE," DOCTOR SAYS

There is nothing very novel in a warning to the medical profession to mend some of its ways or expect to lose some of its cherished freedom. Such a warning, from a leading member of the profession, the retiring president of the Southern Medical Association, rates as unusual, if not unprecedented, however.

Dr. Hamilton W. McKay, of Charlotte, N. C., didn't mince words.

"If the people cannot convince themselves that organized medicine is taking vigorous steps to correct its own shortcomings, they will insist that the initiative for action be transferred to other hands," he said.

He accused the doctors of "bungling" in their relations with the public and their patients. The profession has been doing "a sorry job" in the matter of self-discipline, he added, depriving the public of the protection it deserves against overcharging and incompetence on the part of certain practitioners.

When laymen say the same sort of thing—as they have, time and again—they are rewarded with scorn, a condescending shrug or haughty silence. The lay critic is reminded that he isn't a doctor and so cannot know what he is talking about. Or he is accused of being simply a mud slinger, ignoring all the fine services and traditions of the profession, especially the unselfish devotion of doctors to their patients.

Dr. McKay, however, speaks as an honored doctor of long experience. Paying tribute to the great accomplishments and advances by his profession, the high standards and fine intent of better doctors all around the country, he courageously points to faults that can destroy public confidence and fetter the doctors.

From such a source, the words should bear weight among the leaders of the medical profession.

How Study of the Work of Congress and Its Members Will Strengthen Our Free American System in Time of Crisis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 19, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, we have all been following with interest the effort of a group of public-spirited newspapermen to erect another bulwark around our free American system by attempting to broaden public knowledge of the work of Congress and its Members through the Committee for Congress and its program of study.

This is a necessary endeavor in normal times, but it is even more important in time of crisis that we should do everything possible to create a better public understanding of our Congress.

I am pleased, therefore, to request publication in the Appendix of the RECORD, a general outline of study to be followed by the Congress Study Council, using Your Congress magazine as the main source of authentic current information, along with a tentative bibliography, and the statement of registration of the Committee for Congress, 1060 National Press Building, as a nonprofit educational corporation:

COMMITTEE FOR CONGRESS,
NATIONAL PRESS BUILDING,
Washington, D. C.

GENERAL OUTLINE AND STUDY PROGRAM SUPPLIED BY THE CONGRESS STUDY COUNCIL OF THE COMMITTEE FOR CONGRESS, VOLUNTARY, NONPROFIT CITIZEN PROJECT TO STRENGTHEN THE AMERICAN GOVERNMENTAL SYSTEM THROUGH DISSEMINATION OF SPECIFIC INFORMATION ON THE FUNCTIONS, DUTIES, AND RESPONSIBILITIES OF THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES AND ITS MEMBERS

It is unfortunate that an amazing amount of misinformation is given to the public about Congress. It is this situation that the study program of the Committee for Congress, working through Your Congress magazine and various other educational and informational media, will endeavor to correct.

Naturally, this misinformation is not always intentional, but it continues constantly in the news columns, on radio programs, in books and magazines, in motion pictures. The study program is an effort to present a true picture of the real facts of the workings of Congress and the work of its Members both in the Senate and the House of Representatives.

Basically, the study will attempt to correct the erroneous impression that Federal lawmaking is either a simple process or a secret operation that ignores the public interest.

One reason for general misunderstanding about the lawmaking function and other activities on the Hill is the inability to explain the whole lawmaking process in current news reports and radio and television broadcasts.

Actually, the regular media do not have sufficient space, and the repetition required in order to perform an educational job, would be contrary to elementary publication requirements. History and civic books cover the subject in general yet cannot go into the necessary detail on the actual work of Congress because of the many other subjects that must be explored.

As a result of inability of these media to include the whole picture, people, young and old, get a distorted picture of Congress at work. The result is that the benefits of our representative, republican form of government are often lost to view, and the impression is created that our congressional system is neither efficient in its operation or irresponsive to the public need, when the contrary viewpoint is usually true.

The study program will go into detail in explaining the work of the Congress. It will elaborate in various ways to make it clear how the Senate and House of Representatives pass a law, and it is signed by the President to become law.

The studies will endeavor to bring out for all to understand what Messrs. George H. E. Smith and Floyd M. Riddick in their excellent Congress in Action describe as "the real genius of the American system of government."

It will demonstrate how our committee system requires an inquiry into all aspects of national problems, how selfish interests are brought to light, how every citizen, whatever his occupation, or income, or station in life, has a chance to tell how he thinks a law should be drafted.

It will, in other words, reveal in detail how the elaborate system of checks and balances protects the public welfare. The study will also show that Congress can act speedily in an emergency, and also endeavors to the best of its ability to keep all citizens informed of what it is doing.

It will be shown that Congress tries to act in conformance with wishes of the general public in the best interests of the Nation, acting in response to the will of the people.

Congress is aware that the laws will be respected by a free people only when they are approved by the majority of the people. Congress is a living entity that is close to the daily lives of American citizens. The people themselves, through taxes, support the Government, and are entitled to and have a direct hand in the deliberations and decisions of the legislative bodies.

The Committee for Congress recognizes that in modern days when the United States Government has entered intimately into the lives of every citizen, there is need for all citizens, young and old, to know what is being done by Congress on their behalf.

It is thus essential for our people, in order to understand national and international events, to have a thorough grasp of the lawmaking functions of their Congress, in order that their Government shall work in the best interest of all concerned.

The Congress study program will be served in its initial stages by quarterly publications of Your Congress magazine, to be supplied to schools, colleges, and interested adult groups, including factory groups, unions, women's clubs, service clubs, and others. Members of Congress themselves will be asked to serve as discussion leader when available. The Congress Study Council will, through the magazine, supply a study outline, which will endeavor to keep readers and students abreast of all phases of the work of Congress.

COMMITTEE FOR CONGRESS, STATEMENT OF REGISTRATION AS A NONPROFIT EDUCATIONAL CORPORATION

The Committee for Congress has been registered in the District of Columbia as a nonprofit educational corporation. Founding members of the Committee for Congress are: Joseph Young, newspaperman and author; Duncan Aikman, author; Maj. Gen. Henry J. Reilly, former editor of the Army and Navy Journal; William A. Republican Responsibility

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 19, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Boston Traveler of December 10, 1950:

REPUBLICAN RESPONSIBILITY

The Republicans in Congress have driven a tank through the remains of a united, bipartisan foreign policy.

Their resolution demanding Acheson's resignation scatters even the smithereens of that policy that were left after Mr. Truman had laid his heavy hand to it.

The timing of the Republican move was perfect, from the disastrous point of view of paralyzing European rearmament.

It came on the very eve of Acheson's departure for Brussels where the Secretary of State was to make a desperate argument for a major European arms effort—now, not next month.

With one stroke the Republicans in Congress have destroyed the standing of this vital mission. Acheson will go to Europe with two strikes on him. The Europeans will not believe that he speaks for America. Nor will they believe that Governor Dewey's stirring call for national unity and full speed ahead on mobilization represents an important point of view, since the congressional Republicans have acted against his urgent advice.

They will remember that the Republican Party in Congress says it has no confidence in our foreign policy. They will recall that the cornerstone of that policy has been aid to Europe in order to make its 270,000,000 people strong enough to defend themselves, with our help. And they will despair.

That despair will have far more favorable consequences for the Kremlin's world dictatorship aims than the unleashing of Red China's legions. It may mean victory in the west for Stalin without even a fight, if it stuns the Europeans into hopelessness that they can survive.

The Traveler has said that if Mr. Acheson's dismissal is the price of national unity in the time of our greatest peril, then he must go. We have said this even though we have no sympathy for the attempts to make any man the scapegoat for a national situation that has so many and such complex reasons for existence.

The Republicans must also pay a price if their actions result in the firing of Mr. Acheson. That price is an absolute end to the divisive discord on foreign policy that has so far been the main Republican contribution in Congress to the meeting of the national emergency.

Governor Dewey said it well 10 days ago when he slapped down the Ives resolution against Acheson. The head of the Republican Party declared that, with the fate of the Free World depending on American strength and unity, "this moment is not the time for further criticism."

The moment Mr. Dewey referred to was the week of the Truman-Attlee talks. The Republicans held their fire then. They let it go at an even worse moment.

The unprecedented Republican action is a cheap substitute for impeachment. If they had a real case against Acheson, or a genuine substitute for the policies that go under his name, they could have presented formal charges against him, and moved constitutionally to oust him from office. With their resolution demanding his removal they achieve the same partisan advantage without taking on the responsibility for their action.

It is this irresponsibility that is the main political threat to our safety. If we would survive as a nation we must put it aside, now and for the duration.

Time To Reexamine Our Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CHARLES W. VURSELL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 20, 1950

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, since the close of World War II the foreign policy of this administration to contain communism world-wide and to protect any nation in the world in case of aggression, has led us into the Korean and the Chinese Communist war. There is great danger under this foreign policy that we will be called upon to enter into a more devastating war to help the Atlantic Pact nations from Russian aggression.

Such a war may explode in full force within the next 12 months. Russia is in a position to start other wars it being our responsibility under our present foreign policy, to help fight. We are in serious military trouble now in Korea because of the shortage of trained military manpower. We have only a skeleton force now in Western Germany and little or no reserves in this country that can be thrown in any sizable numbers into any conflict that may develop.

Our present foreign policy is to send 200,000 well-equipped soldiers to Europe for the defense of the Atlantic Pact nations and to further supply those nations with more men and supplies of every kind running into a cost of countless billions of dollars.

Certainly the time is here now when the executive department and our military high command and the Congress directly representing the people should make a careful study and reexamination of our entire foreign policy. In the interest of our own people it is our responsibility to make a cold analysis of world conditions and to decide what course in the future we can follow which will best protect the interest of our own people of the United States and secondly our just contribution to other nations.

There is a limit to the load the American people can carry in world affairs. We must be realistic because of the crisis confronting us. If it will serve our best interests we should change our foreign policy before it is too late.

Mr. Speaker, at the close of World War II, through the great sacrifice of 12,000,000 American soldiers who had won every victory, they placed in the hands of our executive department the greatest power ever given to the leaders of a nation—the power to enforce world peace. World peace was not only the responsibility of our leaders but it was within their grasp. We were then respected with awesome admiration by the nations and the people of the world.

We had the most powerful Army, Navy, and Air Force the world had ever known, and in addition, we had the atomic bomb.

Through overconfidence, in the Russian leaders, and the work of the Communists in our own country, the representatives of our Government through the appeasement of Russia at the conferences of Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam, lost the peace of the world.

They gave Russia great power in Eastern Europe, gave away China, and half of Korea to the Communist dictators which brought on the Korean war and war with Communist China.

In this war we have suffered humiliation before the world and the most tragic defeats of American arms in our history.

The administration that at first published to the world that Korea was outside of our defense line and was of no value from a military or strategic standpoint, after changing its policy, a few months later when South Korea was invaded, is now groping about to try to determine what shall be our future policy with reference to Korea and the Far East.

I would like to suggest that if we intend to try to hold South Korea, that the mistake by the United Nations and the executive department of our Government in refusing to accept the military power of Chiang Kai-shek, be corrected at the earliest possible moment.

That we permit the Nationalist Chinese in Formosa to go into the mainland of China with all of the power at their command which is estimated at over 500,000 well-trained fighting troops.

The belief is widely held that such a move by Chiang Kai-shek to the mainland of China would bring to his well-equipped army, a million Chinese patriots who are anxious to fight under his banner to drive Communists out of China.

If the United States Government would furnish a reasonable amount of financial assistance to feed and help to equip such an army, it might be able to drive the Communists out of the territory they have now overrun.

All the members of the United Nations, except the Chinese Nationalist government, were called by its secretary, Trygve Lie to send troops to help the United States in the Korean war. Few responded and the United States has borne the great burden of the battle almost alone. Chiang Kai-shek, a member of the United Nations, offered to send 35,000 troops immediately, and was denied the opportunity to do so. In fact, the President, through our State Department, placed a military embargo against his invading the continent of China which is still effective.

The Chinese people need food more than anything else. Food and some military equipment plus the patriotism of the Chinese people which can still be had by a show of real friendship on the part of our Government can turn the tide of war against the North Chinese puppets of the Kremlin Reds.

It is doubtful if we can maintain a toehold in Korea unless this aid is accepted and becomes effective at the earliest possible date. In fact, unless our policy is changed to accept full support from the Nationalist Chinese government at Formosa, it would be the part of wisdom to pull every American soldier out of Korea and the Far East at the earliest possible moment.

It was never our intention to defend Korea. It was written off as being worthless from a military or strategic standpoint by the State Department. We would have been far better off in the Far East today if we had stayed out of Korea and had taken Formosa into our perimeter of defense. We did not do this because we were still following the Lattimore-Service appeasement policy in the Far East. We did not want to offend the Chinese northern Communists.

Mr. Speaker, what about Europe? If we pull out of the Far East, Russia has avoided being compelled to fight a war on two fronts, will be able to expand her power there without further opposition, and will be able to concentrate all of her efforts on the western front. She can overrun Germany, take possession of the great Ruhr coal mines, and industrial heart of Western Europe adding greatly to her military strength and power.

Recent warnings she has directed to England and France indicate she may be preparing to make such a move. In fact, Russia can extend her control out to the Atlantic against only token opposition. The question is, will she wait 2 years giving the United States and western powers time to build up a strong military defense. It is hardly reasonable to believe that she will.

The concern of England, France, and the Atlantic Pact nations, if Russia is given the excuse to start world war III, is reflected in England's recognition of the Communist Chinese government some months ago, followed by the attempted appeasement of Russia in the Far East. The recognition of this danger was further reflected in Attlee's recent visit to the United States for a conference with the President and his plea that greater help from the United States in supplies, arms, and men should be provided and expedited to the western European nations.

Notwithstanding their realization of the dangerous position they are in they have been slow to agree upon a plan or to begin mobilizing their own economic and military strength.

Those in charge of our Government seem to have failed to inform the nations of Western Europe that we expected them to carry the major part of their own burdens in the defense of their own countries, else they would have made greater progress building up their own power with the assistance we have given them, both economic and military during th past few years.

I fear we are now making a serious mistake in allowing an American general to be appointed to the position of Supreme Commander of the Atlantic Pact Nations. By such action, with General MacArthur in command of our Far East forces and with an American general in supreme command of Western European forces, we give Russia a propaganda advantage in charging us with being guilty of world imperialism.

An ever greater objection is that it can well give the European nations the impression that the defense of Western Europe is primarily the responsibility of the United States, and secondly, their responsibility.

I think our Government should have insisted that the supreme commander should be picked from the European nations, and the United States name the second in command.

The European nations should be made to understand that they must organize and lead the fight in the defense of their own countries if war comes, and that we would help them to the extent of our ability only when they had demonstrated they were willing to do it.

We have taken the lead with General MacArthur in the Far East with very little assistance from other members of the United Nations organizations and it has largely been our war. We have not been properly supported. Our men have fought against great odds, and have suffered defeats for the first time in our history because of being greatly outnumbered. We have lost much prestige before the world. We should guard against being placed in the same position in Western Europe.

The time has come for a cold analysis and reexamination of our foreign and military policies. The people of the United States and her soldiers in one generation have been dragged into two wars with tragic losses of manpower, and we are now loaded down with an almost unbearable national debt. Through the bungling of this administration and its continued mistakes in our foreign policy, we are now involved in possibly another world-wide conflict.

Russia has been allowed to maneuver us into a position where she can start one war after another until she bleeds us white financially, exhaust our resources and manpower, which could wreck our Nation financially.

Our Government, under the direction of its present leaders, has given away to other nations since the end of World War II some $35,000,000,000. Now we are preparing to give away that many more billions to build up the defense of the Atlantic Pact nations, in addition to levying a tax burden of over $40,000,000,000 this year for defense alone for our own country. There is a limit to the ability of the people, who are the government, to continue to carry such tax burdens.

There is grave danger of spending ourselves into financial bankruptcy. A cold analysis of the European and world situation should be made by our executive department and the Members of Congress before we go so far within the next few months that we cannot turn back.

Unless the European nations proceed to mobilize all of their economic and military resources for the defense of their own countries, we should not go further in helping to underwrite their efforts.

If they do not, we should turn our attention to building up the defense of our own country which can be made so strong we can protect it against any nation or combination of nations. The welfare of our own people is, in fact, and always has been, the first responsibility of the Congress and every official of the Government.

AMA on Aid to Medical Schools

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 20, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, with permission to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD, I attach a cogent editorial from the December 23 issue of America, the National Catholic Weekly. Entitled "AMA on Aid to Medical Schools," it is a direct contradiction of the position taken by the American Medical Association on that vital issue and properly classifies the organization's recent $500,000 contribution for that purpose as a drop in the bucket.

AMA ON AID TO MEDICAL SCHOOLS

At its fourth annual clinical session, held in Cleveland on December 4–8, the American Medical Association came out flatly against Federal aid to medical schools. This is in line with the AMA's fight against socialism. The Federal-aid-to-medical-education bill was passed unanimously by the United States Senate in 1949, with the active support of such anti-Socialists as Senators ROBERT A. TAFT, FORREST DONNELL, and ALEXANDER SMITH. A House version is being cosponsored by Representative HUGH D. SCOTT, Jr., former chairman of the Republican National Committee. The Association of American Medical Schools has energetically urged the adoption of the $250,000,000 Federal-help measure. The cost of educating a medical student averages $2,577 a year, whereas tuition averages only $548. That is why President James B. Conant of Harvard, the wealthiest university in the world, has said that the problem "is far too serious to be solved by the universities themselves." Three years ago an AMA authority predicted that the shortage of doctors could not exceed 15,000 by 1960. As of today, the shortage will be made acute by the demands of the armed services, especially when all-out mobilization takes place. As for costs, the AMA 2 years ago estimated that the medical schools needed $15,000,000 more annually for operations, and $200,000,000 for expansion. The $500,000 which the association is going to allocate to needy schools is therefore, on its own admission, but a drop in the bucket.

The National Emergency

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD H. JENISON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 20, 1950

Mr. JENISON. Mr. Speaker, certainly it is the solemn responsibility of every American to face squarely the awesome implications of the state of national emergency declared by President Truman following his address to the Nation.

What he had to say brought little that was new to public attention. Such was not the purpose of the pronouncement. Rather his words were calculated to set the stage for the official declaration that a national emergency exists. There will be few indeed who will dispute it. In fact, there is every reason to believe the American people sensed it last June 27 when Communist forces first attacked South Korea and American troops were sent into action against them on behalf of the United Nations.

The real purpose of the President's address, White House sources indicated prior to its delivery, was to "shock the American people out of a 'business-as-usual' state of mind and to bring home the grim reality of the world crisis." That was probably true. But it is equally true that it is essential to shock the administration out of a "government-as-usual" state of mind. The tragic battle now raging on the narrowing Korean beachhead was shock enough for the public, and from the tone of Mr. Truman's address it is apparent that the Government feels it as well.

There is a national emergency. It has existed for many months. There is neither point nor purpose in reciting the record of the past. Now only the present counts. And the future of the Nation—and the free world—depends on how effectively we act from this moment forward. At last we face up squarely to the task at hand.

With the general pattern of Mr. Truman's words there will be practical agreement. With the program contemplated there must be united support. With one thought, above all others, there must be common accord. That was embodied in the plea to set aside personal desires in order to take up a proper share of the task, measuring performance by the standards set by the heroism of those who are battling so gallantly on the fighting front. Against such a measuring stick, the maximum efforts of the best of us will seem small indeed.

Mr. Truman called for national unity against the Communist threat to world peace. There is national unity on this. But it should be pointed out that national unity is not enough. There must be international unity as well among the free nations and those who would remain free. This means the United Nations. At Lake Success there must be solid evidence of willingness to share the burden so far carried so disproportionately by the United States. In all honesty it must be said that up to this very hour, when the United States has declared a national emergency, the United Nations has failed to keep pace by conceding the presence of an international emergency.

Mr. Truman called for rapid expansion of our military forces. There is national unity on this. It embraces military manpower and military production. This Nation thought the program was started months ago. It was not. Now there must be no further delay. White House appointment of Charles E. Wilson, president of the vast General Electric Co., to handle the mobilization program, is a step in the right direction. He has the know-how and he has the confidence of the public. He will need both to succeed.

Mr. Truman called for higher taxes to put the greatly increased military expenditures as nearly as possible on a pay-as-you-go basis. He pledged reduction as far as possible of nondefense costs of Government to contribute toward the same goal—a battle to curb ruinous inflation. It will serve no useful purpose to recall the familiarity of those phrases or those demands. They were heard months ago. They went unheeded. There can be no further delay. In this, too, there will be the national unity the President asks.

Turning to a purely domestic crisis the President surely was on sympathetic ground when he voiced a militant demand for an immediate end of the scattered strikes by relatively small groups paralyzing the Nation's railroad transportation system. It was as if the pages of history were being leafed back to the courage of Calvin Coolidge's famous "there must be no strike against the public safety." The determination and the wisdom of Coolidge must live again in Washington, and when it does, reason will prevail as well. The Government has the power to meet this crisis, and if it is matched with the courage of our forces in Korea, the problem will be resolved without injustice to the workers involved and without further danger to the public safety.

While the program advanced by the President is heartening in its specific details for swift build-up of the Nation's Armed Forces and sharply increased defense production, it remains vague in the equally vital phase of economic controls. While a Director of Price Stabilization has been named, there is no clear-cut enunciation of policy or program. There is talk only of selective controls—a continuation of piecemeal plans suited only to half-way measures. And half-way measures will not meet a national emergency.

One of the greatest mistakes that characterized the Second World War was tardiness in grappling with inflation controls. Certainly the Nation does not want to see that experience repeated. Most persons with any opinion on the matter agree that the administration should have all the power needed to deal with the matter. That was the reason the Congress voted the power months ago. But the use of all-out controls assumed all-out rearmament, mobilization, and an all-out war economy. Are we yet embarked on such a program? Obviously not.

Most Americans will accept any kind of controls and make any kind of sacrifice if they are convinced that no time and no resources are being wasted with the new defense effort. It is up to the administration to provide that proof. It is the responsibility of government leadership to cite the need and chart the course. In this respect, President Truman's message fell far short of a desirable goal. It is to be hoped that these essential steps will be spelled out more definitely in the shortest possible period. There is no time for further indecision.

General Omar Bradley has said that the protection of our national independence calls for long-range commitments that we are willing to carry out.

A long-range commitment to fight the battle for peace with America's most powerful weapons is the surest guaranty of victory for the Nation. And America's most powerful weapon is not the atom bomb or any other instrument of destruction. America's most powerful weapon is the might of free people fully aroused, fully mobilized, and fully informed as to the responsibilities of the hour. Only under such circumstances will hysteria recede to be replaced by grim determination to pay the price for the preservation of a free world.

Certainly there is a national emergency. But there was a national emergency at Valley Forge, at Gettysburg, at Belleau Wood, Normandy, and Iwo Jima. Each was met in its turn by men of courage and Christian faith. Have we less of either in the present hour?

President Truman's Address to the Country

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 21, 1950

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following text of President Truman's address to the country, taken from the New York Times of December 16, 1950:

TEXT OF PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS

I am talking to you tonight about what our country is up against, and what we are going to do about it.

Our homes, our Nation, all the things we believe in are in great danger. This danger has been created by the rulers of the Soviet Union.

For 5 years we have been working for peace and justice among nations. We have helped to bring the free nations of the world together in a great movement to establish a lasting peace.

Against this movement for peace, the rulers of the Soviet Union have been waging a relentless attack. They have tried to undermine or overwhelm the free nations, one by one. They have used threats and treachery and violence.

In June, the forces of Communist imperialism broke out into open warfare in Korea. The UN moved to put down this act of aggression, and, by October, had all but succeeded.

Then in November, the Communists threw their Chinese armies into the battle against the free nations.

By this act, they have shown that they are now willing to push the world to the brink of a general war to get what they want. This is the real meaning of the events that have been taking place in Korea.

That is why we are in such grave danger.

The future of civilization depends on what we do—on what we do now, and in the months ahead.

We have the strength and we have the courage to overcome the danger that threatens our country. We must act calmly, wisely, and resolutely.

Here are the things we will do:

First, we will continue to uphold and, if necessary, to defend with arms the principles of the UN—the principles of freedom and justice.

Second, we will continue to work with the other free nations to strengthen our combined defenses.

Third, we will build up our own Army, Navy, and Air Force and make more weapons for ourselves and our allies.

Fourth, we will expand our economy and keep it on an even keel.

Now, I want to talk to you about each one of these things.

First, we will continue to uphold the principles of the UN.

We have no aggressive purpose. We will not use our strength for aggression. We are a tolerant and a restrained people, deeply aware of our moral responsibilities and deeply aware of the horrors of war.

We believe in settling differences by peaceful means, and we have made honest efforts to bring about disarmament. We will continue those efforts, but we cannot yield to aggression.

Though the present situation is highly dangerous, we do not believe that war is inevitable. There is no conflict between the legitimate interests of the free world and those of the Soviet Union that cannot be settled by peaceful means. We will continue to take every honorable step we can to avoid general war.

But we will not engage in appeasement.

The world learned from Munich that security cannot be bought by appeasement.

We are ready, as we have always been, to take part in efforts to reach a peaceful solution of the conflict in Korea. In fact, our representatives at Lake Success are taking part in just such efforts today.

We do not yet know whether the Chinese Communists are willing to enter into honest negotiations to settle the conflict in Korea. If negotiations are possible, we shall strive for a settlement that will make Korea a united, independent, and democratic country. That is what the Korean people want, and that is what the UN has decided they are entitled to have.

Meanwhile, our troops in Korea are continuing to do their best to uphold the UN.

Gen. J. Lawton Collins, Chief of Staff of the Army, who returned a few days ago from Korea, reported that our military forces there are well organized and well equipped. I am confident that our military forces, together with their comrades in arms from many nations, will continue to give a good account of themselves. They know they are fighting for the freedom and security of their own homes and families.

The danger we face exists not only in Korea. Therefore, the second thing we are going to do is to increase our efforts, with other free nations, to build up defenses against aggression in other parts of the world. In dealing with the Korean crisis, we are not going to ignore the danger of aggression elsewhere.

There is actual warfare in the Far East, but Europe and the rest of the world are also in great danger. The same menace—the menace of Communist aggression—threatens Europe as well as Asia.

To combat this menace, other free nations need our help, and we need theirs. We must work with a sense of real partnership and common purpose with these nations. We must stand firm with our allies, who have shown their courage and their love of freedom.

The United States, Canada, and the 10 nations of Western Europe who are united with us in the North Atlantic Treaty have already begun to create combined military defenses. Secretary of State Dean Acheson is flying to Europe on Sunday. He and representatives of these nations will complete the arrangements for setting up a joint army, navy, and air force to defend Europe. The defense of Europe is of the utmost importance to the security of the United States.

We will continue to provide assistance to European countries, and to other free countries in other parts of the world, because their defense is also important to our own defense.

The Communist rulers are trying their hardest to split the free nations apart. If they should succeed, they would do staggering damage to the cause of freedom. Unity with our allies is now, and must continue to be, the foundation of our effort.

Working together, the free nations can create military forces strong enough to convince the Communist rulers that they cannot gain by aggression.

Working together, the free nations can present the common front, backed by strength, which is necessary if we are to be in a position to negotiate successfully with the Kremlin for peaceful settlements.

Working together, we hope we can prevent another world war.

In order to succeed, we in our country have a big job ahead of us.

That is why the third thing we must do to meet the present danger is to step up our own defense program.

We are expanding our Armed Forces very rapidly.

We are speeding up the production of military equipment for our own Armed Forces and for our allies.

We have a large Navy. We have a powerful Air Force. We have units around which a strong Army can be built. But measured against the danger that confronts us, our forces are not adequate.

On June 25, when the Communists invaded the Republic of Korea, we had less than 1,500,000 men and women in our Army, Navy, and Air Force.

Today, our military strength has reached about two and a half million. Our next step is to increase the number of men and women on active duty to nearly three and a half million.

I have directed the Armed Forces to accomplish this as soon as possible. The Army and the Navy will be able to do this within a few months. It will take the Air Force somewhat longer. In addition to these men and women on active duty, we have about two million more in the National Guard and the Reserves who are subject to call.

As part of the process of achieving a speedier build-up, the number of men to be called up under the Selective Service System has been raised, and two additional National Guard divisions are being ordered to active duty in January.

At the same time we will have a very rapid speed-up in the production of military equipment. Within 1 year we will be turning out planes at five times the present rate of production. Within 1 year combat vehicles will be coming off the production line at four times today's rate. Within 1 year the rate of production of electronics equipment for defense will have multiplied 4½ times.

These will not be weapons for our own Armed Forces alone. They will constitute an arsenal for the defense of freedom. Out of this arsenal we will be able to send weapons to other free nations to add to what they can produce for their own defenses. And in this same arsenal we will provide a large reserve of weapons to equip additional units in our own Army Forces whenever that may be necessary.

Furthermore, while we are working toward these immediate goals in manpower and equipment, we will also expand our training and production facilities so as to make possible a very rapid expansion to full mobilization if that becomes necessary.

We can handle this production program, but it will require hard work.

It will require us to make a lot of changes in our ordinary ways of doing things.

And this brings me to our fourth big job. In order to build the military strength we need, we will have to expand our production greatly. We must also prevent inflation and stabilize the cost of living.

If we are to make the weapons we need soon enough, we shall have to cut back on many lines of civilian production. But we cannot build up and maintain our armed might and the industrial strength underlying it simply by cutting back civilian production. We must produce more—more steel, more copper, more aluminum, more electric power, more cotton, more of many other things.

We must set very high targets and be willing to make an all-out effort to reach them. Workers will be called upon to work more hours. More women and more young people and older workers will be needed in our plants and factories. Farmers will have to set higher production goals. Businessmen will have to put all their know-how to work to increase production.

A defense effort of the size we must now undertake will inevitably push prices up, unless we take positive action to hold them down.

We have already taken a number of steps. We have put restrictions on credit buying. We have increased taxes. I hope that the Congress will enact an excess-profits tax at this session. Still further taxes will be needed.

We cannot escape paying the cost of our military program. The more we pay by taxes now, the better we can hold prices down. I have directed that recommendations be prepared, for early submission to the Congress, to put the increased cost of defense as nearly as possible on a pay-as-you-go basis.

I have also instructed the Director of the Budget to reduce the nonmilitary expenditures in the new Federal budget to the minimum required to give effective support to the defense effort.

The measures I have just mentioned—credit control, higher taxes, and reduced nonmilitary expenditures—are essential. They are our primary defense against inflation, because they strike at the sources of inflation. But as we move into a greatly increased defense effort we must also take direct measures to keep prices in line.

The Government is starting at once to impose price controls upon a number of materials and products. These will be mainly items important to defense production and the cost of living.

In those fields where price control is imposed, the Government will also undertake to stabilize wages, as the law requires.

In the immediate future, a series of control orders will be announced by the Economic Stabilization Agency.

In addition, the Agency will announce fair standards for prices and wages in those cases where mandatory controls are not imposed. I ask everyone concerned not to set prices and wages higher than these standards will allow. If these standards are violated, it will speed up the imposition of mandatory controls, including roll-backs where needed.

As we move ahead with this mobilization effort there will be increased need for central control over the many Government activities in this field. Accordingly, I am establishing an Office of Defense Mobilization. I am appointing Mr. Charles E. Wilson to be Director of this Office. Mr. Wilson is resigning as president of the General Electric Co. to take this job.

In his new position he will be responsible for directing all the mobilization activities of the Government, including production, procurement, manpower, transportation and economic stabilization.

The Government is also moving forward with preparations for civil defense. I have appointed former Gov. Millard Caldwell, of Florida, to be Federal Civilian Defense Administrator.

In addition, I have recommended legislation to the Congress which will authorize the Federal Government to help States and cities in their civil-defense preparations. I hope the Congress will enact this legislation soon, so that the civil-defense work which has already started can be greatly speeded up.

These are our plans for making our country stronger.

As we go forward, we must keep clearly in mind the meaning of what we are doing.

Our freedom is in danger.

Sometimes we may forget just what freedom means to us. It is as close to us, as important to us, as the air we breathe. Freedom is in our homes, in our schools, in our churches. It is in our work and our Government and the right to vote as we please. Those are the things that would be taken from us if communism should win.

Because our freedom is in danger we are united in its defense. Let no aggressor think we are divided. Our great strength is the loyalty and fellowship of a free people. We pull together when we are in trouble, and we do it by our own choice, not out of fear, but out of love for the great values of our American life, that we all have a share in.

In this great defense effort that we are undertaking, things may not always go as smoothly as we would wish, either in Washington or in your home town. But remember that we are building our defenses in the democratic way and not by the iron rule of dictatorship.

Those of us who work in the Government will do our best. But the outcome depends, as it has always depended, on the spirit and energy of our people.

The job of building a stronger America must be done on our farms, in our factories, and in our homes. It must be done by every one of us, wherever we are, and whatever our jobs may be.

Our fighting men in Korea have set an example that should inspire us all. Attacked by superior numbers, and in the bitterest of winter weather, they were resolute, steady, and determined. Their steadfast courage in the face of reverses is one of the most heroic stories in our country's history.

In the days ahead, each of us should measure his own efforts, his own sacrifices, by the standard of our heroic men in Korea.

Many of you who are young people will serve in the Armed Forces of your country. Nothing you will do later in life will be of greater benefit to your homes, your communities, or your friends.

Many others of you will have to work longer hours in factories or mines or mills. Think of this not as longer hours, but as more planes, more tanks, more ships, more of all the things that are needed for the defense of your homes and your way of life.

All of us will have to pay more taxes and do without things we like. Think of this, not as a sacrifice, but as an opportunity, an opportunity to defend the best kind of life that men have ever devised on this earth.

As I speak to you tonight, aggression has won a military advantage in Korea. We should not try to hide or explain away that fact.

By the same token, we should draw renewed courage and faith from the response of the free world to that aggression. What the free nations have done in Korea is right, and men all over the world know that it is right. Whatever temporary set-backs there may be, the right will prevail in the end.

Because of all these things I have been talking about with you, I will issue a proclamation tomorrow morning declaring that a national emergency exists. This will call upon every citizen to put aside his personal interests for the good of our country. All of our energies must be devoted to the tasks ahead of us.

No nation has ever had a greater responsibility than ours has at this moment. We must remember that we are the leaders of the free world. We must understand that we cannot achieve peace by ourselves, but only by cooperating with other free nations and with the men and women who love freedom everywhere.

We must remember that our goal is not war but peace. Throughout the world our name stands for international justice and for a world based on the principles of law and order. We must keep it that way. We are willing to negotiate differences, but we will not yield to aggression. Appeasement of evil is not the road to peace.

The American people have always met danger with courage and determination. I am confident we will do that now, and, with God's help, we shall keep our freedom.

Civil Defense: New York City

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. L. GARY CLEMENTE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 21, 1950

Mr. CLEMENTE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter and statement:

CITY OF NEW YORK,
OFFICE OF THE MAYOR,
New York, N. Y., December 20, 1950.

Hon. L. GARY CLEMENTE,

DEAR CONGRESSMAN CLEMENTE: I am attaching copies of the statement I made before the Senate Armed Services Committee in connection with the proposed civilian-defense bill.

The last draft of the bill available before I left Washington last Friday still contained a clause prohibiting the use of any of the Federal funds for the purchase of sites for bomb shelters. It also limited Federal participation to 50 percent of the cost of such projects. In a congested community like New York the cost of the site alone will be between 25 percent and 50 percent of the total cost of the project. This automatically reduces the Federal participation far below 50 percent of the actual cost. I doubt very much if the States will find it possible to provide adequate shelters if these provisions are not changed to increase the Federal share of actual cost.

You will see that I strongly urged that shelter funds be used to pay part of the cost of permanent projects that will be useful for defense and in peacetimes. Referring the combined parking garage and shelter program to the RFC is not the answer. Some form of subsidy or grant is essential.

I hope that you will help adjust this law to make it workable in New York.

Cordially,

VINCENT R. IMPELLITTERI,
Mayor.

CIVIL DEFENSE: NEW YORK CITY

(Statement by Mayor Vincent R. Impellitteri to Senate Armed Services Subcommittee, Washington, D. C., December 15, 1950)

I appreciate the opportunity of appearing before your committee to outline to you the importance to New York City of establishing a permanent civil defense program on a national level for the whole of the United States. We realize the importance of being prepared for any eventuality in case our country is attacked. New York City, in our opinion, would become a prime target and we are determined to be ready if such an attack should come.

We are approaching this problem without hysteria and with the knowledge that New York City, like other energetic and advancing communities, must be kept functioning regardless of the possibility of attack. We reject the "take-to-the-hills" and "make-for-the-caves" philosophy. We shall not adopt a policy of dispersion and decentralization. We propose to do everything within our power to see that our city continues as a major port and as the greatest industrial, financial, business, and transportation center of the country. Any other approach would give aid and comfort to our enemies, and impede all-out mobilization of our full strength.

We are happy that a report is being made by your committee looking toward the enactment of Federal legislation to coordinate and aid States and local governments in the civil defense program. The main issues are clear. The strategists are available, and no prolonged, time-consuming studies are necessary. Lack of a definitive, authoritative Federal policy, implemented by Federal law and appropriations, has to date severely handicapped the cities and States. Washington must come forth with policy, leadership, and help.

IMPORTANCE OF NEW YORK CITY TO THE WAR EFFORT

New York City is the greatest city in the world largely because of its port, which in turn has brought great industries to the area. In peace and war, the New York port, which is at the crossroads of the world shipping lanes, sends more ships of all varieties to more world ports than any other harbor in the world. The great part played by the New York port of embarkation during the last war is well known to all. We are proud of that record and ready to renew and expand it if we are told what is wanted and when.

New York City is the nerve center of far-flung industries and business. It is the financial center of the world and our most important gateway. Moreover, many great industries are concentrated within the city upon which millions of people depend for their livelihood. Ours is the center of management and finance.

New York's unique geographical situation requires many bridges and tunnels to connect its various boroughs and provide communication with the surrounding area to the north and south. These bridges and tunnels are part of an expanding, modern arterial highway system. Our population is approximately 8,000,000 and our rapid transit carries to and from Manhattan Island below Fifty-ninth Street approximately 2,500,000 people each day. Our bridges, tunnels, and arterial system move millions of people in and out of the entire metropolitan district with a population of 15,000,000.

Anyone familiar with the factors which make a city function smoothly, including water supply, utilities, transportation, industry, and communications, will not take seriously suggestions that we prepare to evacuate 8,000,000 people. There is no rhyme or reason in such thinking. It would be impractical to reproduce in the open country the public utilities and other services necessary to accommodate the millions of people in this and other large cities. New York will not be abandoned nor can our operations be suspended even for a day.

APPROPRIATIONS

Virtually all State and city officials are looking to the Federal Government to establish the mobilization policy and program to be followed throughout the country. These decisions must be made federally and be guided by a Federal agency, and implemented by Federal appropriations allocated fairly to the States and municipalities on the basis of estimated strategic dangers and needs.

There must be sharp differentiation between emergency disaster relief and long-range permanent construction so planned as to be usable for public purposes in peace as well as for civilian defense in war.

New York, like other cities, must operate on an intelligent budget for operating and capital expenditures. Our powers to levy taxes and incur debt are sharply defined, and limited. The State also is limited in its resources. We cannot plan and budget our program intelligently until we know what is going to be done on the Federal level.

CONTROL AND CARE OF BOMBED AREAS

We cannot make a really accurate estimate of the cost of housing, clothing, feeding, and providing medical attention for bombed areas. If we could predict accurately when and where attacks would be made, our Armed Forces could stop them, and our civilian defense problem would be simplified. Obviously, medical and other supplies required for the care of disaster areas must be stockpiled at various strategic points. These must be rushed to disaster areas as required, much as our Government and the Red Cross handle disasters in peacetimes. The cost of stockpiling must be borne by the Federal Government, and we in our communities must organize to use these materials when they are needed. We have attempted to estimate how much money will be required in our community for this purpose, and the results have varied greatly, depending upon the assumptions made by the estimator. We are not sufficiently familiar with the civilian defense needs to make accurate forecasts, and look to Washington for advice.

We do know that certain materials will be required and should be purchased promptly. The newspaper reports advise that the National Security Resources Board recommended to Congress an appropriation of $632,000,000, subdivided into three separate categories for the purchase of special equipment to augment fire, engineering, transportation, communications, stockpiles of critical materials and medical supplies and for communications and control centers. If our preliminary checks of possible requirements in New York City prove to be anywhere near accurate, this amount will be inadequate if several communities are attacked at once.

SHELTERS

I do not know what type of shelters your committee will recommend. I feel very strongly that it would be a distinct waste to spend $2,250,000,000, as suggested in some quarters, on shelters which would have no peacetime use. It would be impossible for municipalities even with State aid to finance the share of the cost of these expensive projects in the proportions suggested. States and cities cannot stretch their credit to 50 percent of the cost of such work. I strongly urge that you change this provision so that 80 percent of the funds are provided by the Federal Government with 20 percent contributed by the State and city governments. This is a more realistic approach. I also urge that any bill authorizing such shelters enlarge the definition to include places of assembly, parking garages, hospital additions, and other related facilities which will serve a permanent, public use.

HOSPITAL FACILITIES

The city of New York has a substantial hospital expansion program under way. However, the funds available within the exemption from the debt limit granted by the State of New York will be inadequate to complete even part of the program. Should an emergency occur today, New York's hospitals could crowd in a substantial number of injured persons on an emergency basis. We could not, however, cope with a disaster. Were we on the other hand to expedite our entire planned hospital program and expand it so as to meet the immediate future needs of the city of New York, the emergency needs in case of disaster could also be met. Obviously, as we increase the capacity of our permanent hospitals, we also increase our ability to handle emergency cases. More money must be made available for this program if we are to expedite it and have it serve our people after an attack. Our plans and finances must be adjusted now if we are to meet this emergency.

MASS TRANSPORTATION

Plans have been virtually completed for large-scale additions to New York City's subway system. These plans include a new subway in Second Avenue in Manhattan, a low-level express subway in Sixth Avenue, and other extensions. Funds are not now available to build these subways. It would be entirely feasible to excavate substantial sections of these subway extensions and to use these excavations as bomb shelters. Once the emergency is past, subway sections can be completed and returned to their intended use as extensions of the existing rapid transit system.

PARKING GARAGES

One of our greatest concerns is traffic congestion. This problem is serious anyway. In the light of a possible atomic attack on New York City, it is frightening. I have recently appointed a city parking authority, and they are now finding ways and means of financing construction of parking garages to get vehicles off the streets. Parking garages can be designed and built to serve as air-raid shelters. There are other important uses to which these garages could be put to in connection with civilian defense. Among them is use as temporary accident wards and hospitals. Great flexibility is possible in buildings of this type and they could be located at points of greatest congestion. We need parking garages in New York having 12,000,000 square feet of floor space. We must have Federal help on this program.

I am in complete disagreement with those who have urged that the construction of combined parking garages and shelters be left entirely to cities. If this is done, no program which will meet the need is remotely possible. Funds needed for schools, hospitals, and other essential city services cannot be made available for the construction of parking garages and reduction of traffic congestion. It makes much more sense to build all-purpose buildings with shelter funds.

ARTERIAL PROGRAM

All studies by administrative officials, police, and engineers concerned with emergency transportation have shown that the express highway and parkway system constitutes the best means of ingress, egress, and rapid travel. These arteries can be controlled by proper officials and restricted to military and civil defense vehicles. We have a substantial program, including strategic expressways leading in and out of the city under way and the completion of these arteries is a defense requirement. Additional Federal defense funds should be made available to speed up this arterial program and push it to an early completion. Our contracts are ready to let. We need funds and priorities.

PRIORITIES

Some dislocation of labor working in the construction industry is inevitable. Everything possible should be done to keep this at a minimum. In this connection, I urge you to take the steps necessary to insure that equipment and materials will be available for the defense program once the national administration has fixed it. I am sure you will find that Gen. W. H. Harrison, Administrator, National Production Authority, will agree that if the civilian defense program is approved as essential to the war effort, priorities must be determined accordingly. This will provide relief to labor which is in danger of unemployment, which will shake morale and seriously impede both mobilization and defense.

Justice for Poland—Address of Prof. Frank Nowak, of Boston University

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN F. KENNEDY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 20, 1950

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include in the RECORD an address entitled "Justice for Poland," which was made recently by Prof. Frank Nowak, of Boston University. The address follows:

The aggression of Soviet communism in Korea is a critical and present danger to the free world everywhere. The long-awaited era of peace which the peoples of the world so earnestly sought and expected since 1945 has not been achieved. It is clear now to all thinking men that we lost the peace at Cairo, Tehran, and Yalta when in the first test case of the principles enunciated in the Atlantic Charter we demonstrated our insincerity by cynically sacrificing Poland to win the favor of Stalin. This betrayal seriously undermined our moral position in the world and was soon followed by the loss of half of Europe and most of Asia to the Moloch of Soviet imperialism. The war in Korea is a direct result of the betrayal at Yalta and Cairo. It is obvious that tyrannical dictators who respect neither law nor the rights of humanity can never be stopped by a policy of appeasement. Only superior power marshaled by the free nations of the world can stop the expansion of this Communist imperialism.

The mendacity and calculated insults of Jacob Malik in the Security Council of the United Nations reveal the impossibility of a reasonable understanding and demonstrate the nature of the evil which oppresses 800,000,000 of people within and without the borders of the Soviet Union.

The Polish people who fought so gallantly for their freedom and ours during the war are today enslaved, exploited, and degraded; a living monument and reproach to the folly of appeasement. Poland is now governed by the knife, the noose, and the concentration camp of the hangman. The civilized world may well ponder this experience as it prepares to meet this latest challenge to its security in Korea.

The tragic fate of Poland suggests certain definite conclusions regarding both Korea and the future of the United Nations. In Korea we dare not resort to hypocrisy and repeat the blunder made at Yalta. Poland was completely lost by the deal we made with Stalin. Let there be no deal with Stalin in Korea. The blood and suffering of our boys in that far-away land must not be sacrificed in vain. All Korea must be free. A partition of the country along the thirty-eighth parallel would be a repetition of our tragic mistake at Yalta when we accepted the partition of Poland along the Ribbentrop-Molotov-Curzon line with the result that we handed all Poland over to Stalin. A partition of Korea means betrayal, appeasement, disaster, and a further weakening of our own moral and military security.

Last July the free peoples of the world were tremendously heartened and encouraged by the prompt and efficient action of the United Nations in condemning the aggression on the Republic of Korea. The month of August in the Security Council of the United Nations, during the presidency of Jakob Malik, however, brought disillusionment and frustration. It was clearly demonstrated that no United Nations organization can function efficiently as guardian of the peace so long as an aggressor can sit at the table and veto measures designed to curb his lawless acts. Evidently fundamental changes in the Charter of the United Nations are in order, even at the risk of sacrificing universality for efficiency. A United Nations that cannot function with the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics as a member must be made to function without the Soviet Union and without appeasement of aggressors.

A great American President, Woodrow Wilson, when discussing the organization of the old League of Nations, declared that no peace is possible without good faith among statesmen, without a decent respect for the rights of nations, without recognition of the binding force of international law, and without acceptance of the elementary principles of freedom of speech and public press. None of these prerequisites obtains today in the United Nations insofar as the Soviet Union and its puppets are concerned.

The time has come for a return to common sense and a drastic reorganization of the United Nations itself. The free nations of the world who speak in civilized accents of mutual trust and good faith and can reach an understanding as to the meaning of words must have the courage to condemn and expel aggressors. Obviously the Soviet Union, which does not respect law or the rights of its own subjects, cannot be expected to respect the rights of nations in any international organization. Likewise the legal fiction that the Polish, Czechoslovakian, Ukrainian, and White Russian people are represented in the United Nations by Communist stooges of the Politburo, must be drastically revised since it was originally and irrationally accepted as a measure of appeasement of the Soviet Union.

The United Nations can continue to retain the respect of the civilized world only when it finishes with appeasement and returns to the high aims of its Charter. It will again become the hope of mankind and capture the imagination of all peoples, even those living under the iron curtain.

As the United States and the nations of the free world prepare to meet the challenge of Soviet imperialism, it is likely that Poland will again become a touchstone of our sincerity and political acumen. The arming of Western Germany in the name of military necessity and expediency must be so controlled that German militarism shall not raise its ugly head to menace the German people and the surrounding states. Poland must not be made the victim of German appeasement. It is all important that our moral position be unimpeachable. The record must be kept straight. Permanent peace must not be sacrificed for any apparent temporary advantage by betraying the smaller nations of the world.

The leadership of the United States and the United Nations in the struggle with the forces of evil can be maintained only if that leadership is itself worthy of the support of all free peoples. Certainly the record of deeds performed by the free nations of the world will speak louder and be more convincing to all men within and without the iron curtain than all the calculated falsehoods of Communist propaganda. Our future security depends not only on our military strength, but also on the support of the decent opinion of all mankind. Only then can we honestly and effectively call upon the peoples of the world to rally to our cause in defense of the principles solemnly proclaimed in the Atlantic Charter of 1941. Only then can we regain the confidence and loyal support of the peoples of Asia as well in this great struggle for a free world which repudiates imperialism of every brand, whether it be capitalist or Communist imperialism.

Pan American Award for Dr. Ellen Collins

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 21, 1950

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I would like to include the following report about a relative of Thomas Fitz Simons, one of the Pennsylvania signers of the United States Constitution. Miss Ellen Collins, a member of the noted Counihan family of the Commonwealth, has had a brilliant record in the development of our cultural-relations program. The projects which Miss Collins has promoted are the hope of our youth in the future.

The above mentioned follows:

Miss Ellen Collins was born at Waverly, N. Y., of a family some of whose ancestors signed the American Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States of America. She was graduated, magna cum laude, from St. Joseph's College, Emmitsburg, Md. Besides a bachelor of science diploma, Miss Collins was also awarded a degree in journalism because of excellence of English style. These diplomas were won in June 1939.

As the result of brilliant graduate studies at Columbia University, New York, where she was an honor student of Professor Carlton J. H. Hayes, wartime Ambassador to Spain, Miss Collins was awarded the degree, master of arts, for excellence in South American history. This diploma was granted in June 1940.

In 1941, Miss Collins did further graduate work at the University of San Marcos, Lima, Peru, with grade A credits for the degree of doctor of philosophy. At the same time, she acted as executive secretary of the Inter-American Seminar at the University of San Marcos, under the general direction of Dr. Joseph F. Thorning, associate editor of The Americas and World Affairs. Among the courses which Miss Collins studied at the University of San Marcos were Iberian culture and the history of Hispanic America.

In 1942 Miss Collins was promoted to the post of director of the Inter-American Seminar at the National University of Mexico. Again, grade A credits were earned toward the degree, doctor of philosophy, in Latin-American history.

Because of these achievements, Ellen Collins became the first woman to be appointed to a cultural relations post in the history of the United States. Her commission was signed by Secretary of State Cordell Hull in May 1943. For the next 18 months, she served as assistant cultural relations attaché in the United States Embassy, at Quito, Ecuador. While in Ecuador, Miss Collins became the friend of all the leading people of the Republic, including the Honorable Galo Plaza, now President. She was praised by the Archbishop of Quito as an apostle of Catholic action.

The next promotion was to the rank of Cultural Relations Attaché in the United States Embassy in Caracas, Venezuela. Due to success in this role, Miss Collins was unanimously elected an honorary member of the Venezuelan-United States Cultural Institute, where she also gave courses in the Spanish language and literature. She held these positions in Venezuelan life for 15 months.

Upon her return to the United States of America, Miss Collins was appointed by the Board of Directors of the American Peace Society, oldest peace organization in the country, as the society's special delegate at the seat of the United Nations, Lake Success. Due to the constructive work accomplished in the United Nations, Miss Collins was unanimously elected to the Board of Directors of the American Peace Society and to the Board of Editors of the Society's publication, World Affairs.

Ellen Collins has traveled extensively in Europe, North Africa, South America, Central America, Mexico, and in the Caribbean. She speaks English, Spanish, and French. Everywhere, she has been a champion of truth and justice for Spain. Her articles on Hispanic America have been published in The Sign and in the Catholic Digest, while her book reviews have been a feature of The Americas and World Affairs.

The position of Miss Collins as an expert, or specialist, with respect to Hispanic America was established when she was invited to be listed in Who Knows and What, published by Who's Who In America. Naturally, she is prominently mentioned in the Catholic Who's Who of the United States.

Civilian Defense Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 21, 1950

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include a resolution adopted by the city of Newark, N. J., under date of December 13, 1950, urging the adoption of H. R. 9710 introduced by my colleague, the Honorable ARTHUR KLEIN, of New York, having to do with the establishment of a civilian-defense program.

The resolution follows:

Whereas there is now pending before the House of Representatives of the United States, a bill introduced by Congressman KLEIN, bill No. 9710, which was referred to the Committee on Armed Services; and

Whereas this bill provides for the creation of Municipal Defense Authority to assist municipalities in conducting surveys to determine the need for joint underground garage bomb shelters; and

Whereas this bill would appropriate the sum of $25,000,000 to enable municipalities to make preliminary plans for construction of such facilities, with a further appropriation of $2,000,000,000 to assist in the actual construction of the facilities for approved projects; and

Whereas the city of Newark is desirous of constructing an underground garage under Military Park which can also be used as a bomb shelter in the event of any emergency; and

Whereas we believe that the Federal Government should give financial aid to the city of Newark in securing these facilities which will be useful both in time of peace to relieve our rapidly increasing traffic congestion, and to shelter our citizens in the event of bombings by enemy forces: Now, therefore be it

Resolved by the Board of Commissioners of the City of Newark, That the Senate and House of Representatives be urged and requested to adopt the proposed Klein bill, and such other amendments as may be necessary, in order to provide sufficient funds to assist the city of Newark and other municipalities in like situations in obtaining the desired combined underground parking garage and bomb-shelter facilities; be it further

Resolved, That a certified copy of this resolution be forwarded to His Excellency the President of the United States, to the President of the Senate, Speaker of the House of Representatives, the two United States Senators from New Jersey, and to the several Congressmen from New Jersey.

St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 21, 1950

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Wilkes-Barre Times-Leader of December 6, 1950:

POPULAR APPEAL OF SEAWAY

Documentary evidence in the form of the lobby report of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Association, recorded during the past week in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, proves that when it comes to putting up dollars to push the St. Lawrence project, about the only patrons are those seeking a subsidized waterway over which to move their Labrador ore. This brands as balderdash stories about the popular appeal of the proposal.

Last year, and with bombastic publicity, a campaign to secure $250,000 by popular subscription for propagandizing the project was launched under the direction of a Chicago fund-raising organization. That campaign fell flat and the Chicago company (most organizations of this character work on a commission basis) quit. And that's when a small group of steel operators with Labrador ore investments stepped in to try to save the day for the subsidized waterway.

The lobby report, just published, shows that there is practically no financial support back of the proposal except that of those steel operators. As the old saying goes, the crusaders seem willing to "let George do it." Without the support of this small group of steel operators, the scheme would be as dead as some of the lame ducks who returned to Washington. With the support of those operators, to the tune of $40,284.75, in the last 9 months, the proposal is being kept alive. Of the total of $44,358.53 in contributions, listed in that lobby report, only $4,074.09 came from sources other than the six steel operators.

In the same period, the lobby report of the National St. Lawrence Project Conference in Opposition showed a total of $32,480.37 in contributions. Among the contributors were two national organizations, the Association of American Railroads and the National Coal Association. Other contributing organizations were the Anthracite Institute and the Maritime Association of the Port of New York. Contributions this year came from as far south as Louisiana and as far west as Minnesota. Individual contributions were received from 72 members of the Foreign Commerce Club of New York.

Emergency Proclamation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 21, 1950

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following text of President Truman's proclamation of the existence of a national emergency, issued today, taken from the New York Times of December 17, 1950:

TEXT OF EMERGENCY PROCLAMATION

Whereas recent events in Korea and elsewhere constitute a grave threat to the peace of the world and imperil the efforts of this country and those of the United Nations to prevent aggression and armed conflict; and

Whereas world conquest by Communist imperialism is the goal of the forces of aggression that have been loosed upon the world; and

Whereas if the goal of Communist imperialism were to be achieved, the people of this country would no longer enjoy the full and rich life they have with God's help built for themselves and their children; they would no longer enjoy the blessings of the freedom of worshiping as they severally choose, the freedom of reading and listening to what they choose, the right of free speech including the right to criticize their Government, the right to choose those who conduct their Government, the right to engage freely in collective bargaining, the right to engage freely in their own business enterprises, and the many other freedoms and rights which are a part of our way of life; and

Whereas the increasing menace of the forces of Communist aggression requires that the national defense of the United States be strengthened as speedily as possible:

Now, therefore, I, Harry S. Truman, President of the United States of America, do proclaim the existence of a national emergency, which requires that the military, naval, air, and civilian defenses of this country be strengthened as speedily as possible to the end that we may be able to repel any and all threats against our national security and to fulfill our responsibilities in the efforts being made through the United Nations and otherwise to bring about lasting peace.

I summon all citizens to make a united effort for the security and well-being of our beloved country and to place its needs foremost in thought and action that the full moral and material strength of the Nation may be readied for the dangers which threaten us.

I summon our farmers, our workers in industry and our businessmen to make a mighty production effort to meet the defense requirements of the Nation and to this end to eliminate all waste and inefficiency and to subordinate all lesser interests to the common good.

I summon every person and every community to make, with a spirit of neighborliness, whatever sacrifices are necessary for the welfare of the Nation.

I summon all State and local leaders and officials to cooperate fully with the military and civilian defense agencies of the United States in the national defense program.

I summon all citizens to be loyal to the principles upon which our Nation is founded to keep faith with our friends and allies, and to be firm in our devotion to the peaceful purposes for which the United Nations was founded.

I am confident that we will meet the dangers that confront us with courage and determination, strong in the faith that we can thereby secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States of America to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington this 16th day of December in the year of our Lord 1950, and of the independence of the United States of America the one hundred and seventy-fifth.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

By the President:
DEAN ACHESON,
Secretary of State.

James Kevin McGuinness

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 20, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following very interesting news story that appeared today in the Washington Times-Herald concerning a great patriot, James Kevin McGuinness. His oration written by Mr. McGuinness and delivered by that able, scholarly, and learned priest, Rev. Edward Carney, O. S. A., National chaplain of the American Legion, were most appropriate. The news story follows:

FAIR ENOUGH
(By Westbrook Pegler)

When that great patriot, James Kevin McGuinness died a little while ago, I reported that he had been whispered out of the motion-picture industry as punishment for giving testimony against the Communist treachery at the 1947 hearings of the Committee on Un-American Activities.

Jim never knew whose hand plunged the knife into his back. He was tried in absentia, knowing neither the charge nor the name of his accuser, and, after some remote negotiations with the secret terror, contact was broken and he was done for.

Meanwhile, actors, writers, producers, and others implicated in the treason have gone on to greater wealth and renown. The motion-picture industry professes to have cleaned house but has done nothing of the kind.

Jim was an active leader of the American Legion's fight against treason, having resumed his dormant membership a few years ago when he decided that organization was necessary to wage the counterattack.

Previously he had dropped out as a silent objection to the shameful misconduct of Legionnaires at some of the national conventions in the twenties.

But he always believed in the original principles of the Legion and so, when he realized that the motion-picture industry was infested with actual traitors who were trying to betray his country to Soviet Russia, Jim went back into the fold.

During the same period, Jim also lagged in his religious devoirs. I would not presume to discuss this phase of his life except to make the point that when the issue was joined, Jim fought as a Christian crusader and a gallant gentleman. He was deeply religious now, and, in his dying moment, called to his wife, "Lucie, I am dying! Hand me my prayer book.

Jim was a fine man, a martyr worthy of the same respect that is due the young men who gave their lives in Korea. He fought in the same cause. Had he been 21 or 25 when this war came, and not 57, he undoubtedly would have joined up as he did in 1917 when he fought in France as an infantry lieutenant.

I recently mentioned a beautiful patriotic pageant which Jim wrote for the national convention of the American Legion which was held in Hollywood under a promise by the movie industry to finance a great show in the Hollywood Bowl.

Jim was a political outcast of the movie industry and his script was ruled out. One man even had the effrontery to propose that Edward G. Robinson, the movie actor who had been so mockingly defiant when Jim was fighting the Reds, should be selected for a leading part in the patriotic production under Legion auspices. He was told, however, that Robinson never would be allowed to use the Legion to clear his skirts.

You might savor the beauty of Jim's devotion to his country by reading these few samples of an oration written by Jim and delivered at the pageant by Father Edward Carney, of Lawrence, Mass., the national chaplain of the Legion:

"Humbly reverent, we lay the wreath of sweet remembrance before those, our comrades, who made the last—the utmost payment to establish and preserve the freedom they bequeathed to us as the greatest gift of comradeship and love. We are alive because they are dead. We taste each day the luscious fruits of their sublime generosity.

"We know each day the brightness of the returning sun; walking in the free breeze of a land still free because of those who fell so that we might stand erect, owing no man anything but affection freely given. We see each night the silent brilliance of the stars with their promise of eternity; finding sleep in calm surety that no tyrant can shatter our rest by violent intrusions of our homes and seizures of our persons.

"Because of them, the fallen, we are the living. Because of them, the fallen, we are the free. Because of them we are now able to face the foul tyranny now enslaving half the world and say, clearly and without falter: 'That which was preserved for us by the blood of our brothers is God's gift to his sons. To fail freedom would be to deny divine grace; to betray our country and to foul the memories of our magnificent dead. Confronting the power your evil has assembled, we are unafraid. Freedom is of God and must endure. Tyranny and evil shall perish.'

"The scowling, cynical intellectuals of the left—having cautiously evaded the tumult and the agony of battle—are our enemies no less than the booted hordes who have trampled down the ideals and the goodness of Christian civilization everywhere they have marched."

For those sentiments, Jim McGuinness was whispered out of the motion picture industry in his own country which he had served in battle in France.

Mobile Disaster Emergency Relief Plan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN F. KENNEDY
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 20, 1950

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, on September 21 Congressman KEAN described to this group a civil defense plan which originated in his district. I refer to the mobile disaster emergency relief plan set up by the P. Ballantine & Sons Co. in Newark. Mr. Carl W. Badenhausen, president of Ballantine, has provided blankets, stretchers, tools, first-aid kits, flares, portable lights, ropes, and ladders for his organization's trucks in Newark.

I am very happy to report that the Ballantine plan was recently put into effect by the Cody Distributing Co. in Boston. Under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following letter by Mayor John B. Hynes, of Boston:

NOVEMBER 16, 1950.

DEAR MR. CODY: May I at this time express my appreciation to you for the splendid interest you have shown in our civil defense program in Boston.

Mr. Malone has informed me that Cody Distributing Co. is ready to place at the disposal of Boston civil defense five Ballantine delivery vans, fully equipped for emergency medical and rescue service in the event of disaster in Boston.

I know that these vans will be most useful to our medical division, and I hope that other trucking concerns will see fit to follow your fine example in preparing to meet any and all emergency needs in Boston.

I am sorry that I will be unable to be with you at the first demonstration program scheduled for tomorrow, but I do wish to extend through you to your personnel my best wishes for success in your efforts in civil defense.

Very truly yours,

JOHN B. HYNES,
Mayor of Boston.

Federal Aid To Establish Local Public Health Service Units

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN McSWEENEY
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 6, 1950

Mr. McSWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I was very much honored last week to be asked by the State president and other officials of the Parent-Teachers Association of Ohio to make certain insertions in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD containing newspaper comments from the New York Times and the Washington Post relative to the proposed legislation for Federal aid to establish local public health service units, known as H. R. 5865. I am glad to include them at the end of this statement.

I hope that my friends at home will be kind and fair-minded enough to read this, my last statement before the Eighty-first Congress, for I am especially glad to have this honor come to me from the Parent-Teachers Association. In my teaching experience in Wooster, Ohio, I wished often that we had an organization of this kind because, I think, it is tremendously beneficial not only to the students but also to the teachers and the parents. Whenever this combination of parents and teachers, which is the most powerful force that we can gather for good in this country, has endorsed a bill, I have been very anxious to cooperate in every way in its passage.

I am reminded of a similar circumstance when Reorganization Plan No. 27 was before the House of Representatives. The purpose of this plan was to unite many scattered health and welfare agencies under one head. It was recommended by the Hoover Commission. I was as anxious, when this legislation was before the Congress, to eliminate waste, duplication in government, and unnecessary expenditure, as I am now when this bill sponsored by the Parent-Teachers Association is being considered. However, after voting for Reorganization Plan No. 27, I found that it was used against me in the campaign by opponents and by the medical group, who said the bill was a trend toward socialism. If there is anyone in the Congress who has voted more diligently against socialistic trends or Communist influence, I would appreciate having his record presented to me.

I accepted membership on the House Un-American Activities Committee, which in itself was an unpopular move, because of my determination to fight every inch of the way against any communistic trend in America and I realized all the time that a communistic trend may be begun by a mild socialistic movement. For that reason, I said to the Parent-Teachers group that if I sponsored this legislation for them, I did not want their organization or my fellow citizens at home to feel it was a move toward a socialistic program. You can imagine my feeling when Reorganization Plan No. 27, for which I voted, was interpreted by the doctors and my opposition as socialistic. I believe that there is no conscientious doctor in the district or in the country, who does not want to improve the situation in health throughout our land. That has been my purpose, too. If misinterpretations and misrepresentations are going to be made about these bills, I think it will tend to make serious-minded men, who want to improve conditions generally for the well-being of our country, hesitate before sponsoring them.

I am sure no one in the land can accuse the Parent-Teachers Association of wanting any trend toward socialism; in fact, I do not think anyone in the land can accuse former President Hoover of wanting a trend toward socialism, yet it was his Commission that recommended and sponsored Reorganization Plan No. 27, which proved so disastrous for me.

Again, I want to thank the members of the Parent-Teachers Association for having selected me to take this responsibility.

The above-mentioned newspaper comments from the New York Times and the Washington Post follow:

[From the New York Times of December 10, 1950]

ANOTHER DEFENSE BILL

Following the appointment last week of a new Civil Defense Administrator, the National Security Resources Board presented Congress with a $3,100,000,000 plan for civil defense. Listed by the President as a must for the present short session, prompt action will undoubtedly be taken on this measure.

As Dr. Howard A. Rusk points out elsewhere in this newspaper today, there is another bill currently in the House Rules Committee which is equally a must if we are to make full plans for medical and health services in civil defense. This is H. R. 5865, for Federal aid to establish local public health services. Its immediate passage is essential, for civil defense plans call for the administration of medical and health civil defense services by State and local public health officers. Added to the usual essential health services, there is need for special measures to enable civil defense organizations to deal with the problems arising from possible atomic, biological and chemical warfare. These problems are primarily the responsibility of health and medical services, but today 40,000,000 of our citizens live in communities where there are no local full-time health services.

H. R. 5865 would help remedy this by giving Federal grants-in-aid for the development of local health services. Prior to the Korean war this bill was unanimously passed by the Senate on the basis of its peacetime merits. Today, the bill takes on a new significance if we are to be prepared to meet all the possible eventualities in civil defense.

[From the Washington Post of December 11, 1950]

HEALTH SERVICES

There was urgent need for Federal financial aid to State and local health departments long before the threat of a major war became acute; the need is now underscored and clarified by the importance of such departments in the mobilization of civil defense. They would be the country's principal refuge in case of atomic or biological warfare attack. We believe, therefore, that the House should act on the local public health services bill, which the Senate has already passed, during the present session. The bill has been reported favorably by the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and is now in the Rules Committee.

State and local health departments are woefully inadequate. Some 40,000,000 Americans live today in areas where no local full-time public health departments exist; and it is estimated that nearly a hundred million others have only inadequately staffed departments available. The cost to the country in time lost from productive effort and in the incidence of preventable or controllable diseases is much too high. The cost in lives and human suffering in the event of widespread aerial attacks on the United States would be incalculable.

The civil defense report of the National Security Resources Board recommended that in each State, the State health officer should be placed in charge of all civil defense health and medical services; and cities should appoint local officers in the same manner. The report pointed out also that special measures must be taken to enable civil defense organizations to deal with the problems arising from atomic, biological, and chemical warfare. * * * The effects of these special weapons are of such a nature that defense against them becomes primarily the responsibility of the health and medical services.

But the plain fact is that in many areas there simply is no such defense at all. And it is highly possible that war production plants and other vital installations will be dispersed into just such areas, with large concentrations of war workers clustered around them. Many cities which might become bomb targets are lamentably lacking in health facilities. The problem is not one on which the country can afford to defer action.

[From the New York Times of December 10, 1950]

CIVIL DEFENSE PLANS PLACED IN OPERATION IN MANY AREAS—ONLY SIX STATES HAVE COMPLETE COVERAGE, BUT OTHERS SPEED HEALTH PROGRAMS

(By Howard A. Rusk, M. D.)

Paralleling the stepped-up tempo of military and industrial mobilization, steps have now been taken to move civil defense from a stand-by basis to an actual operating program. Since its organization in 1947, the National Security Resources Board has been responsible for developing plans for our civil defense in case of national emergency.

Now, in view of the present international tension, President Truman has appointed Millard F. Caldwell, Jr., former Governor of Florida, as Civil Defense Administrator. In accordance with plans, the responsibility for civil defense will now be carried out by this new agency, as the resources board, is a planning and coordinating, rather than an operating, agency.

Recognizing fully the all-important role of health and medical services in civil defense, the board has been preparing a comprehensive official Federal guidebook of medical and health problems fundamental to civil defense. Leading authorities in all specialized aspects of health services have assisted in preparing the manual, which is now completed and in the Government Printing Office.

As W. Stuart Symington reported to the President in September, all planning done on the health and medical aspects of civil defense is based on using State commissioners of health as directors of civil defense health services, and local health officers as directors of local civil defense health services. This plan has been accepted as a most practical and effective administrative mechanism, but unfortunately, nearly 30 percent of our citizens live in communities in which there are no full-time local health services.

COMPLETE COVERAGE IN SIX STATES

Only six States in the Nation now have complete local health services coverage in all counties. They are Maryland, Delaware, New Mexico, South Carolina, Alabama, and North Carolina, which added its final county recently.

There is almost complete coverage in California, Michigan, Florida, and Virginia. Kentucky, Louisiana, and Tennessee have organizations for nearly every county, but have many health officer vacancies.

In New York, the State committee on tuberculosis and health of the State charities aid association has announced a program to foster the development of county health departments next year, but at present, there is no locally operated, full-time public health service in the rural areas, and even the smaller cities in 44 of New York's 57 upState counties.

Steps toward remedying this situation were taken last year when the Senate with bipartisan sponsorship and wide public support, unanimously adopted a bill authorizing Federal grants-in-aid specifically for local public health departments. The act provides Federal funds for at least six minimum functions of a local health department: vital statistics, communicable disease control maternity and child hygiene services, environmental sanitation, public health laboratory services, and public health education. Significantly, now there is the extra bonus in that it will provide the keystone for local civil defense planning for health services.

ACTION HELD UP BY WAR

Endorsed enthusiastically by 60 such groups as the National Congress of Parents and Teachers, American Medical Association, the National Grange, and the General Federation of Women's Clubs, an almost identical bill was passed by the House of Representatives during the Eightieth Congress. This year, when the bill reached the House, the Korean war had broken out, and it was shelved because of what were considered more pressing matters.

Events of the last few weeks, however, have shown clearly the need for all-out action in planning our civil defense, and that local public health services will be the foundation for the medical, hospitalization, and health aspects of civil defense.

As Dr. William P. Shepard, president of the American Public Health Association, said recently, "Public health services are the administrative backbone of civil defense. The immediate development of such services is not only requisite to the safeguarding of the health of the Nation in normal peacetime, but is given even greater urgency by the current demands for the establishment of adequate civilian defense against possible acts of aggression, including atomic, biological, chemical, and other devices of warfare directly affecting the civilian population."

That there is urgent necessity for immediate action by the House of Representatives is clear. One-third of the Nation is without the administrative organization for providing even normal local health services, let alone those necessary for civil defense. The provision of those services is as essential to our civil defense as weapons are to our fighting men.

United States Sabre Jet, the World's Fastest Fighting Plane, Bagged a Russian MIG–15 in the First Aerial Combat Test

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GERALD R. FORD, JR.
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 21, 1950

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, several days ago the newspapers carried an Associated Press dispatch which must have thrilled Americans everywhere. It told of a dog fight in the skies over Korea at an elevation of more than 20,000 feet, in which Lt. Col. Bruce H. Hinton, of the United States Air Force, made the first kill in a battle between four F–86 Sabres and four MIG–15's near the Manchurian border south of Sinuiju.

Mr. Speaker, as a Reserve officer in the Navy, I would like to express my admiration for the magnificent work accomplished by airmen in Korea and in all of our fighting services.

But a few days ago, I read an editorial telling of our Air Forces having already flown more than 15,000 of the United Nation's casualties to safety off the Korean battlefields. This later exploit and splendid performance by the most modern of all aircraft, accomplished at a speed of more than 600 miles per hour, is reminiscent of the almost daily reports which we received from all theaters of operation in the air during World War II.

Mr. Speaker, I was particularly thrilled to see such splendid performance given by our F–86 jets in outstripping the much vaunted sweptback planes of like design flown by the Russian Air Force.

The performance of Lt. Col. Bruce Hinton, in this dramatic fight, is altogether reminiscent of other war aces and heroes of World War II—men like Maj. Dick Bong and Joe Foss, Lt. Col. Francis Gabreski, and others, who, like our own Johnny Meyer, well-known to practically every Member of this House, is now in command of Colonel Hinton's fighting group.

Mr. Speaker, while it is in fact a matter of several months, it seems only but a few days ago that Lt. Col. John C. Meyer, top-scoring, living Air Force pilot of World War II—an ace who destroyed 37 German planes in the air and on the ground—was placidly walking the floors of the House Office Buildings here on Capitol Hill, where, for the last 2 years, he acted as Air Force Liaison Officer to the House of Representatives.

Johnny Meyer's office in the Old House Office Building was on the same floor as my own and not many rooms removed. It was because of these facts that I got to know him well, and came to respect him not alone as a great hero and highly skilled airman—but as a splendid gentleman and officer.

We knew him for his devotion to his country and to his duties in the Air Force. On innumerable occasions I have seen him on Saturdays, Sundays, and holidays, working at his desk—in never-ending endeavor to keep up with the countless thousands of requests made of the congressional liaison group of the Air Force by my colleagues here within this House.

I have, on many occasions, discussed various types of planes, tactics, and aerial operations with Colonel Meyer for, in the matter of fighter planes, he is an expert. As a member of this body, I have great respect for his expert opinion, and I noted, with a great deal of pleasure, that in discussing the bagging of the Russian MIG and its comparison with our own F–86, Johnny Meyer said, in part:

> It's just the finest airplane that I ever flew—it's everything wrapped up in one fast package—it's nice to taxi, warm, comfortable to sit in—and has all the little things as well as all the big ones to commend it to our services.

Johnny Meyer was a tremendous help to me not only for his expert ability in his special field, but in addition he had good common sense on all occasions in reference to all problems. I have missed him, as we all have, but we know that he is performing the work he loved best, so certainly we are proud of his outstanding achievements.

Mr. Speaker, it is because of their love of country, the will to do, and the daring of men like Colonel Hinton, Johnny Meyer, and all others in our fighting forces in Korea, that ours today is a great nation. So long as they live, America will live, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against them.

That all in this body may read of this accomplishment in the air over Korea by our F-86 Sabres—flying under command of a young Air Force officer so well known to all in this House—I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks, and include in the RECORD the AP dispatch above referred to. The dispatch reads as follows:

SABRE JET, WORLD'S FASTEST FIGHTING PLANE, DOWNS RED MIG-15 IN FIRST COMBAT TEST—FORMER D. C. FLIER CREDITED WITH FIRST KILL WITH NEW CRAFT

AN ADVANCE UNITED STATES BASE, KOREA, December 17.—An F-86 Sabre jet bagged a Russian-made MIG-15 today in the first battle test of America's newest and fastest operational fighting plane.

The enemy jet, aflame, was seen spinning out of control. Lt. Col. Bruce Hinton, of Stockton, Calif., made the kill in a 5-minute battle between four F-86 Sabres and four MIG-15's near the Manchurian border south of Sinuiju.

The other three MIG-15's streaked to safety across the Yalu River into Manchuria.

Returning to his base, Hinton made a victory roll over the runway and the cheering men on the ground knew the answer to a question they had been asking since the Sabres arrived December 15: How would they rate in battle against the speedy MIG-15's?

[Colonel Hinton's wife and two children formerly lived in Washington, at 5509 Parkland Court SE., according to the Air Force. They now live in Stockholm.—Editor's note.]

THE BEST THERE IS

The 6-foot Hinton, 31, was grinning when he climbed out of his plane.

"I caught him and let him have it and down he went," he said. "The Sabre is the best there is."

Reputedly the world's fastest jet not still in the experimental class, the North American-built Sabre has swept-back wings and tail. It holds the world's operational speed record of 670.981 miles per hour—which is not necessarily its actual top performance.

The MIG-15 is fast—over 600 miles per hour—but just how fast isn't known.

Sunday's battle definitely indicated the Sabre is faster.

"I was sure hoping to get an MIG," said Hinton. "Matter of fact, I told the boys just before I took off to get a red star ready to put on my plane."

FLEW "SLOW" TO FOOL THEM

He said the enemy planes were fooled because the Sabres deliberately flew at slow speed, at first.

"We were at 25,000 feet when we spotted them at 18,000 feet, flying level or slightly climbing and going very fast," he related.

"We headed down on them. They started a hard turn to the right, and as we closed in on them we started a harder turn to the right and turned inside of them. We got right in behind them.

"It was then that they let go their wing tanks and shoved on the coal. We dropped our tanks too, and we poured on the coal too. We eased up on them, although they were going like hell. I picked out a target plane, and I closed in gradually on him. When I was in range I let go with a burst.

"I could see the tracer bullets hitting him. They damaged him. I could tell, because he wiggled a bit in the air. I continued firing. The guy started burning and smoking very badly. The smoke decreased and a bunch of flame came out of him and he slowed down.

"He appeared to go out of control. By that time I was within 600 or 800 feet of him. As he went down I had my air brakes on, but he was going too slow for me to follow. The last time I saw him he was out of control on his way down."

CONFIRMED BY COLLEAGUE

Another member of the flight, Lt. Paul W. Bryce, Jr., of Lawrenceburg, Tenn., was the last to see the falling MIG.

"The fellow was at about 3,000 feet and was spinning down, definitely out of control," said Bryce. "I am sure he never was able to pull out of that spin."

The F-86's flew their first mission on the day they reached this base. They encountered no enemy. The next day, December 16, a snowstorm kept them on the ground. On the morning of December 17 they escorted B-29 bombers to the Kanggye area, but met no enemy fighters and only light flak.

It was during the afternoon that they went out to wait and look for MIG's, as one pilot put it.

Col. John C. Meyer, of Forrest Hills, N. Y., is leader of the fighter group.

FRET AT RESTRICTION

He said proudly:

"It's just the finest airplane I ever saw or ever flew. It's just everything good wrapped up in one fast package. It's even nice to taxi, and nice and warm and comfortable to sit in. It has all the little things as well as all the big ones."

Meyer, a leading ace who bagged 37 German planes in the air or on the ground during World War II, fretted about restrictions preventing American planes in Korea from pursuing Communist fighters across the Yalu into Manchuria.

He drew a line in the sand with the toe of his foot, and said:

"It's as though I told you 'I can punch you in the nose, but you can't reach across that line to hit me back.'"

Federal Spending in Fiscal 1951 May Exceed $80,000,000,000

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 8, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am presenting some facts which the taxpaying public should have an opportunity to examine. It is their money which is being spent; it is their money which is being appropriated. There is no loyal citizen who objects to his dollars going to save the lives of our boys in the service, or to keep this Nation solvent, but they do object to the spending and appropriating of money which is not essential to bring about peace, or to save the lives of our boys.

Under leave to extend, heretofore granted, I am inserting in the RECORD the following statement prepared by Mr. Paul O. Peters:

FEDERAL SPENDING IN FISCAL 1951 MAY EXCEED $80,000,000,000

The daily Treasury statement for December 15, 1950, indicates that total Federal spending for the fiscal year 1951, ending next June 30, may total $80,000,000,000. As of October 31, 1950, the grand total of unexpended balances of appropriations from prior years plus authorizations was $13,557,666,930.10. Regular, supplemental, deficiency, and continuing appropriations raised the total available for expenditure to more than $69,000,000,000 as of October 31, 1950. Presently a second supplemental bill calling for $17,820,000,000 is in progress through the Congress and will be approved before the Eighty-first Congress adjourns sine die. The table following, compiled from the daily Treasury statement for December 15, 1950, summarizes the spending authorizations:

Appropriations, expenditures, and balances, Oct. 31, 1950

Unexpended balances from prior years	$13,557,666,930.10
Regular appropriations, fiscal 1951	17,778,369,758.33
Supplemental and deficiency	11,291,656,760.00
Indefinite and continuing [1]	26,396,688,908.08
Other deficiencies prior years	50,703,988.91
Transfers affecting prior prior year balances	—577,182,014.43
Transfers affecting current year appropriation	577,182,014.43
Total funds available, Oct. 31, 1950	69,075,086,345.42
Requested second supplemental, 1951	17,820,000,000.00
Possible expenditures, 1951	86,895,086,345.42
Reported budget expenditures, fiscal 1951 to Dec. 15, 1950	17,527,996,852.64
Estimated amount available for expenditure	69,367,089,492.78

[1] The amounts included in this category are based upon the budget estimates of the President released January 9, 1950.

PURCHASING POWER OF DOLLAR CONTINUES DECLINE

In the week of December 8 to 15, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reports the daily index number on spot market prices for 28 commodities at wholesale rose from 355.4 to 358 of the August 1939 level, equals 100.

The purchasing power of the dollar thus declined to 27.933 percent of the August 1939 value. This is inflation.

Meanwhile, we continue to ship scarce American commodities to Europe, Asia, Africa, and other parts of the world without due regard to the inflationary effect upon our own economy.

In the Matter of Friendship

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. WILLIS ROBERTSON
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, December 21 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an excerpt from a memorial address entitled "In the Matter of Friendship" delivered in St. Louis, December 7, 1919, by my beloved friend, the late Harry B. Hawes, United States Senator from Missouri, and reprinted in the December Conservation Report of the National Wildlife Federation, Carl D. Shoemaker, Washington correspondent.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"IN THE MATTER OF FRIENDSHIP

"All that can be expected of any man is to make the best use of the things that are within his power. Only the contented man is rich; so we must look for the things that bring contentment. And first of these is to find a friend; and if you find two friends you are indeed a lucky man; and if you find three friends—real friends—then you are a rich and powerful man. In prosperity it is easy to find a friend, but in adversity it is most difficult of all things. No matter how small a man's means may be, if he gives of what he has to his friend it is the same as if it was a great amount. A man's pleasures are insured by sharing them with a friend and his griefs are reduced by securing the sympathy of a friend. The counsel of a friend is the best counsel because it will be true advice; for, when received from a mere acquaintance, it may be so filled with flattery that its value will be destroyed, and faithful and true counsel rarely comes excepting from the true friend. It is said that in youth we have visions and in old age dreams, and the vision and the dream may give us an ideal of perfection; but experience and large contact with men compel us to accept the man who measures in his virtues only to the substantial average. If we view a man as a whole and find him good as a friend, we must not be diverted from the happy average—the everyday, human average—by using a magnifying glass upon his faults or frailties. We must, in order to have and hold a friend, accept him as he is, demanding but one thing in return for our affection—his fidelity."

The above is an excerpt from a memorial address delivered at Christ Church Cathedral, St. Louis, December 7, 1919, by the late Harry B. Hawes, United States Senator from Missouri, and a distinguished conservation leader both in and out of the Halls of Congress. In these troublesome days of world strife and uncertainty, we need the right kind of friends throughout the Nation and abroad. Let us then at this Yuletide season give heed to these words from a man rich in the experience of the world.

Sincerely,

CARL D. SHOEMAKER.

Communist Aggression

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MATTHEW M. NEELY

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, December 21 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, by request, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, a letter written to the New York Herald Tribune on the 13th day of this month by Gen. Donald B. Adams, Mr. Arthur J. Goldsmith, and a number of other distinguished men.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RED AGGRESSION—PROGRAM FOR AMERICA TO MEET DANGER IS PRESENTED

To the NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE:

The leaders of the Communist world have clearly shown their intent to attack the free world by military means as well as by subversion and propaganda. It is, therefore, of first importance to realize that both the United States and the United Nations are under planned attack, and to formulate out of the welter of confusion a specific program of action by the United States against the greatest danger which it has ever faced. We, therefore, urge that—

1. The President and Congress proclaim a state of national emergency.

2. The Government undertake immediate full-scale mobilization of the Armed Forces and the industrial economy.

3. We reaffirm our unalterable determination to support the decision of the United Nations to defend Korea against aggression whether or not military necessity calls for the temporary withdrawal of United Nations forces.

4. The United Nations enforce economic and other necessary sanctions against Communist China unless its forces are withdrawn from Korea.

5. We refuse to recognize the Chinese Communist government, and we oppose recognition by the United Nations.

6. We provide economic aid and military supplies to the Chinese Nationalist Government on Formosa and maintain the United States fleet there.

7. We provide economic aid and military supplies to the anti-Communist forces on the Chinese mainland, French Indochina, and Malaya.

8. We encourage India and Pakistan to strengthen themselves against any contingency, and we provide them with economic and military supplies.

9. We accelerate the negotiation of peace treaties with Japan and Germany, providing for their rearmament under agreed controls.

10. We use all means to bring about the fullest measure of common defense by every member of the Atlantic Pact, giving our utmost support to those nations which fully cooperate in mobilizing their strength, recognizing that the defense of the North Atlantic area is our major strategic interest and responsibility.

11. The Government create a nonpartisan advisory council, representing all segments of the population, including management, labor, agriculture, etc.

12. The executive department regularly consult with the leaders of both parties in the Senate and the House of Representatives in formulating national policy in the current emergency.

13. We intern all Communists and subversives classified as dangerous by the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

14. We assist, within the limitation of essential military priorities, all governments and individuals willing to fight Communist aggression.

Gen. Donald B. Adams, Dr. Wm. S. Bernard, George V. Denny, Jr., Charles Edison, Maj. George Fielding Eliot, John Ellis, Christopher T. Emmet, George B. Ford, Rev. William J. Gibbons, S. J., Arthur J. Goldsmith, Robert R. Guthrie, Dr. Alvin S. Johnson, H. V. Kaltenborn, Frederick C. McKee, Hugh Moore, Mrs. Natalie Paine, Dr. Daniel A. Poling, Victor F. Ridder, Herbert Bayard Swope, Westmore Willcox, Jr.

The Greed for Wealth

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELMER THOMAS

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, December 21 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement entitled "The Greed for Wealth," by J. K. Wells, of Oklahoma City, Okla.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE GREED FOR WEALTH

The greed for wealth is undermining the principles of the American people. Avarice, beyond what is necessary to possess all the necessities and some of the luxuries of life, portrays a coarse and depraved mind. Modesty, honesty, chivalry, courtesy, gentility, truthfulness, and patriotism, the highest attributes of a truly great people, have given way to the baser instincts of mankind.

Wealth corrupts legislatures, congresses, and parliaments, dominates executives, and sits upon the throne of justice. It defeats legislation sought to ameliorate the unequal opportunities of mankind and places the burden of government upon those least able to bear it. It exalteth those in high places who are willing to do its bidding and crushes those who dare question its motives.

The scales of justice uphold its nefarious schemes and punishes the poor, the credulous and the innocent—the pawns of wealth—with impunity. It makes a mockery of patriotism and honesty is bound by the circumference of a dollar. The press and platform are not unknown as its hirelings and even the pulpit often is not too severely detached from its environments.

Was the immortal Goldsmith thinking of our present age when he wrote:

"Ill fares the land to hastening ills a prey where wealth accumulates and men decay."

Should wealth be exalted above principle, bigotry above tolerance, and success above righteousness?

Let me ask you, kind reader, is there no more in life than lucre; is there no more in government than greed; is there no more in democracy than depredation?

J. K. WELLS.

This Administration Greatest Hoarder of All Time

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. MALONE

OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, December 21 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, a release from my office entitled "This Administration Greatest Hoarder of All Time."

There being no objection, the release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 31, 1950.—United States Senator GEORGE W. MALONE (Republican, Nevada), today called attention to what he termed, "the Truman administration's stupid practice of buying for the military establishment at inflation prices the same foods which it has been hoarding and is trying to give away." And, he demanded that a stop be put to the wasteful practice.

"While one department of the Government is searching for certain foods to buy at top prices to feed our boys who are being called into military service, another department of the same Government is searching for people—preferably Europeans, but apparently anyone except Americans—to whom to give the millions upon millions of pounds of food, which our Government has been buying and storing to make prices higher," the Nevada Senator said, referring to the huge price support stocks which the Commodity Credit Corporation has been buying and storing.

Senator MALONE said, "This is but another illustration of the wanton waste of taxpayers' money and the total lack of efficiency in the Truman administration."

"The Government," Senator MALONE said, "has 315,000,000 bushels of wheat and 229,000,000 bushels of corn. The CCC has 192,000,000 pounds of butter, and is buying up more at the rate of 9,000,000 pounds a week; 322,000,000 pounds of dried milk, and is buying up more at the rate of 45,000,000 pounds a month; 104,000,000 pounds of cheese, and is buying up more at the rate of 23,000,000 pounds a month; and 170,000,000 pounds of dried eggs (the equivalent of 32,000,000 dozen), and is buying at the rate of 15,000,000 pounds a month.

"Federal law specifically authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to turn over any surplus food to the military services," Senator MALONE said. "However, during four weeks when the CCC, a unit of the Department of Agriculture, was buying vast quantities of butter, eggs, and cheese to store in caves or give away to make the prices higher, the military services bought in the open market at inflation prices 4,131,022 pounds of butter, 4,910,350 dozen eggs, and 954,664 pounds of cheese."

Erie's Use of Train Radio

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 21, 1950

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an editorial taken from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of December 18, 1950:

ERIE'S USE OF TRAIN RADIO

For its pioneer work in applying the modern device of radio to the operation of railway trains, the Erie Railroad deserves congratulations.

A demonstration of train radio in action, at which the members of the Federal Communications Commission were guests last week, must have been truly impressive. It is still more impressive in view of the fact that the Erie is using train radio on 90 percent of its main line between New York and Chicago.

The popular excuse unprogressive railroad men give for their failure to use train radio is that it has not been proved practical. How much more practical does it have to be proved than to be in successful operation as it is on the Erie?

Train radio would have averted many of the terrible wrecks that have occurred in recent years and can make railroad travel far safer in the future.

It is needed for communication between one part of a train and another in these days of mile-long freight trains and very long passenger trains. Wrecks have happened because train crews did not know that the rear of their train had not quite cleared the main track in switching over to a siding, or that several of their cars had been knocked over onto an adjoining track in a minor collision, thus setting the scene for a major disaster.

For communication between one train and another en route, and between trains en route and dispatchers and track-side crews, train radio is needed also. It is the one form of communication available to trains that offers everything required for safe operation. Wrecks have occurred because communication was too slow and too sporadic—radio is instantaneous and continuous. Wrecks have occurred because the message that was sent was not received—radio enables the sender to confirm whether the message has been received or not. Wrecks have occurred because the message, though received, was not understood—radio enables the recipient to ask for a plainer explanation if he does not understand, and for the sender to give it.

Radio is an elastic and versatile safety device. In combination with other safety devices, it should be considered indispensable to the operation of fast trains over congested track. But it is not alone a safety device—it is an efficiency device also.

Factual studies have shown that it will soon pay for itself in reduced operating costs and will then become a source of clear profit for the railroad. By taking a firmer hand in pressing railroads to install radio, the Interstate Commerce Commission would not only be protecting the traveling public against needless maiming and death—it would also be acting for the best interest of the railroads themselves.

What Happened to the $48,000,000,000 for Defense?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, December 21 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, a release from my office entitled "What Happened to the $48,000,000,000 for Defense."

There being no objection, the release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 24, 1950.—United States Senator GEORGE W. MALONE, Republican, Nevada, today demanded an explanation from the administration of why we will lack arms of every classification and why we are short in all elements of military strength, after the unprecedented spending of over $48,000,000,000 on the Military Establishment during the past 4 years. The demand was made in a statement issued by the Nevada Senator.

"The question has been asked previously, but not satisfactorily answered," Senator MALONE said, continuing:

"The American taxpayers, already bled by a spendthrift administration, have a right to know where this money has gone. They say that half of it has gone for salaries; that is no explanation. Salaries for doing what? Certainly not to improve our military strength. The outbreak of the Korean war exposed our pitiful unpreparedness.

"Why such a large proportion, nearly nine billion, for civilian personnel; what did they do?

"The breakdown into major categories of expenditures—all before Korea—shows over $2,000,000,000 spent for commercial travel. Travel for what? Certainly not to improve our military strength.

"Of the forty-eight billion, about ten billion is listed as having been spent for equipment. What kind of equipment? The kind our American boys were handed when they were sent in to battle the Korean Reds?

"Not one dollar of the forty-eight billion spent went for atomic bombs or for anything connected with atomic-energy warfare. That was extra. And not $1 of the amount went for military aid to other countries. These items were extra.

"Where did the money go? Was it wasted? Was it spent unwisely?

"The lack of weapons capable of blasting the Soviet-type tanks of the North Koreans in the beginning, and the absence of tanks as good as these make Americans wonder where our money went.

"Many Americans would like to know why such low proportion went to provide weapons, why we were caught with obsolete planes? We would like to know also, in view of the high percentage spent to keep military personnel on hand, why we ran into a shortage of troops trained for combat? To say that the personnel was elsewhere in the world is not the answer, for, if that were true, why then the draft calls to make up the deficiency?

"The billions spent for the military between VJ-day and the outbreak of the Korean war would have meant that we had strength somewhere, trained for fighting, using the best guns and equipment, but when the Korean war developed we learned we were sadly weak throughout our Military Establishment.

"Now we are threatened with more demands for more money. Producing the aircraft and other weapons which we now lack is an urgent necessity. But it is essential, too, that Americans get ironclad assurances from the Defense Department that the additional billions will provide, instead of military forces hampered by glaring inadequacies, the well-rounded armed might which is the Nation's most imperative need."

Cherokee Indian Wins Plea To Rejoin Marines

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ELMER THOMAS
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, December 21 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, a recent article appearing in the press relating to the plea of a Cherokee Indian that he be permitted to rejoin his outfit in the Marines.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHEROKEE WINS PLEA TO REJOIN MARINES

INGLEWOOD, CALIF., December 16.—A Cherokee Indian mother today wrote the letter that will put her Marine sergeant son back where he wants to be—in the thick of the Korea fight leading his "dirty, stinking, and loyal platoon."

Tech. Sgt. Robert J. Ward, 25, a full-blooded Cherokee, was in the bloody fighting until recently. Then his mother wrote Gen. Clifton B. Cates, Commandant of the Marine Corps, that her son was the last of her boys—the other two were killed in World War II. She claimed the right to have her last surviving son put in a noncombat zone.

The mother is Mrs. Glenn Peterson, wife of an aircraft machinist. She is not immediately available for verification, but Sergeant Ward's father is believed dead.

Orders releasing Sergeant Ward to noncombatant duty were sent to him. But he tucked them in his hip pocket and continued leading his platoon up one bloody hill after another.

PUT ON DESK JOB

It took follow-up orders to get him on a desk job in Tokyo.

From there he wrote his mother this letter:

"I'm no hero, but I also have responsibilities to Little Squaw (his daughter) and Bettye (his wife) and you.

"If these people aren't stopped here on their own ground, we will have to share the thing so many have died to prevent their loved ones from sharing—the sight of death in our own backyard; of women and children being victims of these people.

"I went on the warpath for the right to do my bit to keep our people free and proud and now I'm shackled to a useless job.

"I ask you, my mother, to free me so I can once again be free to help my boys.

"They placed their faith in me and I brought them all back and now someone else leads them and I know they need me."

HIS DIRTY PLATOON

"Maybe in a sense I need them, my dirty, stinking and loyal platoon.

"Once I cried before you when I thought I'd lost someone whom I loved very dearly, and once again did I cry when I was told I must leave my men.

"So, I ask you the one thing which your heart does not want to do, release me to fight.

"I pace my room feeling useless, being no good to anyone. I'm no barracks-parade-ground Marine—I'm a Cherokee Indian and I'm happiest being miserable with my own people up on those mountains.

"I know you'll understand that your blessings will go with me into whatever the future holds in store for us.

"Write to the commandant and release me—explain to them as only you can that I have a job to do and that you understand."

INDIAN PERMITTED TO GO BACK TO HIS "STINKING PLATOON"

Gen. Clifton B. Cates, Commandant of the Marine Corps, has granted the wish of Marine Sgt. Robert J. Ward to rejoin his "dirty, stinking and loyal platoon" in Korea.

Technical Sergeant Ward, 25, a full-blooded Cherokee Indian of Los Angeles, was ordered out of the Korean fighting recently to a desk job in Tokyo. His mother, Mrs. Glenn Peterson, of Inglewood, Calif., wife of an aircraft machinist, had claimed the right to have her last surviving son placed in a noncombat zone. Two other sons had been killed in World War II.

But Sergeant Ward, who is married and has a baby daughter, persuaded his mother to cancel her request. In a letter to her he said his "dirty, stinking and loyal platoon" needed him.

General Cates commented yesterday:

"The Marines need men like Tech. Sgt. Robert J. Ward."

Recipe for Happiness

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT L. RAMSAY
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 21, 1950

Mr. RAMSAY. Mr. Speaker, a constituent of mine, the Reverend Father Camillus Barth, C. P., has forwarded to me what I consider a good recipe for happiness for these or any other times. Under leave to revise and extend my remarks, I include this recipe:

Take equal parts of faith and courage, mix well with a sense of humor, sprinkle with a few tears, and add a helping of kindness for others. Bake in a good-natured oven and dust with laughter. Scrape away self-indulgence and serve in generous helpings.

Mr. Speaker, as Father Barth pointed out, that is good philosophy. I hope all of us, throughout the world, might be guided by it.

Editorial Tribute to the Late Ben J. Sallows

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH BUTLER
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, December 21 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, just last Sunday a very old, very dear friend of mine, Ben Sallows, of Alliance, Nebr., for many years publisher of the Alliance Times-Herald, passed away. His death is a great loss to me personally. It is likewise a great loss to the city of Alliance and to all Nebraska.

Mr. President, I have here an editorial from the Alliance Daily Times-Herald of December 18 about Ben Sallows. Because the editorial expresses so well what I feel, and what all the people of Nebraska feel, I ask to have it inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD. Any community or State is most fortunate if it has a citizen like Ben Sallows.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BEN J. SALLOWS

"Ol' Ben used to tell 'em."
"He ran the town but most people liked it."
"He did a lot for Alliance."

These and many other similar remarks were heard on Box Butte Avenue Sunday after the news noised around that Ben J. Sallows had died that morning. We would add with the highest of esteem:

"Whatta character."

Here was a personage who was a dozen newspapermen wrapped into one, plus a sixth sense for making money. Ben could write the news or ad copy, set it on the machines or stone, lock up the forms, make up and roll the pages, stereotype from the mats, plate the press, and then print the paper. He carried many a route, too, in his day, and then swept the place out.

He didn't always do these things, of course, but he could—and the boys around the plant knew it and were relieved in the knowledge that the paper always would get out. If Ben had been twins he wouldn't have had to pay social security, for his semiweekly Times-Herald wouldn't have needed as many as eight persons. Ben was the first to learn how to operate every piece of new equipment he bought. And he always kept enough on hand to run a daily, just in case some competitor came in to challenge his twice-a-week operation that gave him more time to spread himself through the publication and more latitude for his investment ventures into other fields.

Because of what some people have called his Midas touch, Ben was able to have all the fun ordinary newspapermen do, and build a sizable fortune at the same time. Twice a week he could seek local or widespread reforms by either pouring vitriol or balm into his editorial crucible (the mixture was usually more v. than b.), and then he could spend the week end out in the financial world. But whenever he wanted to relax he dropped back at the office at night after everyone else had left and busied himself setting up a job that some customer was needing from his printing plant. Any summation of Ben's life must classify him as a printer at heart.

He took the time from his varied activities to help Alliance grow into Nebraska's twelfth largest city. He was western Nebraska's greatest booster for farm-to-market roads, and served the last year of his life as Governor Val Peterson's highway consultant—without ever putting in a bill for the $6,000 salary the post was supposed to pay. He put the first money down for an irrigation well in Box Butte County and spent thousands of dollars of his own money trying to get oil explorations started up this way. He didn't get behind civic projects—he was out front pulling in the harness.

We suspect that the Good Lord broke the mold when he made Ben Sallows. There never can be another quite like him. And, as the people on Box Butte Avenue were saying Sunday, Alliance can be mighty happy that he was allowed to pass this way.

Address of Hon. John J. Rooney, of New York, at the Armistice Day Ceremonies at the Veterans' Administration Hospital, Brooklyn, N. Y.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. ROONEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 21, 1950

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, under the permission heretofore granted me, I include the following address which I delivered at the Armistice Day ceremonies held under the auspices of the Brooklyn Council, Kings County, Department of New York, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, Saturday, November 11, 1950, at Veterans' Administration Hospital, Brooklyn, N. Y. The address follows:

The older veterans here will not forget that day in November 1918, "the eleventh day of the eleventh month," when word passed along the lines in France that the armistice had been signed. Few people knew what an armistice was, but every one understood that the fighting was over. At 5 minutes to 11 o'clock on that eleventh day of the eleventh month, firing ceased. There was jubilation in the air, though probably it was not as vociferous as here in New York City where the crowds went wild—the horns blew and the whistles shrieked and the ticker tape and torn up telephone directories made a snowstorm on the canyons of lower Manhattan. Profound thankfulness swelled up in every heart. At last the slaughter was over, the boys could come home, the Nation and the world was rescued from the imperialistic ambitions of Kaiser Bill, and, most of all, the world was saved for democracy and the war to end wars was finished.

There were those who would never come home, but lie forever under the white crosses. But their lives had been sacrificed in a holy and successful cause. We could be proud of them while we grieved for them. We still grieve for them, and we are still proud of them.

There were high hopes for the world springing to life on that autumn day. Now, 32 years later, sadder and wiser, we know that those hopes were not solidly founded in reality. We expected too much, too suddenly, and too soon. The Armistice turned out, in the event, to be only an armistice, not a real peace. It was an interlude between two eras of dreadful global war.

Again, just in time for the grown-up sons of the veterans of 1917 and 1918 to be of military age, came another and longer and vaster global conflict. Again America participated. For us this time the war lasted almost 4 years. It cost us 313,000 dead and $340,000,000,000. By 1972, it is calculated, the original and subsequently accruing cost of this Second World War will have run to $700,000,000,000.

Once more, however, in 1945, we ended the war victoriously, and with high hopes for the future peace of the world. The menacing powers that by their imperialistic designs threatened the existence of all free peoples, had been virtually extinguished. We would set up an organization that would, humanly speaking, almost guarantee future peace. All the peoples of the world had suffered so from the war, and had seen so dramatically the fate of those who take to the sword in aggression, that they would dem and peace for the future. Our allies and ourselves, who had stood together so well to defeat the common enemy, could now stand together for peace. A new era would begin, with the new powers of nature harnessed for the well-being of all.

But now the clouds hang again over the world—east and west. War has taken place in Korea, and the gloomy prospect of a possible global conflict, a third world war, assumes the shape of reality in many minds.

We have learned much, however, out of our bitter experiences and prospects. These are some of the lessons.

First, we know that we cannot isolate ourselves from the struggles and destinies of the rest of mankind. It has been a hard lesson for us Americans to learn. We grew up behind watery curtains of the Atlantic and Pacific. We thought we could mind our own business, if other people minded theirs, and stay out of the world's turmoil in prosperous detachment. We ought to have known better. The United States or the colonies before there was any United States, became involved in every general European war since the middle of the seventeenth century. The peoples of the earth are tied together, and we are of them.

Secondly, we have learned, in the language of a recent writer, that "there is no way of not using power." If we do nothing, if we sit down in inaction, that is using power and determining destinies. Positively or negatively every move we make or fail to make, every word we say, every attitude we strike, has repercussions to the ends of the earth, repercussions which sometimes, like an electric wave, circle round the earth and come back upon us.

Thirdly, we have learned that we have the power. In 1945 we dismantled the mightiest military machine that was ever assembled in human history. Our economic power surpasses the imagination. Our scientific skill, our level of intelligence, the skill of our inventors on the one hand and of our mechanics on the other, the infinite resources that we have in this continent or to which we have access by our command of the sea, constitute a veritable empire, grander than that of Assyria or Rome or Britain.

And we have accompanied this potential with a moral restraint, a humanity, and a generosity without parallel in the history of the world. It never happened before that a great victorious nation, after a bitter war, taxed itself to the point of injury to feed its former enemies and rebuild their economic structures, at the same time renouncing all territorial or economic fruits of conquest. There is grandeur in this. We have given $40,000,000 worth of assistance to other countries since 1945.

We acknowledge our mistakes, our sins, and our failures. Our democracy is far from perfect. But there is no reason why we should not look at the credit side of our national ledger too, and be proud of it. I have no patience with the morbid and exaggerated self-criticism in which Americans sometimes indulge. We should stay as far from it as we should from vainglorious boasting.

Yet, we cannot disguise from ourselves that again we are living in a critical era. The malignant power of Red fascism has arisen to take the place of Germany and Japan in seeking dominance over the earth. But recently, in Korea, we have thwarted one misguided attempt to seize a key point in Asia. There will be other attempts by Soviet Russia, in other parts of the world, whenever the time appears ripe for them. And the ripe time for them will be when we relax and let down our guard. We must be prepared to take action wherever in the world aggression rears its ugly head. We must not delude ourselves into thinking everything will be all right. Once more it is an eleventh hour—this time, for resistance to the new imperialism of Soviet Russia. America must proceed with her arming, whatever the cost to the Nation or the dislocation to individual lives. This we owe to the dead of the Argonne and the First World War, to the dead of Iwo Jima and the Second World War, to the dead of Korea in this year 1950, and to all the future generations of American citizens. We must keep faith with the past and with the future.

A Soldier's Prayer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ESTES KEFAUVER
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, December 21 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, a prayer by Lt. William Reavis Roberts, who was killed in line of duty in a plane crash on March 2, 1944.

There being no objection, the prayer was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A SOLDIER'S PRAYER

(By Lt. William Reavis Roberts)

Almighty God, Commander in Chief of our Armed Forces, be with this soldier in his hour of need. Strengthen my heart that I may have the courage to perform my duties to my country and Thee. Strengthen my mind that I may not lose sight for what I fight. Strengthen my soul that I may not hate my fellow man nor forget the ideals for which my Saviour gave His life.

I beseech Thee, O Lord, to be with my comrades in arms wherever they may be in this world. Cheer them in their hours of melancholy and depression; befriend them when they feel all alone; lighten their hearts when they feel homesick. Share Thy infinite wisdom with them when they lose sight of their goal and wonder for what they are fighting.

We pray, O Lord, not only for our comrades but for the brave men of all nations. Be with them in their hour of need and try to show them their mistake.

We ask Thy mercy for our friends and comrades who have given their lives. Judge them justly and we know they will be in Your greater army, for Thou, O Lord, dost see beyond their seeming callousness. Forgive them of their faults and take them to Thy bosom.

Be with the families of those who are gone. Keep them from becoming bitter. Comfort them when the other boys return.

And now, Father, we ask Thee to make us strong and true, capable of victory and just peacemakers.

Statement Before Twenty-seventh Annual Convention of the Marine Corps League

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 21, 1950

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement I made to the twenty-seventh annual national convention, Marine Corps League, Wednesday session, September 6, 1950:

Worthy Commandant, chairman, distinguished officers of the Marine Corps League, delegates and ladies and gentlemen, as the chairman just said in so graciously presenting me, my plane was grounded in Wilkes-Barre on the 9 o'clock flight this morning, and I could not get off.

Now I don't mean this to be any disrespect for such a distinguished array of patriotic Americans as this outfit but this was my first 3 or 4 days off this session and believe me, ordinarily if that plane had been grounded and I had such a decent and legitimate excuse, even in the presence of my fellow townsman from Wilkes-Barre, Father Michael J. Haley, I would have used a half dozen white lies to stay in the Poconos and not come down here. However, in view of a newspaper story I saw last night, I thought I better come down or I would die without a blessing. Never let it be said that a poor Irishman from the State of Pennsylvania would run out of a hot spot like this. Not me.

I might say that I had in my time addressed many very interesting audiences, but this is the first policemen's convention that I ever attended. I don't mind getting mixed up with one traffic cop at a time, but 40,000 is too tough for me.

But, seriously, insofar as the leathernecks are concerned, washed or unwashed, I think that actions speak louder than words. I don't think that the Marine Corps needs any advocate or special pleading. I believe that the United States Marine Corps' record remains inviolate, and, if I can borrow a phrase of President Lincoln, "far beyond our poor power to add or to detract."

Now I say further, Mr. Chairman, that the Marine Corps does not need a propaganda organization; but if it does, then I take it for granted that, as usual, the Marine Corps will have the best propaganda organization possible. Nothing unusual about that.

Mr. Chairman, the only "red" that I know of in the Marine Corps was spilled in the woods of northern France and on the sands of Iwo Jima and in the jungles of the Pacific, from the halls of Montezuma to the shores of Tripoli.

Mr. Chairman, when the Washington Monument has sunk into the Potomac and when the White House has crumbled into dust, the United States Marine Corps will still be found remaining true to its motto, "Semper fidelis."

I must apologize to this convention. I must apologize to the gentlemen of the press who are kind enough to attend today, in that I have my prepared speech and the copies thereof, a sufficient number, Major Hegarty of the Marines assures me, but it will be found at the Wilkes-Barre-Scranton Airport in a brief case with my shirts.

However, I have had the privilege of speaking on the floor of the House on several occasions in behalf of the Marine Corps and I had intended to speak further in support of the suggestions of that great American, that fine gentleman, my distinguished colleague from Georgia, Mr. CARL VINSON, the chairman of the Armed Services Committee in the House, in support, I say, of his most recent suggestion that there be three divisions of the Marine Corps at full Marine Corps strength of at least 23,000 combat men to a division and going a little further, adding one full air wing to each division. I believe that was four divisions rather than three divisions that CARL VINSON suggested.

Just 1 week before that on the floor and in a Mutual Broadcasting System broadcast I had suggested six full-strength Marine divisions at a strength of about 23,000 with a separate air wing for tactical support for each division, because you know and I know, because you told me and proved it to me, that Marine air is Marine artillery. That is Marine field artillery, Marine tactical air in support of ground troops. That is why I felt and that is why I suggested that the Corps be developed into six full divisions. Your divisions are 5,000 or 6,000 men bigger than the modern triangular Army division. I repeat—giving you about 23,000 and a wing for each division.

On that question of Marine air I would like to indicate this, that in the invasion of South Korea by the North Korean Communist Army there was demonstrated the ineffectiveness now of close air support under conditions of low visibility. Now, it is embarrassing to say this. I do not like to admit it. I feel very sad that I have to say it to you, but even the Marine Air Corps in low visibility, at zero, even the Marine Air Force, cannot properly conduct tactical air support. And they can't do that at night, good weather or bad weather.

Now, that is something must be done about and the Marines are doing something about that. They are experimenting with and perfecting this newest of new tactical air support tactics with ground troops—night and bad weather tactics as well.

I am advised by the people who know that bad weather conditions or night conditions for this kind of work exist about 40 percent of the time. In other words, out of every 24 hours, 9½ hours are suitable for visual and visible air-ground support. That means that for about 14½ hours of that same period there cannot be such tactical support from the air.

That raises this question: What is going to be done to develop an all-weather system of guiding tactical aircraft to and from targets under actual combat condition? That is a big question. I have told you that the marines are attacking and working with that problem.

The Marines are charged with the development of equipment that is known as special equipment and special technique in the support of amphibious operations for landing troops. That you know. Now, since World War II this development has pushed far ahead into this visible support project. That is going on at Quantico and at other places. At the present time a complete evaluation of this problem has been made and there are specific units identified with that problem.

It is always a money problem. I happen to be on the Committee on Appropriations in the House. I know whereof I speak. You have friends there. You have friends in the House. Many of them time and again during this session know, or at least your officers directly connected with these matters know, in the committees and on the floor, when that fine friend of the corps, that great young Congressman from Texas, MAHON, chairman of the Subcommittee on the Armed Services has assured me and assured MIKE MANSFIELD, another marine and great Congressman, that there was not and will not be the intention of his subcommittee or the full committee to emasculate or destroy or put out of business the United States Corps of Marines.

Now, because of this monetary limitation it may take a little time, maybe 2 years, to complete this new program to full operational control. That is to be expected, but you should know that it is being given high priority in matériel, equipment, and funds to accelerate this development. They can make it operational in 1 year under emergency circumstances and those now exist.

Now, the Army did work in this field. Your airmen know of a Hodge report this year, 1950, when they laid down the requirements for the Air Force for close tactical ground support. They are not doing exactly the same thing or in exactly the same way but there is that goal, there is that understanding and that coordination does exist. That you will be happy to know.

Now, I intended and in my prepared address I devoted several paragraphs to itemizing the specific questions and the answers to this extremely interesting and important to you problem of night and bad weather air tactical support that the Marines are specializing in and developing for ground troops.

I do not care to ad lib or talk extemporaneously from notes on such a highly technical problem. I am not sure I am qualified without having before me a manuscript of which you and I could be sure.

But let us talk about this for a minute. Father, when I go too long you start down that aisle. I know you are going to take up a second collection and I will get out of here. We had the first one.

Mr. Chairman, at the outbreak of these Korean hostilities this country's armed forces were scattered and deployed through many sections of the world. General MacArthur had about 160,000 troops in Japan and our Government maintained a small occupation force—you might call them occupation armies if you want to be courteous—in Germany, Austria, and the Adriatic. That is the Trieste area. The Air Force had bombers in Britain, fighting planes at Weisbaden on the Rhine and at a base in North Africa. Many of you may have forgotten we reestablished that old base in North Africa after it had been abandoned. The Navy had an Asiatic squadron and a Mediterranean squadron.

Never before in a period of technical world peace did we have so many land and sea garrisons and air detachments stationed in a—what would you call it—a posture of war, stationed in danger areas where alert attention was required for the potential, impending war.

Now, I want to quote from a man I never had the pleasure of meeting, but I certainly would like to meet him. He is a newspaperman, B. F. Gordon, and I want to use this quotation from one of his remarks on the marines:

"But a familiar element was lacking. Even a cursory survey of our foreign placements invited the question, 'Where are the United States marines?' The answer was, on the 25th of June 1950, the marines were all home—all 71,000 of them, except a few on temporary naval assignment.

"Now, consequently in the Korean emergency, marines had to be transported across the Pacific and in some cases across the country and then across the Pacific to support General MacArthur and the fact that the marines were ready to go to Asia proved anew the indispensability of the Marine Corps in matters of national defense."

I do not think, Mr. Chairman, I have to add that the marines were confined to marine barracks and drill yards because the marines wanted it that way. They were contained and their ranks reduced because under the Military Act—I thought so and others of my colleagues actually thought so—apparently there was an intention to abolish the Marine Corps.

Marine training as well as Marine tradition admirably equips Marine regiments for occupation, especially at such places like Trieste. I was over there last November.

In large-scale hostilities, Marine companies are best adapted to amphibious operations. The marines proved that in the Pacific war. When it comes to plans and operations only the marines can provide the seasoned officers who combine both Army and Navy education and experiences plus their own specialty. Those I mentioned a few minutes ago.

Now, as a tribute to the 175 years of this outfit, Admiral Vinson has started what I consider is the beginning of the right way and I promise you I will support him and I have every reason to believe that the Congress will support him.

It required this Korean incident to reveal a fact that on June 25 for the first time in our history the United States had armed garrisons or occupation forces in different parts of the world with no marines in them. I construe that to be a complete reversal of an old, established policy in our Armed Forces.

In the old days when armies and navies were small, it was the Marine Corps which made the foreign landing to protect the American interest and actually provided policemen for the Navy at sea.

In the First World War the marines went ashore with the Army in France. And they fought at Chateau Thierry and Belleau Wood.

In the last war the marines, master of amphibious operations, preceded the Army in Guadalcanal and hit all those beaches on Pacific islands that became advance, stationary airplane carriers for future operations—those islands.

At present, Mr. Chairman, Soviet imperialism has made a large Army and a large Navy and an unprecedented Air Force an absolute necessity. And amidst these immense mobilizations the Marine Corps looks numerically unimportant. I have indicated that I have had occasion to suspect there were those who thought that its usefulness was over. In fact, however, when Soviet imperialism is destroyed, and destroyed it must be, then the extended Army, Navy, and Air Force will be restricted to a rational, peacetime basis. Now, in that better day—it will soon come we hope—we still want the Marines to be an elite, mobile agency to help keep order in the world, not forgetting that the Marines as always will be the first to fight and every ready if, God forbid, there is ever another war.

This is very interesting. You are a fine audience. I would like to go on like Tennyson's brook, but I know what conventions are. I know this will develop into an endurance contest. This audience is very polite, very attentive, Mr. Chairman. I never saw Marines behave like this. It is a great, great world.

You know, we have a fellow from my town, Pat Macher, a State senator he was. He was born in this country. His parents were born in Lithuania. He was a very successful businessman and is now very wealthy—a good fellow. He will sit down at home—a beautiful home, he has a beautiful wife—and he will have a great big steak with all the trimmings. He will sit back and loosen his belt and open a bottle of brandy, rock back and forth and say, "Boy, am I glad my old man did not miss that boat." I suppose that applies to a lot of us.

In talking to this audience, Mr. Chairman, it suggested this story. I tell you, I come from the coal fields and the afternoon shift in the coal fields comes off at 3:30 and the streetcars up in Wilkes-Barre start in the square and go out to the coal patches out in the valley. This fellow finishes his shift and comes in and he is sitting in the streetcar and you know those streetcars. In front they have seats facing forward and in the back they have seats going this way, down the side for 15 or 20 feet, and then they go like that for the rest of the way. The miners usually go in the back. The fellows are dirty and that is where the miners usually sit.

This fellow is sitting there and he had a tough shift and he was tired. He has got his feet up and he is taking a little nap. In comes this lady. She is dressed up like Mrs. Astor's pet horse. She got her nose up in the air and she looks around and says to this fellow, "Why don't you put your feet where they belong?"

He said, "Don't tempt me, lady; don't tempt me."

I got better ones than that. I will see you tonight. Got to keep this clean; it is official.

I just want to say this. I am not going to complete all of these notes. I want to tell you that my family has been in the Marines for a long long time. I guess in about every show we have had. My mother's youngest brother had an awful name for the Marines, Florence McCarthy. Isn't that a tough name for a marine to have? A red-headed guy named Florence. He died with the garrison at Peking after the Boxer show a long time ago. I still have, Mr. Chairman, up in the attic, a white pith helmet they had with a long gold spike in it, with a white chin strap made out of some corrugated cloth down the front and the back like the old British marines. And the overcoat weighs about a ton. It goes way down to the ankle and way down at the ankle there is the marine blue. It has got three tiers of things on it, the capes—three tiers of capes and rows of buttons down the front. You could hardly carry it. I still have those two pieces of equipment of my Uncle Florence—a great guy. So I have a right to be here. You are not doing me any favor. I've got a right.

So may I express to you my gratitude for your invitation. My compliments to you for this convention. I do not have the honor of being a delegate today. Let me tell you this as I close. Every marine can be a Congressman, but every Congressman cannot be a marine.

Resolution Condemning the Partition of Ireland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. ROONEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 21, 1950

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, the sixty-ninth annual convention of the American Federation of Labor, meeting at Houston, Tex., recently adopted unanimously a resolution condemning the partition of Ireland.

The resolution, which requests the American Federation of Labor delegates to the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions to bring the movement for the ending of partition to a successful conclusion, reads as follows:

Whereas the American Federation of Labor in their national conventions of 1949, recorded their opposition to the continued partition of Ireland; and

Whereas history records that whenever and wherever foreign powers have seized countries and attempted to force their rule on peoples has led to nothing but strife and discord, thereby usurping the right of the majority of people to govern themselves; and

Whereas the money of the American freedom-loving men and women, collected through taxes, is being disbursed in the form of European recovery aid to England, which, in turn, is subsidizing minority form of government in Northeast Ireland which is contrary to the wishes of the majority of the Irish people: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this convention of the American Federation of Labor, respectfully request the American Federation of Labor delegates to the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions to bring to a successful conclusion the end of the partition of Ireland.

Present and Pre-World War II Status of American Merchant Marine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WARREN G. MAGNUSON
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, December 21 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a quarterly report of the Joint Committee for the American merchant marine, setting forth the problems of the merchant marine.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The attached tables show clearly the present and pre-World War II status of the American merchant marine.

The material in the tables is significant in several respects, as follows:

1. The United States flag active seagoing merchant marine is notably larger in number of vessels and in total tonnage than in 1939. But it is woefully deficient in fast, modern passenger-carrying vessels quickly convertible to troop transports in event of emergency. In addition, the once sizable domestic merchant fleet is today less than one-half its pre-World War II size and importance, and even more deficient in the coastwise and intercoastal trades.

2. Among the merchant fleets of the world, the nations which are recipients of American-financed aid programs (Great Britain, Norway, Netherlands, France, Sweden) have larger tonnages of merchant fleets than they did in mid-1939, while Italy and Greece have almost recovered their pre-World War II tonnages. Even Russia, while not in the first 10 maritime nations of the world in mid-1939, based upon tonnage, today is in tenth place. In actual numbers of privately owned vessels, the United States possesses fewer today than it did in mid-1939, although privately owned vessel tonnage is substantially more today than prewar. The latter fact is indicative of the much larger individual size of merchant vessels today compared to 1939.

3. In seagoing merchant vessels tonnage being built for the most important maritime nations of the world, the United States is at the bottom of the list, surpassed even by its former enemies of World War II, and by the principal recipients of its various Government-financed aid programs.

4. The percentage of American imports and exports carried in United States flag vessels continues to decline, in 4 years having dropped 21.4 percent. The losses by American ships in the participation of United States foreign trade have been reflected in substantially increased participation by foreign merchant fleets in this trade, principally by the fleets of nations receiving American aid.

Demand for the Removal of Dean Acheson

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, December 21 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a release from my office on the subject Demand for the Removal of Dean Acheson.

There being no objection, the release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., October 11, 1950.—United States Senator GEORGE W. MALONE, (Republican, Nevada), today renewed his demand for the removal of Dean Acheson as Secretary of State. The demand was made in a major address before the national convention of the American Legion.

He further demanded that ECA aid be cancelled to European nations furnishing manufactured and processed goods to Russia—and that England and France cancel their nonaggression pacts with Russia.

Senator MALONE, a Legionaire himself who has served in many capacities in the Legion, from post adjutant to national vice commander, told the convention delegates in a hard hitting speech that the Legion should furnish the leadership in the determining of America's foreign policy, inasmuch as veterans know best what war means.

The Nevada Senator accused the administration of giving lip service to his bill providing for universal military training and then blocking it when it was before the Senate committee. In support of universal military training, Senator MALONE said it was not war, but "murder," to send untrained boys into battle as was done in the early days of the Korean campaign.

Senator MALONE attacked the Democratic administration for its handling of foreign affairs, national defense, and for its home-front program. The Senator said that we are now helping to arm Russia to wage world war III against us, "through Marshall plan aid which is finding its way to iron-curtain countries."

He called attention to administration actions on the home front and in foreign affairs which, according to the Senator, indicate possible treachery in high places. "On the home front," Senator MALONE said, "the Red plot has been carried on within the administration by a constant attack on American industry. This attack has come through: first, Government regulations so designed as to eliminate venture capital, which made this country great; second, taxes so designed as to eliminate initiative; third, a foreign 'free trade' policy so designed as to curtail domestic production; and fourth, reckless spending on the part of the Government so designed as to threaten our whole economic structure."

Senator MALONE said there was no such thing as a bipartisan foreign policy, and he expressed the opinion that we have no foreign policy, "except that which would provide for our sending our taxpayers' money abroad in every way possible, including financing European socialist governments."

Senator MALONE said, "The United States should immediately establish a definite foreign policy, naming the nations in Europe, Asia, the south seas, and Africa, if any, whose integrity is important to our ultimate safety, notifying the world that we would consider the attempt of any nation to extend its system of government into those areas as dangerous to our peace and safety.

"The Nation should immediately build a national defense organization spearheaded by an air corps and a submarine fleet which would bear silent evidence to the world and to American people that this country is ready and willing to defend its commitments."

Seafaring Unions Call for Immediate Mobilization of Maritime Industry To Meet Any Emergency

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WARREN G. MAGNUSON
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, December 21 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement of the seafaring unions, which call for immediate mobilization of the maritime industry to meet any emergency.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEAFARING UNIONS CALL FOR IMMEDIATE MOBILIZATION OF MARITIME INDUSTRY TO MEET ANY EMERGENCY

Our country and the free countries of the world today are faced with the most critical emergency in history.

Communist aggression is marching almost unchecked through great sections of the world and there can be little doubt in anyone's mind today that unless our country and its resources are fully mobilized for defense and offense as rapidly as possible, we face even graver dangers than those of World War II.

The maritime unions, comprising as they do all of the men who man the merchant ships traveling the trade routes of the world, feel that the urgency of the present situation makes it necessary for all possible steps to be taken to mobilize the all-important marine transportation field, if we are to be prepared to meet the onslaught of an enemy, far more ruthless than the Fascist-Nazi-Japanese hordes of World War II.

The beginning of World War II found the maritime industry in the worst possible state because of lack of planning in Government circles. We had few ships, and no adequate plans for building ships or repairing ships. We were lacking in manpower. Labor representation both before and during the war was practically nonexistent. This same mistake should not be repeated.

Until the latter years of the war our country did not have the fleet that it should have had for the transportation of men, supplies, and materials to the various war fronts of the world. In spite of that, however, the know-how and tremendous production resources of our country, plus the untiring efforts of the men in the maritime industry, successfully carried out the world's greatest transocean movement of troops, supplies, and material. Ninety-four percent of personnel, supplies, and material were carried abroad on merchant vessels, manned by civilian crews.

In World War II merchant seamen demonstrated their courage, ability, and efficiency beyond question. Not one vessel was delayed as a result of labor disputes. Pledges made by the maritime unions at the outbreak of World War II were fully kept. Thousands of seamen gave their lives to assure the successful transportation of great masses of troops, supplies, and war materials to all the war fronts of the world.

In this emergency the seamen now ask only that they be given the opportunity to contribute of their skill and know-how in the shaping of policy to guarantee the greatest all-out mobilization of the maritime industry for defense of our country and the free world.

Our experience in World War II should be taken advantage of. The maritime unions, representing 250,000 licensed and unlicensed personnel on the merchant ships and in the shipyards, urgently recommend to the authorities responsible for gearing our country for all-out defense that the following program be put into effect immediately, to assure an adequate sea transportation force that will guarantee the speedy, efficient transporting of men, supplies, and material to all points in the world where they may be needed:

1. All shipping that is not combat shipping and direct auxiliary shipping for combat ships should be placed under the jurisdiction of the Federal Maritime Board. Neither the Navy, the Army, nor the Air Force should operate any commercial vessels, either for transportation of troops, supplies, or material. The operators of the private merchant marine, with their vast experience, and maritime labor with its experience, should be called upon for this operation.

If an all-out war should come upon us, manpower in the Armed Forces will be needed to the utmost. Navy operation of commercial vessels would be particularly wasteful. Such operation has always taken excessive manpower, using as it does up to three times as many seamen as are used on a civilian-operated vessel.

These merchant vessels under the jurisdiction of the Federal Maritime Board would be in a pool, to be used on the basis of the allocations required by the chiefs of the military operations and those responsible for the movement of strategic materials.

2. Appropriations should be made available at once to the Federal Maritime Board for the purpose of surveying and putting into ready condition our entire merchant fleet of 2,000 vessels, now laid up, so that in the present emergency vessels which may be required on short notice will be available and in condition for immediate operation.

3. The appropriations so made available for the Maritime Board should also take into consideration the immediate reopening of ship-repair and shipbuilding yards throughout the country. In this connection a program should be immediately put into effect for building fast combination freighter-troop carrying vessels, to replace in as short a time as possible the slower Liberty-type vessels which form the majority of the present laid-up fleet.

4. Immediate steps should be taken to empower the Federal Maritime Board to institute manpower mobilization plans and training facilities in order to assure an adequate supply of skilled manpower reserve for this expanded merchant-marine tonnage.

Drafting of skilled seamen into the Armed Forces should cease at once. In the opening years of World War II, many thousands of skilled seamen were drafted into the Armed Forces without regard to the needs of the all-important merchant marine. Such lack of foresight should not be permitted during this emergency.

In connection with manpower training, drafting of seamen, and the many other questions in this phase of emergency mobilization, no planning should be done without the full participation of marine labor and management on the policy-making levels.

The maritime unions feel that no time should be spared in calling together all of the segments of the maritime industry, both in management and labor, for the purpose of getting these plans into active shape.

Any delay in fully mobilizing the all-important sea transportation could prove to be fatal. Therefore, we urgently request immediate adoption of the plans outlined above.

JOSEPH CURRAN,
Chairman, CIO Maritime Committee.

In Defense of States' Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, December 21 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a release from my office entitled "In Defense of States' Rights."

There being no objection, the release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 10, 1950.—United States Senator GEORGE W. MALONE, Republican of Nevada, today charged the Truman administration with completely abandoning the fundamental American principle of States' rights, attempting to take legislative powers away from the State governments, and, in a statement issued from his Washington office, he cited "as evidence to back up the charges the attempt on the part of administration leaders to push through, during the closing hours of the recent session of Congress, legislation which would have had the effect of nullifying State laws."

"In this Republic of States," the Nevada Senator said, "the member States have always made their own laws and enforced them, and the Federal Government has not interfered, and yet, in the conference report on gambling device legislation, administration leaders sought to stop gambling in Nevada through stopping the shipment of gambling paraphernalia across State lines in the absence of special legislation. It would be like stopping racing in California, Florida, New York, or Kentucky, through a bill prohibiting the shipment of race horses across State lines.

"The question of whether or not gambling should be legal was not before the Senate. The question at issue was the right of a State legislature, representing the people of a sovereign State to pass legislation within the framework of the Constitution of the United States without being continually badgered by a Congress which has shifted most of its constitutional responsibilities to the executive branch of the Government. That is the principle I defended on the Senate floor for nearly 12 hours during the closing hours of this session of Congress.

"The Federal Government has continued to encroach upon the States for the past 18 years until, unless soon halted, the governors of the 48 States will shortly become merely a board of directors for a President drunk with power.

"The United States Senate is the last open forum in the world. They have so far resisted the control of the executive branch of the Government. The House, however, is absolutely controlled by the majority party and is no longer an open forum. Thirty seconds to 3 minutes is a long time to let a Congressman talk and the Speaker is not compelled to recognize him.

"The Executive has exerted continual pressure to secure cloture through a floor majority vote in the Senate, but cooler heads recognizing that would mean complete domination of the United States Senate by the executive branch has successfully beat off such attacks and maintained the Senate's independence through requiring two-thirds vote of all of the Members of the Senate—64 actual votes to invoke cloture—shut off debate in the Senate.

"The Constitution established three independent branches of Government—legislative, executive, and the judicial—the public is well informed on what happened to the judicial branch. The executive branch has gradually been absorbed by the Communist tinged group through the Democratic Party, therefore, the independence of the legislative branch must be maintained.

"The United States Senate floor is the only place left where a vital principle can be debated until the public is informed. Cloture should never be invoked except in a national emergency and I am glad to say that through the medium of the Senate, Congress is slowly recovering from the rubber-stamp period."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 15, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following letter from one of my constituents which appeared in the Boston Herald, Boston, Mass., Wednesday, December 13, 1950:

CALLS CRITIC INTOLERANT

To the EDITOR OF THE HERALD:

Thirty years of experience as a newspaperman have made me certain of one thing—it is not what you know, not even whom you know, but largely what you know and do not write that gets you some peace of mind.

In other words, I positively disagree with those who are making so much fuss about the now famous letter of President Truman to that Washington music critic. I mean that, in my considered opinion, the critic—and his editor—are to be censured or pitied for their lack of consideration, of foresight, and of ethics in a profession which I am proud to claim.

Would less harm not have been done had Mr. Critic been "charitable" and not even submitted his "treasured museum piece"? What good to anyone has the publication of (to me understandable) "peave" on the part of our Chief Executive done? If that isn't giving aid and comfort to the enemy, I miss my guess.

Tolerance, I say, is a worthy ideal—but those who know better, seem to me intolerant.

JACK TEPPER.

Reasons for the Immediate Construction of Fast Cargo and Passenger Ships

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WARREN G. MAGNUSON
OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, December 21 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a memorandum setting forth the reasons, as written by myself, why the Government should authorize the immediate construction of fleet cargo ships and other ships.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM

The following are reasons why the Government should authorize immediate construction of fast cargo ships and passenger ships now under consideration in Washington: National defense is the only consideration underlying all of these reasons.

1. Present deficiency in certain types of ships:

(a) Our dry-cargo fleet consists principally of Liberty ships and, to a much smaller extent, Victorys and so-called long-range cargo ships. Libertys make up far and away the bulk of the total of 11-knot ships which, in time of war, can be used only in convoys whose speed is somewhat less than that. The balance of the fleet is made up of ships whose sea speed by and large does not exceed 15 knots. There is serious question from a military standpoint whether convoys can be used successfully in major war. Current military thinking is that safety lies in dispersal rather than concentration. Dispersal means that a ship must be able to run it alone and to do this the only adequate defense is speed of about 20 knots in view of the current development of the submarine. We have no 20-knot cargo ships. The Maritime Administration has seen the need of providing cargo ships of that speed and has already had plans for such a ship developed. The matter now rests squarely with Congress to permit funds, already appropriated to the Maritime Administration, to be used for this purpose.

(b) Fast passenger ships: We have today only about one-third of the number of passenger ships we had prewar with less than half the carrying capacity. Our deficiency in potential troop-carrying tonnage is too well known to require elaboration. Everyone seems to agree that that is so yet, in 5 years since the end of the war, we have begun only six passenger ships in this country. These ships are large and complicated and require a long time to build. We cannot wait for a major conflict to be upon us if we hope to overcome this serious deficiency that could easily jeopardize our capacity to wage war abroad.

2. Preservation of shipbuilding skills: There is presently so little work ahead for American shipyards there is real question as to the ability of the industry to maintain a nucleus of shipbuilding skills and design and engineering capacity necessary to carry on a wartime shipbuilding program. The industry is in far worse condition today than it was prior to World War II. At the present time there is a heavy exodus of skilled shipyard labor going into other industries with every likelihood that the greater part of this labor will be forever lost to American shipyards. It is as important to keep in peacetime a healthy shipbuilding industry as it is to train in peacetime the Army, Navy, and Air Force.

3. Help from others: Much has been said in high places about the great reliance we can place on our maritime allies for ships and shipping in time of war. How much real reliance we can place on them, when the chips are down, is indicated by the kind of help we are getting today in Korea. Not one Allied shipyard outside of the United States is beyond easy attacking range of Red-held territory. In the last war the shipyards of the United States had to carry almost 100 percent of the load of both building and repairing. There is nothing in the prospects of world war III to lead one to conclude that there would be any difference in that respect.

If the shipyards of this country are expected to carry the load for all the allies, the Government should have some interest in seeing that there will be, when the time comes, an available industry. Building the ships now contemplated by the Maritime Administration will help make this possible.

Issues in the Connecticut Election

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM BENTON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, December 21 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert a remarkable letter in the Appendix of the RECORD. It was written by Dr. Paul Rosahn, of 92 Grand Street, New Britain, Conn.

I say it is a remarkable letter because Dr. Rosahn underscores a basic problem of the democratic process when he points out that many members of the medical profession in Connecticut were asked to vote against a candidate on the basis of a single issue when by far the most important issue was not socialized medicine but which candidate was best qualified to work for the peace Americans seek.

It is my belief that Dr. Rosahn has sound advice for the leadership of such special groups, applying, as it does, to everyone with a stake in our democratic Government and a stake in world peace. However, Dr. Rosahn's own actions are a fine example that men vote as they please regardless of how their leaders seek to guide them.

I might add here that in a letter to constituents I stated my unequivocal opposition to socialized medicine.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

NEW BRITAIN, CONN., November 6, 1950.
Hon. WILLIAM BENTON,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR BENTON: I have received this day your letter of October 30, together with enclosures including a copy of your letter to Dr. Feeney under date of September 8.

This is the eve of election day, and no man knows what tomorrow's results may bring. But I should like to assure you, regardless of the outcome, that I am personally loyal to you and your program. I view with deep concern the policy of rejecting candidates solely on their attitude toward a single issue, in this instance the problem of supply not adequate, but the best possible medical care to the most people at a cost which they can meet. This is a serious and urgent problem, and many different answers by good minds have been given to it. But it is not the only problem, nor at the moment is it the most immediate. Of far greater importance is the issue of peace, for without peace, no medical plan, however ingenious, can function.

It is ironic that with the world on the brink of disaster, members of the healing professions should be primarily concerned not with curing the world of its ills, but with maintaining traditional methods of practice.

It is because of your stand on the important issues of peace and democracy that I endorse you, Mr. BENTON, and hope for your success tomorrow. Whether you are for or against so-called socialized medicine matters little in the face of these larger issues.

Yours respectfully,
PAUL D. ROSAHN.

In Defense of Installment Buying

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, December 21 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a release from my office on the subject Defense of Installment Buying.

There being no objection, the release was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 3, 1950.—United States Senator GEORGE W. MALONE (Republican, Nevada), today charged President Truman and the Democratic administration with turning their back on the low-income and middle-income American families and he offered as evidence the new credit curb on installment buying.

In a statement issued by his Washington office, Senator MALONE said:

"Who is hurt by Mr. Truman's curb on installment buying? Certainly not the wealthy families. They do not need to buy things on the installment plan. The installment buying plan has been a great blessing to the low-income and middle-income families. It accounts to a great extent for the high standard of living in America, because it brings into the modest homes from coast to coast the things which make better living.

"Had Mr. Truman and his planners had their way in the earlier years of American economy and free enterprise, America today would resemble those miserable European countries where installment buying and other economic advantages are unheard of.

"The President says he must curb the buying power of American families. One of the reasons given for boosting the already high Federal income taxes, you will recall, to 'siphon off' the rise in wages, was to curb buying power and to prevent inflation—raising wages is only another indirect source for increased Federal taxes. I do not think the American people will continue to stand for this kind of subterfuge and interference with their life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness.

"Mr. Truman has pretended to be the friend of the American worker, but his credit curb on the middle-income group which he has invoked is as bad a stab in the back as the American worker could possibly receive, and it is absolutely unnecessary. Don't let any of the socialist minded monetary and credit manipulators tell you the war emergency requires this outrageous step against the people. Other steps can be taken which would make this unnecessary. It has no basis whatsoever in sound national economy.

"The simple fact is the war situation is being used as an excuse for this and other steps toward peacetime regimentation and national socialism. It is part of the softening-up process to get us to accept true socialism, which objective is the same as communism, government ownership of property. We have observed the encroachment of socialism, step by step, in our lives but I believe that such affronts as this, to the low-income and middle-income American families, will cause the people to awaken to the danger before it is too late."

Survival Under Atomic Attack

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 21, 1950

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include information contained in a publication of the National Security Resources Board of importance to the American people.

The theme of the publication is Survival Under Atomic Attack. As the pamphlet states, we can live through an atomic attack if the people know the bomb's true dangers and know the steps you can take to escape them. It is for this reason that I insert this material in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

What I believe to be very important excerpts from the pamphlet follow:

YOU CAN SURVIVE

You can live through an atom bomb raid and you won't have to have a Geiger counter, protective clothing, or special training in order to do it.

The secrets of survival are: Know the bomb's true dangers; know the steps you can take to escape them.

Atom-splitting is just another way of causing an explosion. To begin with, you must realize that atom-splitting is just another way of causing an explosion. While an atom bomb holds more death and destruction than man has ever before wrapped in a single package, its total power is definitely limited. Not even hydrogen bombs could blow the earth apart or kill us all by mysterious radiation.

Your chances of surviving an atomic attack are better than you may have thought. Because the power of all bombs is limited, your chances of living through an atomic attack are much better than you may have thought. In the city of Hiroshima, slightly over half the people who were a mile from the atomic explosion are still alive. At Nagasaki, almost 70 percent of the people a mile from the bomb lived to tell their experiences. Today thousands of survivors of these two atomic attacks live in new houses built right where their old ones once stood. The war may have changed their way of life, but they are not riddled with cancer. Their children are normal. Those who were temporarily unable to have children because of the radiation now are having children again.

WHAT ARE YOUR CHANCES?

Close to the explosion, your chances are only 1 out of 10. If a modern A-bomb exploded without warning in the air over your home town tonight, your calculated chances of living through the raid would run something like this ("modern" atomic bombs, as used in this booklet, refers to the "nominal" bomb described in the Effects of Atomic Weapons, published in June 1950 by the Atomic Energy Commission):

Should you happen to be one of the unlucky people right under the bomb, there is practically no hope of living through it. In fact, anywhere within one-half mile of the center of explosion, your chances of escaping are about 1 out of 10.

On the other hand, and this is the important point, from one-half to 1 mile away, you have a 50-50 chance.

Beyond a half mile, your chances of surviving increase rapidly. From 1 to 1½ miles out, the odds that you will be killed are only 15 in 100.

And at points from 1½ to 2 miles away, deaths drop all the way down to only 2 or 3 out of each 100.

Beyond 2 miles, the explosion will cause practically no deaths at all.

Injury by radioactivity does not necessarily mean you are doomed to die or be crippled. Naturally, your chances of being injured are far greater than your chances of being killed. But even injury by radioactivity does not mean that you will be left a cripple, or doomed to die an early death. Your chances of making a complete recovery are much the same as for everyday accidents. These estimates hold good for modern atomic bombs exploded without warning.

KILL THE MYTHS—ATOMIC WEAPONS WILL NOT DESTROY THE EARTH

Atomic bombs hold more death and destruction than man ever before has wrapped up in a single package, but their over-all power has very definite limits. Not even hydrogen bombs will blow the earth apart or kill us all by radioactivity.

DOUBLING BOMB POWER DOES NOT DOUBLE DESTRUCTION

Modern A-bombs can cause heavy damage 2 miles away, but doubling their power would extend that range only to 2½ miles. To stretch the damage range from 2 to 4 miles would require a weapon more than eight times the rated power of present models.

RADIOACTIVITY IS NOT THE BOMB'S GREATEST THREAT

In most atom raids, blast and heat are by far the greatest dangers that people must face. Radioactivity alone would account for only a small percentage of all human deaths and injuries, except in underground or underwater explosions.

RADIATION SICKNESS IS NOT ALWAYS FATAL

In small amounts, radioactivity seldom is harmful. Even when serious radiation sickness follows a heavy dosage, there is still a good chance for recovery.

SIX SURVIVAL SECRETS FOR ATOMIC ATTACKS

Always put first things first and—

1. Try to get shielded. If you have time, get down in a basement or subway. Should you unexpectedly be caught out of doors, seek shelter alongside a building, or jump in any handy ditch or gutter.

2. Drop flat on ground or floor. To keep from being tossed about and to lessen the chances of being struck by falling and flying objects, flatten out at the base of a wall, or at the bottom of a bank.

3. Bury your face in your arms. When you drop flat, hide your eyes in the crook of your elbow. That will protect your face from flash burns, prevent temporary blindness, and keep flying objects out of your eyes.

Never lose your head—

4. Don't rush outside right after a bombing. After an air burst, wait a few minutes, then go to help fight fires. After other kinds of bursts wait at least 1 hour to give lingering radiation some chance to die down.

5. Don't take chances with food or water in open containers. To prevent radioactive poisoning or disease, select your food and water with care. When there is reason to believe they may be contaminated, stick to canned and bottled things if possible.

6. Don't start rumors. In the confusion that follows a bombing, a single rumor might touch off a panic that could cost your life.

FIVE KEYS TO HOUSEHOLD SAFETY

1. Strive for fireproof housekeeping. Don't let trash pile up, and keep waste paper in covered containers. When an alert sounds, do all you can to eliminate sparks by shutting off the oil burner and covering all open flames.

2. Known your own home. Know which is the safest part of your cellar, learn how to turn off your oil burner and what to do about utilities.

3. Have emergency equipment and supplies handy. Always have a good flashlight, a radio, first-aid equipment, and a supply of canned goods in the house.

4. Close all windows and doors and draw the blinds. If you have time when an alert sounds, close the house up tight in order to keep out fire sparks and radioactive dusts and to lessen the chances of being cut by flying glass. Keep the house closed until all danger is past.

5. Use the telephone only for true emergencies. Do not use the phone unless absolutely necessary. Leave the lines open for real emergency traffic.

Electric Industry Can Meet Essential War and Civilian Needs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 21, 1950

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following letter and statement:

PENNSYLVANIA POWER & LIGHT CO.,
Allentown, Pa., August 25, 1950.

Hon. DANIEL J. FLOOD,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: A few days ago Mr. L. W. Heath, of this company, called on you in Washington and pointed out the fact that the electric utility industry in general and our company, in the area we serve, have adequate electric power capacity to carry any demands which industry will place on us in the future which may arise from the military program. He emphasized, particularly, the very large construction program which we have under way and pointed out the necessity for channeling materials and supplies for power plants and transmission lines to keep our construction program on schedule.

There is no doubt about it that the crux of maintaining industrial output is one of man power and not of electrical power. We have prepared a study on this subject which ties the two problems of power supply and man power together. It is enclosed, and I do hope that you will take the opportunity to study it carefully as it is a complete answer to the question of adequacy of electric power supply now or for any future military program which may be devised.

Sincerely,

CHAS. E. OAKES,
President.

MEMORANDUM: ELECTRIC INDUSTRY CAN MEET ESSENTIAL WAR AND CIVILIAN NEEDS

Electric power will be available to meet all military and civilian needs in the event of a full-scale war. On VJ-day the total power producing capability of the electric industry amounted to 50,000,000 kilowatts. By the end of 1950 it will reach 72,000,000 kilowatts. The expansion program of the industry now in high gear will bring the total capability to around 93,000,000 kilowatts at the end of 1953—an 86 percent increase since VJ-day.

The country has industrial productive machinery capable of providing a substantial increase in war and civilian products. Increased industrial production can be brought about through more hours use of existing industrial machines and equipment. This will be done by absorbing in industry all of the available unemployed civilian labor force of 3,100,000 as well as lengthening the workweek. If still further increases in the military requirements are necessary, cutbacks of civilian production, as was done in World War II, will provide the necessary man-hours.

Stepping up the industrial effort in this manner by more hours of use of existing industrial machines, will simply require more hours of use of existing electric power producing equipment. Estimates indicate that, with complete absorption of those now unemployed and an extended workweek, longer hour use of existing electric generating plants can provide all of the additional power needed—about 45,000,000,000 of kilowatt-hours on a yearly basis and around 35 percent above industry's present record high level operation of 131,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours per year.

The following sets forth the above facts in some detail:

The latest reports (April 1950) show that industry is now purchasing monthly electric power amounting to 10,900,000,000 of kilowatt-hours.

At the same time the number of people employed in manufacturing, mining, and construction totals 17,500,000, while the number of unemployed totals 3,100,000.

The productive output of industry can be greatly increased by—

1. The absorption of those now unemployed into the industrial force by going to two- and three-shift operation at the present average of 39½ hours worked per week which would increase industry's monthly electric-power consumption to 12,200,000,000 kilowatt-hours.

2. An increase in the hours worked per week from the present average of 39½ to 45½, the maximum reached in World War II, which would further increase industry's power use to 14,700,000,000 kilowatt-hours.

Thus, with a present productive effort using 10,900,000,000 kilowatt-hours monthly, production can be stepped-up by more hours use of the existing industrial plant with a monthly use of 14,700,000,000 kilowatt-hours, in turn obtained by more hours use of existing generating capacity, or an increase for war purposes of 3,800,000,000 kilowatt-hours.

A partial war effort utilizing 15 percent of the present industrial effort would entail an addition of only 1,600,000,000 kilowatt-hours.

Therefore, not only can industry's electric-power requirements for a 15-percent partial war effort be adequately met but a very substantial enlargement for war production can be readily taken care of and at the same time the present level for civilian needs be maintained.

Since the present manufacturing capacity of industry can absorb the present idle labor force, new war production plant construction would probably be limited largely to plants needed to produce new kinds of war materials for which existing plants are not adaptable, or for which no manufacturing capacity is available. The additional electric capacity required in such cases appears to be small when compared to the very substantial electrical capacity additions planned.

The record shows the development of a pattern, such as is indicated above, during World War II when electric power was never too little nor too late. At that time industry was in a more favorable position to expand production than now, as there was a much larger number of unemployed, some 8,000,000, compared to the slightly more than 3,000,000 at present. Expanded employment during World War II reached a peak of 20,000,000 in the manufacturing, mining, and construction industries and reduced the prewar total of some 8,000,000 unemployed to 670,000. As need for increased productive efforts arose, the hours worked per week were raised. This was accompanied by a rise in the electric power supplied for industrial use from around 5,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours monthly to 9,500,000,000—an increase of about 4,500,000,000. All-out war efforts brought about a total war load of 6,500,000,000 kilowatt-hours, the additional 2,000,000,000 monthly coming through cut-backs in civilian goods .

The presently planned capacity additions are sufficent to meet growth in civilian use with adequate reserves and will cover any increase that might result from stepped-up military needs.

This year the electric reserves of surplus generating capacity total 9,500,000 kilowatts. They can, if necessary, generate more than 55,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours a year. This is in adition to the 45,000,000,000 of kilowatt-hours mentioned above—a total of 100,000,000,000 above the 131,000,000,000 present industrial use.

The electric power industry is continuing to move ahead, to build and construct, and will build as fast or faster than any other industry may build to increase production. The country can definitely depend upon the electric power industry for all power capacity needed, provided no unreasonable limitations are imposed which would prevent completion of the construction program now well under way.

In P. P. & L. Co.'s service area sufficient electric power will be available for military and civilian purposes. The company has at present more than 800,000 kilowatts available to meet the needs of home, farm and factory. This will be increased to 900,000 kilowatts in 1951 and to over 1,000,000 kilowatts by 1953. Such substantial capacity additions will make it possible to take care of customers' peak loads one-third more than present loads and still maintain sufficient protective capacity reserves.

It seems plain that the problem of increasing the Nation's productive effort is one of manpower—not one of electric power.

Marshall Plan Benefits

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 21, 1950

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include herewith an editorial taken from the League Reporter of December 18, 1950:

MARSHALL PLAN BENEFITS

When those who criticize every act of the administration take pot shots at the Marshall plan for aiding our European allies by calling it a "giveaway" program, or "operation rat hole," remember this:

1. Production and trade are higher in Europe than before the war.

2. The Communists have lost a lot of ground there—including valuable footholds in trade unions.

3. We have won one crisis after another in Berlin against the Reds.

4. The Communists were run out of Greece. Red guerrillas once held more territory there there than did all other groups combined.

5. Democracy has replaced dictatorship in Turkey.

6. The people of Europe are in a better position to organize for new efforts to resist the cancer of communism.

If the United States had not undertaken the great aid program formed by General Marshall and Secretary Acheson it is probable that all of Europe now would be under the complete domination of Russian imperialism.

Positive Approach to Foreign Policy: Summary of Senate Address

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, December 21 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a release from my office entitled "Positive Approach to Foreign Policy: Summary of Senate Address."

There being no objection, the release was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

United States Senator GEORGE W. MALONE, Republican, of Nevada, in a major address today on the floor of the Senate, submitted a 9-point program which he said was a positive approach to our present serious problem.

Senator MALONE said that we have "the ability to win," but that we must stop pussyfooting and decide on a program of policy.

The Nevada Senator criticized the lack of definite policy on the part of the administration and accused State Department officials of carrying the ball for Communist conspirators. He reviewed what he termed the errors which led to the war situation, and said that we are not going to straighten out a deplorable situation by trying to ignore it.

"Strangely enough, our taxpayers, the fathers and mothers of boys fighting in Korea, have financed the equipment and guns used against their boys by the Communists—as these Communists have been supplied with war-making materials by countries receiving our taxpayers' money through the ECA or so-called Marshall plan," Senator MALONE said.

Senator MALONE said that paradoxically the outlook is more hopeful at this time of crisis than in the past because "the people are at last awakening to their peril, are becoming aware of its causes, and are ready to do something about it."

The things which Senator MALONE said we should do, and can do, at once are:

(1) Clean the Communist asrociates and sympathizers out of our own Government; (2) require France and England to cancel their separate nonaggression pacts with Russia and their trade pacts with Russia and iron curtain countries; (3) stop supporting colonial slavery in any form; (4) oppose the recognition of Communist China by the United Nations with every means at our command; (5) do one of three things about the war in Asia: (a) Arm and equip Chiang Kai-shek's Nationalists and invite them to join us, supplying the foot-soldier power under our direction while we use our air power to destroy the Chinese Communists' means of making war, or (b) arm and equip the Nationalist army and guerrillas and let them do the job, over a necessarily longer period of time, or (c) if neither of these two alternatives are to be followed, then abandon the entire Korean and Chinese areas; (6) build a military force, spearheaded by adequate submarine fleet and Air Corps, and install radar equipment to protect the Western Hemisphere; (7) serve notice on Russia that any move on Europe will be met with aerial attack on their means of making war; (8) protect and strengthen our national economy, and (9) give no more funds to foreign nations as gifts and limit loans within our means to private business in strategic areas on RFC conditions only.

The Role of Central Banking

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LISTER HILL
OF ALABAMA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, December 18 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address on the subject The Role of Central Banking in Our Free Enterprise Society, delivered by Thomas B. McCabe, Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, at the Alabama dinner of the American Newcomen Society, Birmingham, Ala., December 12, 1950.

I am informed by the Public Printer that the cost of printing the address in the Appendix of the RECORD will be approximately $246.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

THE ROLE OF CENTRAL BANKING IN OUR FREE ENTERPRISE SOCIETY

I am here tonight to pay off two of your beloved townsmen—Ed Norton and Thad Holt. I still think it was a miracle that we were able to get Ed Norton to serve on the board of governors. I doubt that it would have been possible without the efforts of Thad Holt. In return for his support of the cause, I had to promise to speak before the Birmingham Kiwanis Club of which Thad is president. As for Ed, before he would take the oath of office, I had to promise him I would accept your invitation for tonight. On a strictly horse-trading basis I am convinced I outtraded them both.

Ed's friends here overwhelmed him with a barrage of glowing press notices at the time of his appointment. I am happy to say from close association with him over the past 3 months that he has more than lived up to your and to my highest expectations.

It is a great honor and privilege to meet again with my friends in Newcomen, and especially here in this delightful setting. The gracious hospitality of your Alabama committee is matched by the heart-warming fellowship which always permeates the inspirational atmosphere of a Newcomen meeting.

It is always a treat for me to have an excuse to come to this part of the country. My admiration for the spirit and rich tradition of the South was nurtured by my early boyhood in Virginia and later on the Eastern Shore. It blossomed into full flower as I spent long periods traveling through all parts of the country as a sales manager and more recently in developing some woodpulp properties in the neighboring State of Georgia.

Believe me, I have an intimate and personal first-hand knowledge of the progress, growth, and future of this highly important part of our great land. Were I ever to lapse in knowledge or accuracy of the facts, I can assure you that Ed Norton would never let me forget it.

As a Newcomen member myself, I harbor a deep and devoted respect for the record of this organization in adding to the common appreciation of the finest in American and British tradition It has sought earnestly and diligently to set forth an objective and nonpartisan analysis of the basic elements—both human and mechanical—that have added to the progress of mankind. Its efforts to knit more closely the friendly ties uniting Great Britain and the United States have found rich reward through the years. Today these two countries are a part of the bulwark in the vital defense line against further encroachment on the freedom-loving peoples of the world. The preservation of all that we hold dear depends largely upon the strength, stamina, and moral courage of our allies and the wisdom, foresight, and initiative of our leaders. I am sure the conferences last week between our President and the British Prime Minister were conducted with the same good will and objectives of this Society.

The tradition of the Newcomen Society is to study the framework of modern society against the lessons of the past. I will adhere to that tradition and confine myself as much as possible to your long-established custom by showing how the lessons of history apply to the subject which I would like to discuss with you tonight.

In the present crisis, two great questions are of supreme importance to our people at home and to adherents of human freedom throughout the world. The first is, How can we build up our defenses to meet the threat of world aggression by the Communist forces? The second is, How can we maintain the value of the American dollar? You can't have a defense program without a sound dollar. I am convinced that you can't have anything that approaches a peaceful world without a sound dollar. Since I am not qualified to discuss the military problems, I want to confine our attention to the second of these important questions which is so much in the center of every citizen's attention these days. I want to show you what the role of a central bank like the Federal Reserve is in the preservation of a sound dollar.

Since the Federal Reserve System has the statutory responsibility of regulating the volume, cost, and availability of money and credit, it is of paramount importance that all of us have a clear understanding of its history, purpose, and its present objectives.

The role of the central bank in this country and in fact other countries of the world has often been a mysterious one. The Old Lady of Threadneedle Street was never fully understood—what lady is?—but for generations the Bank of England has commanded the admiration and respect of the English speaking peoples of the world. I welcome the opportunity to talk to a thoughtful and public-spirited audience like this on this subject, which I feel you want to understand and which is so vital to the preservation of our kind of a free-enterprise capitalistic economy.

Now, first, of all, what do central banks do? You are all familiar with regular housekeeping functions we perform: Supplying coins and currency, check clearing, transferring funds from one section of the country to another, serving as fiscal agents in the distribution of savings bonds and other responsibilities of this general nature. I have in mind, however, the more basic things a central bank does that bear directly upon the functioning, and therefore the future, of the private enterprise system.

All economic societies, except the most primitive, have some form of money. Through a succession of painful and costly experiences society has learned that in a complex and highly organized system centered around personal enterprise and initiative, money does not manage itself.

The flow of money from hand to hand reflects the decision of millions of producers and consumers. But the uninhibited operation of money systems in the past created great problems for those who lived and did business under them. In the days when coins constituted the money supply, heads of state were not above clipping away part of a coin to recapture funds for the royal treasury. After the use of currency became prevalent, differences in the size and value of a great variety of notes circulated by numerous issuing agencies were a source not only of inconvenience but of heavy losses when holders were unable to redeem their notes. All of you are familiar with the old phrase—"not worth a continental." Some of your forefathers had to struggle with an almost worthless currency.

Today our money supply consists only partly of coins and currency and primarily of checkable bank deposits which arise largely from advances of credit. The supply of money, mostly bank deposits, is therefore a far more flexible and volatile factor in our present economy than in earlier periods of history. Under those conditions, we sometimes have too little or too much money in relation to the needs of the economy. Let's be concrete and see what happens if the mixture gets too rich—if we get too much money or credit in the business stream. As the supply of money expands, people are able to buy more, demand increases. "That is good," you say. "Just what we want."

But suppose, as is the case today, the economy is already bursting at the seams. Full employment is reached. In view of the ever-increasing military demands production for civilian consumption cannot be increased although money incomes continue to expand. So the natural consequence is for prices to rise as too many dollars bid for too few goods. Thus, the value of the dollar goes down. Of course, it can work the other way, too. If the supply of money becomes too small or cannot expand in relation to the supply of goods, prices fall as too many goods complete for too few dollars. The result may well be widespread unemployment.

Under a system of private enterprise in normal peacetime conditions, we count on the marketplace to determine what goods are produced. Ordinarily no Government authority dictates the allocation and use of resources. Our production expands or contracts in particular lines of activity in response to signals given by a free market. If the price situation looks right we go ahead; if it looks unfavorable we hold back, or shift into other lines.

Now we have already seen that changes in the supply of money and credit have a direct relationship to prices. Therefore, if money is to have stable value and thus contribute to stability and the steady progress of the economy, the supply of money and credit must be kept in proper relation to the flow of goods.

Central banks then have this primary and challenging responsibility—to influence monetary and credit developments so as to assist in promoting economic stability. I use the word "assist" advisedly, because you realize that other governmental policies such as fiscal policies have an important influence on economic stability. Private enterprise must be able to operate in an economic climate that is as free as possible from the distortions of an unstable monetary system. Only then is there an opportunity for individual businesses—large or small—to go forward with confidence in the spirit of dynamic and adventuresome enterprise. This competitive spirit has made our productive machine the envy of every people of the world and our standard of living beyond any measure of comparison.

The charge upon central banks is a heavy one and it is well worth our taking the time tonight to survey some of the traditions of Anglo-Saxon central banking that are now reflected in the Federal Reserve System.

To understand the why and how of central banks, it is first essential to understand the double-edged character of the most normal commercial bank activity—that of lending money. It is easy to overlook the prime importance of the fact that at the same time banks increase their loans, they are actually creating additional money.

No one who believes in the system of private enterprise would want—except under unusual circumstances—to turn over to a public institution the crucial function of choosing among private business borrowers. The commercial bank in making these choices is helping to determine the business and community leadership of tomorrow. This is a little discussed but most important function of commercial banking. It is a primary justification for a private independent commercial banking system.

On the other hand, the creation (or destruction) of money is fraught with such possibilities for evil, as well as good, that the public interest is acutely involved. The development of central banking tradition reflects the gradual acceptance of the idea that regulation of the money supply must be attuned to, but independent of, the private commercial banking structure. The establishment of a central bank, then, leaves to individual commercial banks, privately owned and privately operated, the responsibility for selecting which of their customers shall be financed out of the total money available for lending by the entire banking system. It leaves to the central bank the responsibility for at least partially determining what that total amount shall be.

While I do not intend to discuss in any detail the techniques of central bank operations, it is important to keep in mind the fact that a central bank functions largely through organized markets in the traditional sense. Its primary tools involve the buying and selling of Government securities—open market operations—and variations in discount rates. More recently there has been added the instrument of changes in reserve requirements. These tools are purely impersonal means of affecting the over-all availability and cost of credit. By affecting the supply of credit under a system of credit money, a central bank also influences the total amount of money in the economy. The mechanism works this way: Tighter availability and higher cost of credit checks the expansion of the supply of money in relation to the output of goods; easier availability and lower cost of credit accelerates monetary expansion in relation to the output of goods.

In very recent times and partly because of special circumstances associated with war and national defense financing, the Federal Reserve System has had added to its tools certain instruments known as selective credit controls. The Federal Reserve System's regulation W, relating to consumer installment credit, and its regulation X, relating to mortgage credit, are examples of these tools. The System's regulation of margin requirements on loans to buy or carry listed stocks is another example. Instruments of this type affect credit conditions by setting terms for the extension of credit. These regulatory terms bear upon demand and not upon supply. Selective tools can be made to apply only to a narrowly defined credit area. They are therefore not general. Hence, the description "selective" tools. They are in no sense a substitute for the general tools of the central bank. They merely reinforce them.

Historically, in country after country, it has been difficult to decide just how a central bank should be organized and what relation it should have to Government and to private enterprise. The combination of public responsibilities and private functions complicates the problem. Until relatively recently central banks have commonly operated under special charters from their governments as privately owned institutions. I understand that George Washington, for one, owned shares of the Bank of England during the Revolutionary War, and when the war was over collected his accumulated dividends. Today the shares of the Bank of England are all owned by the government. While private ownership has had the advantage of insuring relative freedom from political influences, it has been difficult to avoid the charge that national monetary and credit policy was being determined primarily for the benefit of the private banks rather than in the public interest.

Many governments have made their central banks wholly public owned, either by initially setting them up in this way, or by buying up privately held shares. In this way the emphasis is more directly on the public character of their responsibilities. Even in such instances, however, the central banks have usually continued to function as semiindependent organizations.

The great size and diversity of the United States and of its economy has led to the establishment of 12 separate Federal Reserve banks, which are partly autonomous but are placed under the general supervision of the Board of Governors, appointed by the President for long terms of 14 years each, and responsible to Congress. The Federal Reserve banks carry on the operations ordinarily performed by central banks while general policy decisions, which in most countries are also made by central banks, are vested largely with the Board of Governors and with the Federal Open Market Committee. This latter group is established by statute and provides for the rotating representation of five Federal Reserve banks by their presidents. The Federal Reserve System receives its authority from the Congress and is responsible to it.

Whatever its form of organization, a central bank obviously must be a public institution. Its power must be used in the public interest, and only in the public interest. It must steer a true course between the private financial community on the one hand and the Government on the other.

In the early days some of the supporters of the Federal Reserve System referred to it as the Supreme Court of Finance. This comparison was not strictly accurate, but it did convey the idea of the founders that the Federal Reserve should be independent of both political and private financial interests.

From the very outset attempts to organize a central bank in the United States faced one great hurdle—a healthy distrust of any centralization of power. Failure to renew the charters of the First and Second Banks of the United States can largely be explained on this ground: As federally chartered but privately managed banks, they were suspect because the management was entirely in private hands. Further, there was a general feeling that neither bank represented adequately the frontier interests.

In his famous Report on a National Bank, Alexander Hamilton, who fathered the First Bank of the United States, said: "To attach full confidence to an institution of this nature, it appears to be an essential ingredient in its structure that it shall be under a private, not a public, direction—under guidance of individual interest, not of public policy." History has shown the weakness of this thesis. The First and Second Banks of the United States were both organized on the basis of dominant private ownership and control.

Andrew Jackson's successful fight to prevent a renewal of the charter of the Second Bank of the United States was largely based on opposition to private control. The result of this controversy was to deprive the country of the advantages of a central banking system for nearly 80 years. In the meantime, however, the basic problems of regulating money and credit remained unsolved. The next step—some 25 years after the lapse of the second charter—was to establish the National Banking System. From the standpoint of our discussion, the significant thing about the National Bank Act was that it provided for the regulation of the issuance of bank notes by requiring the deposit of substantial security.

This again failed to solve the problem of adequate monetary control for two principal reasons. First, because checks on deposit became a more important type of currency. While sharp restrictions were put on the issuance of bank notes, the power of the banks to expand check currency was left uncontrolled. Second, repeated experience with money panics subsequently showed that there was such a thing as too little currency, as well as too much, and that there had to be means of expanding the money supply in response to the needs of a rapidly growing country. A succession of money panics near the turn of the century focused public attention on money and credit problems. The panic of 1893 provided the initial stimulus and the panic of 1907 furnished the final push necessary for the appointment of a National Monetary Commission. This body made the most thorough study of monetary and banking systems throughout the world that has ever been made. It submitted recommendations for remedying the defects which were revealed in our system.

The passage of the Federal Reserve Act in 1913 created a system which was unique in the history of central banking. First of all, that act clearly established central banking as a most vital and essential public function in this country. Further, in keeping with the traditional status of such banks, it provided that the Federal Reserve should have an independent status in the Government structure reporting directly to the Congress. This is in accord with the philosophies of checks and balances inherent in our Constitution. Finally, conscious of the danger of rigidity and remoteness in a highly centralized authority, the framers of the act provided for an efficient and effective combination of public and private management. The Federal Reserve System today consists of a Board of Governors which operates through a decentralized network of regional banks and branches in intimate contact with every commercial area in the country.

I repeat what I have said many times that I am thoroughly convinced that the authors of the Federal Reserve Act gave us a monumental piece of legislation—a system tailormade for the economic expansion of our country. The System might be compared to a great pyramid with its base in the grass roots of our economy, and its apex in the Board of Governors. The breadth and strength of the pyramid are in its base, with the member banks and the Reserve banks as elevations in the slope toward the top.

I am more convinced than ever of the truth of that statement. For more than 10 years I served on the board of the Philadelphia Federal Reserve Bank, and for almost 3 years more I have served with the Board of Governors in Washington. It has been a great experience to observe the intricate workings of our credit and monetary machine and to view its relationship to the national economy.

I have seen the System adapt itself flexibly to changing economic conditions. I have benefitted by the decentralized organization with its 12 banks, 24 branches, and more than 250 directors who constitute a representative cross-section of the finest our free enterprise system can offer.

Most of you are familiar too with the highly valuable research services of the Federal Reserve, not only the regular services but special studies of regional developments such as those prepared by the staff of the Atlanta bank with the help of the branch offices. I have, as I hope you do, a wholesome respect for the highly professional work of the research organizations of the banks and our Washington staff. The end product of their efforts has established a new level of professional competence in this field. These men have an uncanny understanding of current problems and they have supplied constructive suggestions for future courses of action. In fact, this exceptionally high level of professional competence extends throughout the System's official and staff personnel.

It would be impossible for me here to give proper credit to all those who have had a prominent part in the establishment of the Federal Reserve System. But I would be greatly remiss if I did not note that the lion's share of the credit must go to two Southerners—Woodrow Wilson and Carter Glass. They understood clearly two fundamental propositions:

First, that unless some way was found to regulate effectively the supply of money and credit we were running the risk of destroying the very foundations of the free enterprise system which, in so many of its aspects, embodies a Jeffersonian insistence on the rights of individuals against the encroachments of an all powerful state.

Second, that a Jeffersonian distrust of the centralization of financial power can be met by the recognition of central banking as a public function subject to public control.

To say that central banking must be regarded as a public function subject to public control is another way of saying that a central bank cannot regard itself as immune to the will of the people. This raises a fundamental question which has plagued central bank authorities from the very beginning. In a democracy such as ours we generally think of the will of the people as being reflected through duly elected Members of the Congress and through the executive branch of government. What then should be the relation of a central bank to other public authorities in a democracy determined to preserve the private enterprise system? How are we to reconcile the necessity for public control and yet avoid the danger of domination?

This general question, in its broadest terms, was exactly the question that the liberty-loving founders of our Nation put to themselves when they established our system of government. For example, the architects of that system recognized the public character of the administration of justice. That did not prevent them, however, from setting up a system of courts organized independently of the executive and the Department of Justice.

The Federal Reserve System itself is an example of this conception of public control in relation to other branches of government. The Federal Reserve System was created by Congress. There is not the slightest doubt that it could likewise be destroyed by Congress, or that it would be destroyed or radically altered if it pursued policies against the public interest, as interpreted by the people's elected representatives. But the point I wish particularly to emphasize is that the Congress deliberately sought to insulate the Federal Reserve from predatory and political pressures. It did so because it recognized that there may well be divergent views as to what is, and what is not, in the public interest. It did so, I believe, because of the importance it attached to the responsibility of maintaining economic stability.

Not only is the Federal Reserve System unique in its combination of a public and private form of organization, but it has a unique relationship with the other agencies of Government. Every agency of Government has statutory responsibilities to carry out. Many of their operations inevitably affect the supply of money and credit. Among the agencies that have credit programs and policies affecting this picture are the RFC, the Housing and Home Finance Agency, the Department of Agriculture, and the various international agencies.

It is only natural that the Federal Reserve with its responsibilities in this field should affect, and be affected by, the actions of these other agencies. That is why it is so important that we strive to attain a higher degree of integration and coordination of all governmental policies which ultimately affect the monetary and credit situation.

The relation of monetary and credit policies, and fiscal and debt management policies is most important of all. These interrelationships have become increasingly important and binding as a result of the tremendous wartime expansion of the public debt to a dominant position in the over-all financial structure.

Fiscal policies are in the final analysis determined by Congress in authorizing appropriations and legislating taxes. Of course the President and the various executive agencies of the Government have a major influence upon these policies in their recommendations for legislation and in carrying out the measures voted by the Congress. The Treasury has a primary responsibility for recommendations as to tax policy, as well as for the collection of taxes. It has important discretionary authority with reference to the management of the public debt. This includes decisions as to the timing and nature of borrowing and of debt retirement. The Treasury also possesses certain monetary powers and it has important responsibility with reference to the international financial operations of the Government. These various Treasury operations have a direct bearing on and are affected by conditions in the money market, with which the Federal Reserve is concerned.

The functions of the Federal Reserve are primarily monetary. As I have said, the system has primary responsibility for influencing the supply, availability, and cost of bank reserves, which provide the basis for the bulk of the country's supply of money and credit. Federal Reserve authorities, by exercising an influence on the cost of availability of reserves, can affect not only the level of interest rates but also the ability and willingness of banks to lend and invest. These policies necessarily impinge upon public-debt operations. Moreover, the magnitude of public-debt offerings (or retirements), the rates of interest paid by the Treasury, and the maturities and other features of the various issues are reflected in the demands for credit and can thereby influence the supply of money and the demands upon the Federal Reserve.

The rates of interest which the Treasury finds it necessary to offer on new issues of securities are to a substantial degree affected by the Federal Reserve's influence on the money market. Obviously, if the Treasury and the Federal Reserve were preoccupied solely with the question of rates, they would sacrifice all other considerations to this end. Both, of course, must take account of the many broad aspects of their respective policies and the effects upon the entire economic structure. Because measures adopted by either agency must be taken into consideration by the other in determining its policies, it is most essential that they unify their efforts and direct their respective policies toward common broad objectives of national policy.

It is most fortunate that public discussion of fiscal, monetary, debt management, and other policies has been on so high a plane. A short time ago I addressed the Committee for Economic Development and was deeply impressed with their recent public statements which grappled in a most constructive way with the problems inherent in administering and coordinating monetary and debt management policies. The search for the right answers that will best serve public interest demands the highest statesmanship on the part of the leaders of finance, industry, labor, education, and government. It is greatly to the credit of the President, Government officials, and Members of Congress concerned with these problems that they have approached them in a broad, nonpartisan and unprejudiced spirit. There has been a most earnest and sincere desire on the part of everyone to find the right solutions that will contribute to the common objective of orderly economic progress.

Today we are engaged in a great defense effort, the purpose of which is to assure the continuance of our way of life. We all agree that it is in the public interest to regard the requirements of defense as having priority over all other activities. I am sure we are agreed that the way of life which we wish to defend is one in which the private enterprise system will continue to play a central role.

I wish to state here and now that in this critical period the Federal Reserve System will use all of its resources and powers in conjunction with the Treasury to assure the successful financing of the defense program. Furthermore, we will continue to wage a relentless fight on inflation. Nothing could be more damaging to our morale or to our ability to back up the military than inflation. Inflation diminishes incentives. It misdirects tremendous amounts of effort into nonproductive areas. It destroys the savings impulse of our people that has been so vital a factor in making our Nation great.

While I have outlined how the Federal Reserve, the Treasury, and the other Government agencies will work to combat inflation, it is, of course, everyone's job. The fact is that unless every one of us, as individuals, recognizes and combats this problem the efforts of our Government will fail. Inflation is a matter that vitally concerns each of us and it can only be avoided if each of us is willing to exercise the restraints and make the sacrifices required.

I have tried tonight to stress the development of the idea of central banking as a means of strengthening the financial stability of a modern national economy. In this country, the Federal Reserve System, a unique "decentralized" central bank, was developed to meet our particular type of highly competitive expanding capitalism. Its purpose is to exert influence through the banking system and the money market, to provide for an expanding economy and at the same time to help preserve the value of the American dollar.

On a number of occasions I have called the Federal Reserve System a great and vital bulwark of the enterprise system which has so enriched this country and made it strong. Our strength at home and abroad rests fundamentally upon the preservation of this system and the integrity of the dollar which symbolizes our strength—and, indeed, our hopes—for the future.

The Real Purpose Behind Attlee's Visit

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, December 21 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a release from my office entitled "The Real Purpose Behind Attlee's Visit."

There being no objection, the release was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

United States Senator GEORGE W. MALONE, Republican of Nevada, charged today that the British Prime Minister's visit to this country to talk to President Truman was "the next step in the plan of England and France to sell out the American Army in Korea."

"The visit is not prompted by any magnanimous spirit of helpfulness or by any feeling of appreciation for what we have done for them," the Nevada Senator said, continuing: "England and France, the latter also represented by Prime Minister Attlee, have not helped us, other than token help, and have no intention of helping us. The visit is for the purpose of keeping intact the colonial possessions of those two countries through the recognition of communistic China.

"This visit comes with ill grace from a representative of two countries which have been living off the bounty of American taxpayers and yet have done nothing to help us appreciably in our war in Asia. Despite our freehanded pouring of billions of Marshall plan dollars into those countries, is there anyone who thinks that either England or France will help us now? They are calling on us now, through Mr. Attlee, only to protect their investments in Britain's Hong Kong and Singapore, and France's Indochina.

"Because the war in Asia may jeopardize Europeans and their colonial possessions in Asia and Africa, Attlee and those he represents want the war to end at any cost—any cost to us, that is. Attlee will suggest that we end the war. How? By surrendering, after getting a concession or two—by withdrawing from Korea; by leaving Formosa defenseless; by turning our backs on Chinese Nationalists, our only friends in Asia; and by agreeing to the recognition of the Communist regime in China. Attlee is here to perfect the plans for the ultimate recognition of the Chinese Communists. Thus, the end of the war—temporarily—until Russia is in better shape to fight us!

"The leaders in England and France figure that through Attlee and Acheson they will win their point—and they probably will, for there is no evidence that the administration has become any more intelligent than it showed itself to be at Potsdam or a year earlier at Yalta, when every conceivable concession was made to the Reds.

"I prophesy now that we will do exactly what England and France tell us to do, for we still have officials without the backbone to stand up to European leaders. After we have surrendered, France and England will continue to bleed us financially through our gullible officials, until the bottom of the barrel is reached—and there is a bottom, of course. After the bottom is reached, further aggression on the part of the Reds will throw us into a major war—and we then will have no friends anywhere, for no longer will we be able to buy friendship in Europe and even if France and England were so inclined, they would not fight for fear of endangering their precious hold over their colonies.

"To those who say that the Nevada Senator is rocking the international boat, I say that it is time someone spoke out against all those, regardless of who they are, who would sell out the American people."

Address by Hon. Edward Martin, of Pennsylvania, to the Grand Central Railroad Branch, YMCA

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. EDWARD MARTIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, December 21 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by me at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, New York, on November 20, 1950, at the diamond-jubilee dinner of the Grand Central Railroad Branch, YMCA.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

It is a great honor to be invited to speak at this notable diamond-jubilee celebration.

We meet to commemorate three-quarters of a century of steady growth, expanding usefulness, and increasing service by the Railroad YMCA.

That is a proud record of achievement. It is deserving of the highest praise and warmest congratulations in which I am glad to join wholeheartedly.

I am happy to be here tonight because your association has reached a significant milestone on the path of progress toward a higher level of spiritual and cultural attainment.

The YMCA is one of the great institutions of our country. It is the embodiment of brotherhood in action.

Its wise and effective leadership in the development of Christian character has made a tremendous contribution to the welfare of our Nation.

The YMCA teaches clean, upright living, tolerance, and good will. It teaches faith in our country and faith in God. It is a powerful influence in building good citizenship and loyalty to the principles of Americanism.

How fortunate we are that the candle of faith—lighted by George Williams and his small group of fellow workers 106 years ago—has grown into a great white beacon for the guidance of the mind, the body, and the spirit.

In many parts of the world its bright light has dispelled darkness and has inspired new hope. It has opened great areas of opportunity and new fields of Christian service.

We are fortunate also that other faiths have followed the example of the YMCA and have established their own organizations that strengthen devotion to religion and advances the welfare of their people.

It is most appropriate on occasions such as this to consider what it means to be an American. It is a proper time to give earnest thought to the duties and obligations of citizenship.

It is likewise a time to measure our shortcomings and to inquire whether we have been faithful to the trust handed down to us through generations of toil, tears, sacrifice, and the shedding of blood.

We must remember that the sturdy, self-reliant, God-fearing pioneers of the New World prized political and religious liberty above life itself.

They did not come here because America would give them security. The wilderness offered only opportunity.

They had the moral strength and the courage to face hardship and peril because here they could build a future of liberty, free from religious persecution, and free from the tyranny of government.

I have been greatly impressed by the statement of a South American visitor who was asked to explain why the material prosperity of the United States had so far outstripped that of South America.

This was his reply:

"The people who settled North America came here seeking God. Those who came to South America were in search of gold."

The United States will live and prosper so long as we continue the search for God in our daily lives.

Our Republic was founded upon a philosophy of human dignity and freedom under God. Its ideals are based on the eternal truths of the Holy Bible.

Far more than any other country, we have been a religious and God-loving Nation. The spirit of religion has guided our statesmen, soldiers, Government officials, educators, and our people.

The founding fathers placed firm reliance on the protection of divine providence in their struggle for independence.

They planned a government on the proposition that "all men * * * are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights." Among those rights they listed "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

It is important to note that they placed emphasis on the pursuit of happiness. They realized that happiness can be attained only by individual effort. No government can guarantee happiness.

The whole plan of our Government was to protect freedom of the individual and to provide equal opportunity.

Under that system we have achieved greatness as a nation unparalleled in the history of the world.

We have built a vast empire of industry, commerce, agriculture, and transportation.

We have developed the great natural resources of our country for the benefit of mankind.

We have splendid schools, hospitals, colleges, centers of art and music, and magnificent churches of every denomination.

We enjoy the highest living standards in the world.

Yet with all these blessings, we have tragic faults which should be given earnest and prayerful thought.

Evil influences have grown up amongst us that are undermining the moral structure of the United States.

Too many of our people have forgotten that the true greatness of America is not our material wealth but the spiritual strength and character of our people.

In all walks of life there are men whose lives are ruled by selfishness and greed.

There is law evasion, racketeering, chiseling and other corrupt products of an unholy desire for an easy way of life.

Organized crime syndicates operate across State lines and are taking from the people an estimated $15,000,000,000 a year.

Sinister alliances between the criminal element of the underworld and some law enforcement officers, and other public officials, endanger the lives and safety of our citizens.

Political power wielded by racketeers and gamblers has forced invisible government upon some cities and towns by influencing the election of corrupt officials.

Millions and millions of dollars—taken largely from families who can least afford to lose it—are being used by racketeers and gamblers to purchase political control of many American communities.

Corrupt officials in these towns and cities, brought by tainted millions, are willing to submit to the dictates of criminal elements and to lay aside their sacred oaths to serve in the public interest.

And the most tragic situation confronting us is that so many of our people accept these dishonest practices as necessary evils—a form of wickedness that we cannot escape.

What is responsible for this attitude?

I think the answer lies in a lack of appreciation of our civic duties and failure to recognize the responsibilities of citizenship.

There are so many who give such little consideration to their government, their church or their duty to their fellow men.

One of the shocking developments in American civic life is the fact that many of our citizens, who are thoroughly honest in their private lives, are so indifferent to matters affecting the public welfare.

They forget that bad public officials are elected by "good" citizens who ignore or neglect the basic obligation of citizenship and do not even take the trouble to vote on election day.

Two hundred years ago Edmund Burke, the great English statesman, declared:

"All that is necessary for the triumph of evil is that good men do nothing."

Yes—today as in the time of Edmund Burke—evil will triumph when good men do nothing.

That is why I say that every good citizen, every churchgoer, every YMCA member, should take an intelligent, patriotic, and militant part in government.

That means taking part in politics, because clean, honest politics is the foundation of good government. It means working for the election of men of integrity and high character—dedicated to public service rather than personal power or private gain.

It means taking an active interest in community affairs, in State, national and world problems.

It means arousing public opinion to a higher standard of morality, to inspire deeper respect for the law and to assure confidence in the integrity of our officials and our courts.

An informed and aroused electorate could overnight transform corruption into sound government by turning grafting officials out of office.

Corrupt practices which take bread from the mouths of innocent families to enrich criminals and corrupt officials are cancers on the body politic and should be removed by criminal prosecutions and ballot box surgery before the disease spreads further.

The weakening of the moral fiber of our people has been responsible in a large measure for the spread of Communist philosophies in our midst.

That poisonous doctrine has made its influence felt only among those who have turned away from the teachings of the Bible.

Civic responsibility is always weakened where religious teaching is neglected.

What are we Americans to do in order to stop the advance of this destructive and Godless philosophy?

If we are to save America and to preserve our sacred freedoms we must crusade for a return to the fundamental principles of religion and freedom of the individual.

To hold the line against communism at home we must have a strong, courageous, self-reliant, God-fearing people.

We must have a strong, militant church and a strong, solvent government. We must have a total mobilization of all our moral forces in a great crusade for righteousness and patriotic Americanisms.

We must revitalize the teaching of American history in our schools and colleges. We must teach the greatness of the American form of government and the glory of the American way of life.

We have been forced by Communist aggression in Korea into a period when all of us must be prepared for willing sacrifice to build our Nation's defensive strength.

Freedom in the world is facing its supreme test. We must approach the grim task ahead with full realization that we are fighting a war for survival.

It should be perfectly clear to every one that communism aims to conquer and enslave the world, including the United States.

It should be perfectly clear that we face a well organized and strongly equipped force which hopes to overrun and destroy every nation where human rights are recognized.

The future of freedom in the world hangs in the balance and the outcome will be decided by the measure of American military and spiritual strength.

In the situation confronting us selfishness is sabotage. This is no time to think about increased profits. It is no time to demand wage increases. It is no time for business as usual or pleasure as usual.

Nothing less than total victory will preserve the religious ideals of our Republic from destruction by the Godless forces of tyranny and dictatorship.

What is the right course to take as we face this grave threat to our freedom?

I have outlined some steps which, in my judgment, should be part of an American program:

1. We should support universal military training. This will prepare our young men to meet the enemy on the field of battle. It is fair because it places equal military obligation upon every citizen. If we are to preserve our Republic its wars must be fought by the people.

2. We must have total mobilization of all our resources—labor, industry, agriculture and finance, and all our moral and spiritual strength.

3. We must fight inflation and keep our currency sound by restricting credit and by placing controls on prices and on salaries and wages at the same time.

4. All critical materials in short supply, needed for war production, should be placed on a rigid system of priorities and allocations.

5. All Government spending, not directly connected with the national defense should be cut to the bone.

6. As far as possible the cost of war should be paid out of current revenues. Otherwise we may lose freedom of the individual even though we win the war.

7. We must stamp out law evasion, racketeering, black markets, unfair profiteering and drive out of public office all officials, regardless of their party, who conspire with the underworld for votes and political power.

8. We must constantly teach the meaning of the American way of life. The blessings of individual freedom should be compared with the terror and tyranny under which millions of people are enslaved behind the iron curtain of Godless communism.

9. All those disloyal to our form of government and who prefer communism to Americanism should be deported if they are not citizens of the United States. If naturalized, their citizenship should be revoked. Native-born Communists should be placed where they cannot sabotage our military effort, our war production, or our schools and churches.

10. Last and most important, we must have a great spiritual revival based on the eternal truths of the Holy Bible. We must recognize that God stands at the portal of destiny.

Communism denies God. It worships the state.

God-fearing, law-abiding Americans pray for divine help and guidance.

We believe in the fatherhood of God. In that faith lies our hope for lasting peace in the world.

With faith in God's goodness and with firm resolve to serve our country, each of us, in his own humble way, can contribute to victory.

Destruction of the Nation's Economic Structure

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, December 21 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a release from my office entitled "Destruction of the Nation's Economic Structure."

There being no objection, the release was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 29, 1950.—United States Senator GEORGE W. MALONE, Republican of Nevada, said today that, with the world situation as it is, Congress is facing the grave and immediate responsibility of preventing the actual collapse of the American economic system.

"We are nearer the brink of economic destruction than most people realize," the Nevada Senator said, "as a result of socialistic legislation, gigantic give-away programs, deficit spending, free trade, and an international policy designed for the international distribution of our wealth, all apparently master minded by friends of communism within the Government."

Senator MALONE continued: "Is it not possible that the cost is more than our economy can stand—the cost of carrying on our domestic governmental functions, including the several highly expensive socialistic programs, plus the war in Asia, plus mobilizing and arming the western nations, plus further financial gifts to so-called Marshall plan countries? There is the grave danger that we may spend ourselves into destruction (which is an avowed objective of Soviet Russia).

"In international dealings, there is the political and military sphere and there is the economic sphere. After World War II we threw away all political and military advantage by hurriedly moving out and giving Russia the strategic areas needed for our defense, virtually inviting the Soviets to move in and take over. Any military bases subsequently established in foreign countries which have become self-sufficient are an asset only so long as the people of those countries are on our side. The people of the countries which have received our money do not have much respect for those who must buy good will. It is a form of blackmail payoff, not conducive to a feeling of trust and security on either side. We may conceivably spend ourselves into destruction only to find that countries we believed would be fighting with us in any shooting war had been made impotent through a capture of the people of those countries in the realm of ideas long before the shooting begins.

"The Congress should use as a yardstick on every piece of proposed legislation this question: Will it serve to reinforce our economic strength?

"We cannot strengthen our national economy if we permit the continuation of administration attacks on American industry. These attacks have come through Government regulations and taxes so designed as to eliminate initiative and venture capital and a foreign free-trade policy so designed as to curtail domestic production. Some of the administration officials are now talking about impending shortages. Such shortages can be charged to the attacks on American industry.

"We cannot strengthen our national economy by spending beyond our means. There is talk now of a $50,000,000,000 military budget, and some place the probable total budget as high as $96,000,000,000 annually. Taxes alone could not provide such a huge sum. (Pay-as-you-go talk by those not suggesting deep cuts is nonsense.) Furthermore, such a program cannot be financed through deficit-financing operations without causing a deadly form of currency inflation which on such a scale would destroy our money and with it our economy. Controls are not the answer; they merely delay the day of reckoning.

"There are two types of inflation: one which merely hurts until adjustment is made; the other which kills. Deficit financing on such gigantic scale as suggested would bring on the deadly type. History shows that invariably, after suffering a long period of this deadly type of economic illness, the economic system of a nation lingers and dies. This signals the end of an epoch. And after long confusion and suffering, accompanied by civil strife and sometimes bloody revolution, a different economic system emerges. (This is what the Communists are counting on here.)

"The United States is today faced with the danger of this deadly type of economic illness. Only the ability on the part of Congress to say 'No' can save it from such a fate. We must cultivate the ability to say 'No' to the designing enemies of the American way of life, and a loud 'No' to the thoughtless administration officials who are continually asking for millions and billions for all manner of things."

Address by Francis Cardinal Spellman to New York State Association of Children's Court Judges

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON
OF COLORADO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, December 21 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by Francis Cardinal Spellman, on December 1 at a dinner of the New York State Association of Children's Court Judges. I make this request not only because of the subject matter of the address, but also because the language used in the address is so expressive and eloquent. It stamps the cardinal as both a powerful orator and a sensible advocate of better standards in radio programing. I wish to call especial attention to the paragraph of the address in which His Eminence deals with the problem of radio and television broadcasting.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

In the course of a year it is my privilege, as it is also my duty as servant of God and of man, to attend hundreds of public functions and administrative meetings as well as personal and private conferences. Each one is important. But, while many may equal, none can excel in vital import and possible impact upon our democratic society this Conference of the New York State Association of Children's Court Judges. For, within your hands and your own wise, compassionate hearts you hold the destiny of America's children and their homes.

The children's court is an American institution which, when faithfully administered, is a powerful, protective instrument to help save, not alone America but the whole civilized world. For the child is the heart of the home; the home the core of civilization. Within them rests the world's hope for strength and survival, for, no nation is stronger than its homes; no home stronger than its children. And it was to protect our children and our homes that an intelligent, sympathetic, socially minded group of people, sensitive to the harmful impact of treating the child-offender as an adult criminal, aroused lawmakers and public officials to the imperative need of setting up a separate facility for handling the cases which involved children. It was under their humane direction that our own New York became part of the vanguard of States which first accepted the principle of separate children's courts for child-offenders.

From the turn of the century we have seen this American institution take root and flourish, until now it bears fruit in every State of the Union, and in many other lands. And while there are still imperfections and gaps in the administration of children's court work, no longer can there be the slightest question concerning the obvious merits of the children's court system as it has been developed in the United States.

While the children's court is a distinctly American innovation, it is interesting to note that nearly 250 years ago, in 1704, His Holiness Pope Clement XI set aside a separate hall where boy-offenders could be trained and taught to become useful citizens, without association with hardened criminals. And, throughout the centuries, the attitude of Catholics toward social service has ever been the same, for it is the changeless attitude of the church established by Christ, Who Himself begged us to love one another as He loved us. And by love Christ meant sympathetic, compassionate understanding, patience, tolerance, and above all the just, honorable, and wise ministration of any powers entrusted to man.

I am sure you are familiar with the standards of service provided by the agencies in the Archdiocese of New York, both in the area of preventive work in our youth and youth counselling services; in the splendid work that is done by such volunteer agencies in the court as the Catholic Big Brothers and Big Sisters who work cooperatively and effectively with similar agencies of the Protestant and Jewish faiths, and the programs for custodial care both in our institutions and in our boarding homes. I am sure, too, you are aware that we strive to utilize every scientific and social development that will aid in helping the neglected, afflicted or delinquent child. Expert psychiatric diagnosis and treatment are indispensable in many cases. Medical, surgical, nutritional, and psychological care is often indicated. Yet, to the deep regret of all of us, the lack of financial support and of community-awareness frequently handicaps the court, as well as private agencies, in securing the facilities that are of paramount importance in the rehabilitation of a child.

One of the most important arms of the Children's Juvenile Court is the probation staff. We share with every other agency in the community, the keen appreciation of the necessity of this branch of the Children's Court with a well trained staff, implemented by medical, psychiatric and other specialized services. Yet its functions, too, are often impeded by lack of funds. Surely in these days of astronomical expenditures of public moneys for so many and varied purposes, there can be no real or just basis for neglecting to provide adequate personnel for the proper functioning of the probation, or any other branch, of this health-building, family-preserving life-saving service. Rather instead, when comes that day when a child's destiny is given into the custody of the court, there should be available every facility known to modern study and science for the child's immediate care and rehabilitation. For lack of any one of their needs may be the cause of speeding upon the accursed course of repeated crime and punishment, not only the willful delinquent but the hapless victim of circumstances.

And the union of all the children's court judges in a State-wide association forms an instrument of great power, a noble, spiritual and protective bulwark, a shield which if wisely used can serve to keep families united and save America's children. It cannot be anything less. But, without the assistance of proper, perfected, efficient, sufficient equipment and personnel they cannot, even with the noblest intentions, carry out their obligations.

Today a man's home is no longer his castle, for the locked door no longer keeps out the trespasser. Now, any broadcasting radical may enter the home, and, under cunning disguises, sow the seeds of juvenile bewilderment and delinquency. The moving picture has moved indeed—it has moved from a limited number of public theaters to millions of private homes where crime stories and their horrors add to the infamy of the massacre of the innocents. Eager, impressionable young children with bated breath and fast-beating hearts receive into their immature minds, trashy tales which leave them confused and disturbed. Radio and television programs should be, and some truly are, instructive and inspirational. But many stories heard over the radio, seen on television and read in cheap publications are merely ribald thrillers and have a ruinous effect on our children, engendering in them a dislike for the normal, destroying the influence of parental authority and counsel, robbing the child of the natural protective elements to which he is entitled.

And, while I am not of that school which believes that children must blindly obey their parents, neither do I believe in the new school of social thought that children themselves have founded based on the command to parents, obey your child. I stand unequivocally for one commandment—obey God. The children's courts vested with wide powers over the child and the family should be instrumental in encouraging obedience to the commandment. For power imposes responsibility. But unlimited power and control over others sometimes becomes a danger and a menace to those upon whom it may be exercised, unless it be used with charity, compassion, tolerance, and justice. The world today has too many men who possess authority but who themselves possess neither charity nor morality. And it is my firm faith that only men who first learn to love and obey God have any right to lead or judge or govern others.

In our own blessed Nation great disaster has befallen the American family. I do not need to rehearse for you, judges of the children's court, the terrible evils that arise and run in the wake of the broken home. One of these is the quick and tragic results that encompass the bewildered child of adolescent years who is asked to divide or resolve his loyalties between mother and father in marital conflict, and to accept a new father or new mother while his true mother or father takes on another mate after divorce. And I avow that the faithless parent, who deserts and breaks up the marriage because of attraction to another, or who, by infidelity, insobriety, or selfishness, brings ruin to the home and irreparable harm to the life of the child, not only breaks the law of God, but also fails to observe the very moral principle upon which our democratic society is builded. For home life plays a most important part in the development of civic, moral, and religious responsibility in children.

There are, however, those who would tell us that the whole process of child-character development is exclusively one of environmental adjustment; that there is no moral culpability for a wrong act. With this theory Catholic teachings permit no compromise. This evil doctrine is rarely stated so boldly or baldly. It is more frequently couched in such euphemistic expressions as "the inexorability of environmental forces", or similar cliches of some of the so-called ultra-modern experts in the field of behaviorism. According to this school of thought, there is no reason even to consider morality where a child's conduct is concerned. Spiritual values and religion are regarded by this school as extraneous factors and sometimes even as out-moded or harmful elements in a so-called scientific approach to the problem. These conclusions are perfectly logical if we accept the original premise that the child or the individual is nothing more than a highly developed animal specimen in the process of evolution and change, comprised only of the material, the helpless prey of external forces, devoid of any spiritual faculties, with no capacity for choice or exercise of free will, and with no destiny or obligations beyond the horizon of this life's span.

Aside from the materialism and moral evil of this deterministic philosophy, its baneful results would be perfectly patent were we to train our youth, particularly those who may be burdened with exceptionally difficult handicaps, in the wretched belief that no matter how frequent or how serious may be their transgressions of the law, there is no blame and no responsibility; that misconduct is due entirely to their environment; that the fault lies exclusively with society. If designedly we rule out of the lives of our children belief in God and the obligation of obedience to His laws, if we deprive our young people of the benefits of religious training and the development of moral character, if we fail to impress upon them the sense of personal responsibility to their God, their country and their neighbor, what, I ask you, may we expect of them when they will be called to assume their duties as adults in the community, and themselves take over the problems that confront society?

While I do not absolve parents from their obligations, I plead with all persons who have the opportunity and duty to help in the molding of the lives of young people during their formative years, to insist upon the principles of personal responsibility for wrongful conduct. Thus shall we help to keep today's children from becoming faithless and irresponsible citizens and parents of tomorrow.

Insistence upon this personal responsibility, self-discipline and character development does not mean a harsh or punitive approach to the problems of adjustment of delinquent children. And personally I do not like this canonized phrase "delinquent child." I would the word be changed to a more hopeful, kinder word, "unfortunate"—for sympathy and patient understanding of the unfortunate youngsters are as essential as the best scientific and social therapy.

Of late year, it has become out-moded with some groups to urge or even to consider, the religion of a child in connection with the expenditure of public funds or the performance of a public function. The God-fearing founders of our country expressed in public documents their reverence for God and the importance of the rights of freedom of religion. When they established the principle of the separation of church and state, their purpose was to protect religion and to preserve the practice of religion. By strange distortion, this is now construed by some to mean the suppression of church by state, and the absolute banishment from the areas of government and public services of all for which religion stands.

Hence, it is gratifying to find an important public agency, the children's court, which officially takes cognizance of, and affirmatively protects and preserves the religious faith of the child. The Children's Court Act assures that in "the care, protection, guardianship, discipline or control of any child, his religious faith shall be preserved and protected by the court." But despite this clear, definite legislation there are some who foster insidious and dangerous doctrines which would destroy religion, the very foundation and basis of respect for law and good citizenship. This pernicious propaganda, my friends, is implanted in the minds and hearts of our growing generation, will demolish our greatest bulwark against the rising tide of godless communism threatening to inundate the world and in this fatful hour, our own beloved America.

For there is always a menace that these fatal theories can seep even into the thinking of well-intentioned persons who, with most sincere motives, may interfere and violate the right of the family to worship God—the right of the family to remain a family. Forgotten or ignored is the fact that the family was not created by any human law. It was brought into being by the Creator from Whom it received its rights, and the family is still the most powerful influence over the child. Its bonds are rooted deep both in the spirit and flesh of its members and its ties must not be broken or uprooted save for the most serious reasons.

I have come before you this night, an American citizen and minister of God, whose measure of devotion to God and country can be judged, I pray, by my life's work. I have tried faithfully to talk to you as a loyal American for the good of all Americans. Now I feel it my duty, before I leave you, to speak to you as a priest of the Catholic Church, loyal also to its teachings which strengthen and sanctify my loyalty to my country. And I speak now only for my own people of my own faith when I state that it is both bold and ignorant of any judge, court officer, or social worker to berate a distressed wife and mother of a large family for the number of children she has brought into the world. Sex is a gift of God. The Jewish law held the procreation of children a blessing. The Christian law under its Divine Founder continued and still continues to respect and uphold that divine mandate. Therefore do I repeat that it is my belief that the modern social worker or judge who advocates birth control to a Catholic parent is but an agent of the moral destruction of the very family that has been entrusted to him to save. And one of the rights that we as American citizens insist on, a right upheld by law, is that each child and each family be supervised by a probation officer of its own religion, for, to place a child under the direction of a probation officer of a faith other than its own is a surrender of the element most necessary to its guidance, a violation and betrayal of both the religious and legal rights of the child.

Yea, within your hands which represent the constitutional laws and rights of our free and democratic Nation, within your hearts which represent God's compassionate, charitable heart, you are among the favored few who hold in your keeping the life and future of America—America's children and their homes. And this night I pray you to follow God's pattern in judging those who come before you, and help America's mothers and fathers and their children to be loyal, God-loving parents and patriots.

The Gray Report Extends Crackpot Socialist Programs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, December 21 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a release from my office entitled "The Gray Report Extends Crackpot Socialist Programs."

There being no objection, the release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 22, 1950.—United States Senator GEORGE W. MALONE, Republican of Nevada, warned today of what he considers the grave danger to the national economy and the additional tax burden which would be put upon the shoulders of the American people if the Gray Report should be approved by Congress.

The Nevada Senator, in a statement issued through his Washington office, said that some of the recommendations made by Gordon Gray, special assistant to the President, in his Report to the President on Foreign Economic Policy, paralleled some of his own recommendations but that the Gray Report went entirely too far and embodied all the crackpot program of the Socialist-minded State Department.

Senator MALONE suggested that the American people, particularly their representatives in Congress, "read the fine print" before making up their minds about the Gray Report. Senator MALONE, in urging that utmost caution be exercised, called attention to the fact that approval of the report would provide—

1. That we continue sending money to so-called Marshall plan countries for 3 or 4 years after the expiration of ECA without requiring those countries to stop arming Russia, or even requiring that we be permitted equal access to the markets of the world.

2. That our net outflow of capital to underdeveloped areas of the world be in the range of six hundred millions to eight hundred millions each year, this additional money to be taken, of course, from the American taxpayers.

3. That means be found to actually increase the high volume of sweatshop labor exports from foreign countries to the United States to compete with American-made goods produced by American workers with a higher wage standard, this leading inevitably to the lowering of the American worker's standard of living.

4. That the American Government protect the British pound sterling, with its fictitious fixed value, and the external position of the United Kingdom. (Isn't it about time our administration started thinking about protecting the American dollar and the American economy?)

5. That the American taxpayers be called upon to guarantee private investments in foreign countries against the risks of nonconvertibility and expropriation (and this, mind you, without calling upon these countries for any guaranties).

6. That America extend the point-4 program, the foot-in-the-door never-ending foreign give-away program of world-wide distribution of wealth, which could conceivably involve the American taxpayers to the extent of billions and even trillions of dollars.

7. That the United States become a member of the International Trade Organization, whereby the domestic and foreign trade of the United States could be governed by 50-odd countries, through the fixing of tariffs and import fees and quotas of production, the United States having in this ITO just one vote, the same as Cuba or Siam.

Senator MALONE concluded: "These and other features of the Gray recommendations are but a repetition of the same old State Department ideas which the American people have recently repudiated at the polls, to the extent of defeating the administration leaders in the Senate and the others who made excuses for the State Department. I do not know whom the administration thinks it is fooling by trotting out this discredited program, dressed up in different language.

"The economic ruin of the United States is still Stalin's aim. The Socialist element long ago gave up fomenting a revolution in this country and directed their efforts toward the control of one of the major political parties. In this they have succeeded beyond their fondest hopes. With the cooperation of the present officials of the State Department, they are not only wrecking our national economy by removing the floor under wages and investments through their free trade program, but are endangering our national safety through the disposal of strategic areas."

Address by Hon. Edward Martin, of Pennsylvania, Before the Pennsylvania Council of Republican Women

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, December 21 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address by me at Harrisburg on November 14, 1950, before the annual convention of the Pennsylvania Council of Republican Women.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am sincerely grateful for this opportunity to discuss with you the vital issue of universal military training.

It is a distinct pleasure to take part in your program because it reflects your patriotic concern with the future of freedom in our Republic and in the world.

As an organization and as individual members of the Council of Republican Women, you have served our State and our Nation with loyalty and true devotion to the ideal held sacred by every American.

As a Nation and as a free people we are confronted today with problems more pressing than at any other time in our history.

We are living in a time when the highest principles of Americanism must be called forth in the service of our country. The future of freedom in the United States and in the world will be decided by the measure of American patriotism, American strength, and American sacrifice.

We are faced with a situation in which our paramount objectives must be the defense of America, the preservation of the American way of life and the establishment of enduring peace.

In considering a program directed toward those objectives we must first recognize certain existing conditions which are beyond dispute.

1. We are engaged in a struggle for survival as a free Nation.

2. Our enemy is a powerful, well-disciplined force, supporting a philosophy which denies God. Its sole aim is to enslave all mankind, including the United States, under Communist tyranny and terror.

3. We cannot defend America with second-rate measures. The penalty for second best is surrender, the loss of all freedom, or death.

4. Our experience in Korea has given conclusive proof that weakness is an invitation to aggression and could plunge the world into total war that might last a generation or more. At the end of such a war there would be no victory. Civilization would be destroyed.

5. World war III can be averted only by building to its highest peak the full power of American military, industrial, and spiritual strength.

Are we awake to the dangers?

Are we prepared to meet the supreme test?

Let us look back to the end of World War II, just 5 years ago. At that time we were the mightiest Nation of all history in military power. We had the greatest, the best trained, and best equipped Army in the world. Our Navy had command of every ocean. Our Air Force had complete superiority over any potential enemy.

We were at the height of our industrial production. Our farms were providing food for our Armed Forces and our civilian population. In addition we were practically supplying the unfortunate victims of war's destruction in the world.

But we are not a warlike people. We have no ambition for conquest. We turned to the ways of peace. We wanted business as usual—pleasure as usual—and politics as usual. We wanted our boys brought home.

Immediately we began demobilizing our armies, putting our ships into moth balls, and converting our industries to normal peacetime production.

But the Russians took a different course.

Behind the iron curtain the Communist dictators were training armies of greatly increased strength, enlarging their war plants, building more tanks, bombers, and submarines, and producing more food for their fighting men.

In the meantime we were talking about socialistic experiments, proposed by unprincipled politicians, and supported by many well-meaning but misguided economic planners and so-called social reformers.

Many of our people wanted socialized medicine, socialized public housing, and education under the control of the Federal Government. They wanted the Government to guarantee security for everyone. They wanted all authority centralized at Washington even though such concentration of power would rob the people of their individual freedom.

We seemed to think we could buy peace by distributing our strength throughout the world. We tried to attain peace by appeasing Joe Stalin. We thought the spread of communism could be stopped by great appropriations to Western Europe.

What has been the result? By treacherous political maneuvering and by cruel and ruthless aggression Soviet Russia has captured domination over one-third of the world and control over 720,000,000 people in Europe and Asia.

The miserable state of unpreparedness in which we found ourselves at the beginning of the Korean War should serve as a lesson and a warning.

It would be dangerous folly to assume that after victory in Korea we can return to an easy way of life.

It would be dangerous folly to ignore the fact that the enemy of freedom is poised and ready to strike without warning, anywhere, at any time.

When will the supreme emergency arise? Will it be tomorrow, next year, or within the next 5 years? It is not within the power of any of us to answer that question. Only the Kremlin knows the answer.

Every American should understand clearly that we must be fully prepared for a showdown whenever it may be thrust upon us. We must make up our minds that regardless of the outcome in Korea, we must maintain a large armed force for years to come.

Never again must we be caught in a time of crisis with a shortage of manpower trained for war.

To some extent we have recognized the dangers of inadequate preparation. We have extended selective service. We have called out some of the Reserves. Our own Twenty-eighth Division has been called into Federal service and is training to carry on the honored traditions symbolized by the famous red keystone. Other National Guard units are undergoing similar training.

But we know from tragic experience that these hurried expedients are woefully inadequate for a nation as large as the United States and the commitments we have in all parts of the world.

We have paid dearly in every war for our tendency to postpone preparation until the actual outbreak of hostilities.

The vast changes that have taken place in military science—the development of swift communications and weapons of mass destruction—have not altered the basic principle that properly trained manpower is the major deciding factor between victory and defeat.

The plan of national defense, conceived by Washington and his generals, including Von Steuben, the great drillmaster of the Revolution, was based on the principle that the wars of a republic must be fought by the people. The plan submitted by President Washington in 1790 provided that every able-bodied young man should be trained to defend his country.

Washington rejected the idea of a large professional army. He feared such a force might eventually develop into a dictatorship that could seize control of the Government.

Washington and his generals wanted a small, highly trained Regular Army and a well-regulated militia.

That plan is just as valid and just as necessary as it was in Washington's time.

It is the plan advocated by everyone who believes that our Republic must depend upon its great body of citizens for the defense of our freedom, our ideals, and our very existence.

Universal military training is our foremost need today to implement the American plan of defense.

It is a system that is absolutely fair. It should be administered without exemptions except for physical or mental reasons and sincere conscientious objection.

Universal military training is needed to inculcate into the hearts and minds of our young men a deeper appreciation of America.

It is needed to inspire a better realization of individual responsibility to support and strengthen the American system of government.

It will build up stronger resistance to the vicious Communist philosophy which is seeking to destroy all that we hold sacred.

Universal military training is American in origin, principle, and character. It calls for equal service with equal opportunity. It distributes equal responsibility for our Nation's defense among all classes and creeds, the rich and the poor.

In the event of war, which could come like lightning in these troubled times, our young men would not be called upon to fight without adequate training. We would have a great reservoir of trained officers and men ready for immediate action.

Military training does not breed war. On the contrary, it is a powerful agency for peace, with tremendous influence to discourage war.

It has been asserted that universal training would make us a militaristic nation. My own career as a soldier and my close personal association with thousands of veterans convinces me that the veterans would be the first to oppose the development of a military caste in our country.

I know that many who oppose military training for our youth do so with complete sincerity in their hearts because they dread the thought of war.

To them I point out the lessons of history—the casualties which grew out of unfitness—the losses which might have been avoided if those who served in the Armed Forces had been given a better understanding of proper conduct under conditions of hardship and danger.

Such knowledge saves lives. Many veterans are alive today because of the training in self-preservation they received as members of a peacetime military organization .

It is not surprising that the most ardent supporters of military training are those who know the horrors of war.

I repeat, I believe in universal military training as a great instrumentality for peace.

So long as there is danger to peace in the world we cannot afford to be without the military strength to discourage Communist aggression.

Universal military training, if put into effect without delay, will serve notice on Moscow that we mean business.

The risks are too great—freedom is too precious—to leave the future of our country to chance. America must prepare.

Universal military training is the best course to follow for a better America and a stronger America.

State Department Advancing Cause of Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. MALONE

OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, December 21 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, a release from my office entitled "State Department Advancing Cause of Communism."

There being no objection, the release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 14, 1950.—United States Senator GEORGE W. MALONE, Republican, of Nevada, charged today that there is and has been a diabolical and deliberately conceived conspiracy, "aided and abetted by certain United States Government officials, to advance the cause of the Soviets throughout the world, to discredit the American free-enterprise and competitive system, and to bring on absolute socialism here."

Senator MALONE continued: "It seems impossible that the administration's actions can all stem from ignorance of practical conditions throughout the world. We are in an undertow of world socialism and the taxpayers of America have been led to finance it.

"Our own State Department officials are right now deceiving and double dealing the American people. They are publicly announcing that the United States will vote against the recognition of the Communist regime in China in the United Nations, and at the same time they are working behind the scenes with England to corral enough votes for recognition of the Chinese Reds. Secretary of State Dean Acheson has admitted that his representatives in the United Nations have been instructed not to use the veto against such recognition.

"Add up the facts and the conclusion is inescapable that the President is under the influence of, and the American people are at the mercy of, those who would destroy the American form of government and the American competitive system, which made this country great.

"Here are a few of the cumulating facts:

"1. At Yalta the plan was laid to give the Reds strategic areas throughout the world. Our ailing President, advised by Acheson's friend, Alger Hiss, since proved to be a traitor to America, gave Manchuria to the Reds; gave Berlin to the Reds with no provision for ingress or egress of western nations' personnel; and made other important concessions, including that involving North Korea, none of which were designed in the interest of America and much of which aggravated conditions leading to war No. III (called by the President a police action, notwithstanding the 26,000 killed, wounded, and lost in action to date).

"2. Our State Department had our Armed Forces withdrawn from Korea, in accordance with the Lattimore-Acheson plan, and virtually invited the Reds to take over. When President Truman was forced into repudiating this position, he did not demand Acheson's resignation. On the other hand, he said, curiously enough, that Acheson would remain as long as he was President.

"3. When Acheson and his left-wing friends forced Louis Johnson out as Defense Secretary, they saw to it that the post went to General Marshall who had been Acheson's front man in building up the Communist victory in China and could be depended upon to be complacent toward further maneuvers along the same line.

"4. When MacArthur sent his message to the Veterans of Foreign Wars stressing the importance of Formosa, the State Department leaders, who from all indications had promised Formosa to the Reds, had Truman force MacArthur to withdraw the message.

"5. United States delegates to the United Nations approved the plan of the Security Council to invite the Chinese Reds to sit in a United Nations discussion of the disposal of Formosa, all of which was only a bit of window dressing, for the conspirators had decided long ago that Formosa would be awarded to the Reds. (Quite strangely, the President now says Formosa must be neutral.)

"6. The State Department has favored our sending all kinds of war materials to the Marshall-plan countries which have 96 known trade treaties with Russia and her satellite nations. In other words, our State Department is arming Russia for world war III while helping her to consolidate her gains in Eastern Europe and in China.

"7. On the home front, every possible socialistic step has been taken and a direct attack has been made and continues to be made to wreck American industry through the free trade policy of the State Department. Recently representatives were sent to a Torquay, England, conference the purpose of which was to still further lower the tariffs, which will have the effect of forcing American workers into further competition with the sweat shop labor of Europe and Asia, lowering the American workers' high standard of living. This is all part of the deliberately conceived scheme against the economic life and the safety of the United States."

Senator MALONE concluded: "The shape of things to come is clear. With Acheson, the loyal friend of Hiss and Service and Lattimore, calling the signals, how could the Communist nations lose?"

Address of the Most Reverend Richard J. Cushing, D. D., Archbishop of Boston

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 19, 1950

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein resolutions recently adopted by the Archdiocesan Union of Holy Name Societies and a very profoundly patriotic and moving speech by the Most Reverend Richard J. Cushing, D. D., archbishop of Boston, before the officers and leaders of the Holy Name Society on Sunday, December 3, 1950. Archbishop Cushing is one of the great spiritual leaders of our time.

The resolutions speak for themselves. They will be of interest to every thoughtful American and particularly to Members of Congress, who will find in those relating to political questions, strong and impressive declarations of policy worthy of the most careful consideration.

The address of Archbishop Cushing is brilliant, forceful, and gleaming with genuine Americanism. Profoundly spiritual in tone, it is statesmanlike, practical, and patriotic in its approach.

I am placing it in the RECORD because I hope that it will be possible for every Member of Congress to read it at this time of peril when some are fostering and urging appeasement of those who would destroy our precious freedoms.

ADDRESS OF THE MOST REVEREND RICHARD J. CUSHING, D. D., ARCHBISHOP OF BOSTON, TO OFFICERS AND LEADERS OF THE HOLY NAME SOCIETY, SUNDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1950

Each year at this time I meet with you so that we may take stock of the past and make our prayerful plans for the future.

This year we meet under particularly sobering circumstances. When last we assembled I begged you to pray for the church. I pointed out to you some of her enemies' designs upon her welfare here in America. You will remember that I quoted to you the drunken, but very ominous attack made upon the church by a national radio commentator and I pointed out the relationship of his drunken talk to the sober campaign against Catholic schools, Catholic charities, organized Catholic life of every kind as of this time a year ago. I asked you to pray for the church.

Today I ask you to pray for America. We may well doubt whether she has ever been in greater need of prayers at home and of friends abroad than she is this week. The common people of America, by their charitable efforts, their travels, their letters, gifts, and good deeds of every kind, have done everything possible to make friends for us in Europe, Asia, and elsewhere. Organized efforts by the Government have been directed toward the same end, particularly through gigantic relief programs and constructive measures like the Marshall plan.

But some diplomats have diminished the effectiveness of these efforts by the manner in which they have seemed willing to use these means of influencing friends in order also to alienate friends and to create enemies. We must pray that our leaders, finally awakened to the dangers in which our Nation stands, will put an end to this foolhardiness and make the friends we badly need among people who have long desired to be our friends.

I refer particularly to nations like Spain and Portugal. It is an appalling piece of hypocrisy which talks of relief to starving Yugoslavia and yet seeks to starve Spain. It is contemptible politics, contemptible morality, contemptible diplomacy and, at the moment, contemptible patriotism, to subsidize the Communist regime of Tito and to refuse the hand of friendship to the one nation in Europe which has been resisting communism for 20 solid years, years during which some of our leaders were ready and willing to appease the Reds.

I have never made any public pronouncement of any kind concerning Spain. People who have spoken up in tribute to the Spanish people's heroic overthrow of the Communist conspiracy have been labeled Fascists, reactionaries, and enemies of human freedom. Name calling of that kind is not as common, or at least not as public as it used to be before the Reds embarrassed their sympathizers here in America. The critics of Spain and the friends of communism have grown more cautious for reasons which are shrieked in the headlines this week. We would be fools, however, foolish citizens and foolish Catholics, if we supposed they have changed their minds.

Communists and Communist sympathizers never change their minds. They change their line; they change their tactics; they change their addresses; they change their names; they change their countries and their contacts; but they never change their minds.

They are seeking now in America what they sought in Korea a year ago, in China 2 years ago, in Hungary 3 years ago, in Yugoslavia before that—and what they successfully obtained in all these places, sometimes with our help or connivance. It is the same thing that they sought in Spain 15 years ago and which the Spanish people flatly refused to give them. For that refusal Spain has been paying ever since.

One would not mind if the reprisal against Spain had merely come from those who admit that they sought the destruction of Spain, from acknowledged Communists and Red sympathizers. But the reprisals have been directed at and against the Spanish people, and are directed to this very day, by men who claim that they speak for us, for America and for democracy.

The reprisals against the Spanish people have taken many forms; the positive form of constant repetition of lies about Spain by men in high places and low; the systematic spread through the liberal press, some non-Catholic pulpits, and certain lecture halls of the Communist propaganda concerning Spain. The reprisal has also taken the negative form of a cold-blooded, calculated effort to freeze the Spanish people out of organized society; to ignore their contributions to the security of the Western World; to deny their right to be heard and to be helped; to starve them into the repudiation of the Government forced upon them by the same international communisms which is now forcing upon us days of frenzied planning and nights of tortured sleep. For it is no longer Spaniards, but Americans, who are being blown to bits as part of the plan first made clear in Madrid, Barcelona and the Asturias 15 years ago.

If we have so many millions of dollars and tons of supplies to give to Tito, whose men shot American soldiers, whose kangaroo courts have outraged the spiritual brethren of millions of American people, whose orators have slandered American ideals and policies, then surely it is proper that we aid the Spanish people. They first bore the brunt of the savagery we are now beginning to taste in the Far East. They first sounded the alarm we are now attempting to echo. They gave their blood, their valor and all else they had to fight back an enemy whose existence we denied until he turned on us.

We are told that we must help the Communists of Yugoslavia because they are defying the savage threat of Soviet imperialists. We might therefore conclude that we should even more gladly help those non-Communists who have not merely defied but have defeated the savage threat of the same imperialists within the borders of Spain.

We are told that it is in our Nation's interest to keep Soviet power out of one of Europe's most strategic areas. We might therefore conclude that we should help even more a nation which has been the object of Soviet designs against all the European peninsula, the first nation in which an armed effort to establish Soviet power was made and successfully frustrated.

We are told that the continued independence of Yugoslavia is of great importance to the security of the United Nations and to its partners in the common defense against the threat of Soviet aggression. We might therefore conclude that the same is true of the continued independence of Spain, the first nation the Soviet attempted to subjugate.

We are told that aid to Yugoslavia is a part of our effort to educate those parts of the world still hovering between democracy and communism concerning the evils of the latter and the merits of our system of Government. In the case of the Spanish people, that work of education is more than half done: They are the one people in Europe who do not need to be told the evils of communism.

There is not a single family, not one, in all Spain which has not learned this lesson in the bloody school of Communist violence. There is not a single town in all Spain which hasn't tasted what communism has to offer. There is not a single diocese which does not have its list of martyred priests, nuns, and devoted laity. If our relief programs have for their partial purpose to provide education against communism, then the Spaniards have qualified for their place among our disciples—and their qualifications have been increased, not diminished, by the lies told about them here in America and among the United Nations during the past 15 years.

There must be very few people left who do not now realize who started these lies and who has kept them going and why. We may well thank God, as Catholics and as Americans, that the tide is beginning to turn and that we now may hear the truth about Spain; the truth about what Spain suffered from communism; the truth about what Spain did to prevent the spread of communism; the truth about what Spain can still do to prevent the spread of communism; that truth about Spain's place in Christendom and Spain's place in the Western World.

It may now be possible, at long last, to acquire and publicize the truth about Spain as told by our American Ambassador there during the recent war, Prof. Carleton Hayes. His book Mission to Spain received a systematic soft-pedaling from the fellow travelers and Red sympathizers who were so much more powerful when it was first published than they are now—thanks to the persistent, patient patriotism of men like Tom Murphy and those who have exposed the friends of communism in the Government bureaus, in the entertainment world, the publishing field, education and social circles, and political action.

We are told that even though Tito tramples both faith and freedom underfoot, still we should give him aid since, as Christians, we are bound to love even our enemies. This kind of talk always reminds us of the warning of the poet that the Devil can cite Scripture for his purpose. It is true that Christians are commanded to love their enemies. But that commandment does not require them to treat their friends with contempt; to starve their neighbors merely because they are not enemies; or to turn friends into enemies so that they may be eligible for our affection and aid.

If moral or humanitarian considerations require that we forgive Tito, then they certainly require that we forgive Spain whatever fancied case against the Spanish people we are told exists. They also require that we welcome Spain, a tried and tested foe of communism, a proven friend of Christendom, into whatever alliances of mutual benefit are being concocted in the present effort to turn back the tide of communism.

Certainly we are bound to make friends with our enemies—but no less certainly we are bound to make friends of our friends; to build on whatever foundations for friendship may exist; to pay due tribute to those who have proved themselves our friends by suffering at the hands of enemies who were practicing to turn on us.

I hope that you men will express your American and Christian satisfaction with the actions of those representatives who have helped make possible aid to Spain. I hope you will make clear to those who seek to prevent aid to Spain that their line is wearing thin, and that those who know where the real evil lies in the world at the moment are weary of that line, weary unto death.

So, too, the mask is off in China—and for that, too, we should be grimly grateful. We shall hear less talk about agrarian reformers in China, now that the agrarian reformers have beat their ploughshares into swords with which to slay our sons and brothers. We shall hear less about agrarian reformers—but we must not forget who they were who tried to sell the agrarian reformers to us.

What must be our reaction to all this? The Catholic approach to the problem of organizing a peaceful world is now what it has always been, despite the verbal attacks of the anti-Catholic or the violence of the Communists. It was restated effectively and beautifully by Monsignor Sheen in the first issue of a new publication called World Missions. He pointed out how Catholic missions are in great degree the home of humanity. One of the primary purposes of our foreign missions is to build not one world but rather one humanity, the one humanity which must exist before a united world is possible. "One world" is a political and economical concept. "One humanity" is a divine concept, something only God's grace can achieve. Monsignor Sheen put it well when he said, "The Catholic point of view is that humanity is made one, as a body is made one through a soul. When the Holy Spirit descended upon the Apostles, their discordant elements were fused into one body, and even one mind. The confusion of tongues was undone, and the poor divided speech which men had inherited from Babel's bricklayers now became one language and one mind.

"The purpose of the missions is not to unite the world in one political system or to make other countries all believers in a particular form of democracy, but to allow them great political diversity with unity in spirit. When the early church received the pentecostal outpouring, her members shared their property in common. This was the creation of one economic world, but the spirit was first. The Communists assume that if men share property, that therefore they are one in spirit. The fallacy is to assume that if four men divide an apple, they become brothers. Rather the Catholic position is that if they are first made brothers in Christ, then they will share the apple. The Catholic who regards the Chinese and Japanese, and Indians, and others, as his potential brothers, will translate this act of faith into positive mission aid, that they may become actual brothers in Christ, to the end that there may be one world because there is one humanity."

Wherefore, this afternoon I join in the resolutions your committee presents to this assembly. But I ask that either by formal resolution or by informal conviction you leave here united in: (1) Gratitude that at last token action has been taken to encourage the Spanish people in their repudiation of communism; (2) satisfaction, not complacent, but realistic, that at last the mask is off in China, as it long has been in Spain; (3) recognition that the cause of Catholic missions deserves a first place in the prayers, interests, and loyalties of all Holy Name men.

Men of the Holy Name Society, I repeat, pray for America. Pray for our President. Pray for his advisers, military, diplomatic, and political. He is faced with decisions such as few men in all recorded history have had to make. Pray that he will be God's instrument, our President and God's man.

RESOLUTIONS OF ARCHDIOCESAN UNION OF HOLY NAME SOCIETIES, ARCHDIOCESE OF BOSTON, TO BE PRESENTED AT THE OFFICERS' CONVENTION, DECEMBER 3, 1950, AT BOSTON, MASS.

1. GRATITUDE

Resolved, That the Archdiocesan Union of Holy Name Societies, its spiritual directors, officers, and members again offer their affectionate greetings to His Excellency, the Most Reverend Richard J. Cushing, D. D., Archbishop of Boston, and express their gratitude for his kind interest and inspirational leadership during the past year, and be it further

Resolved, That the Holy Name Society members once again present to His Excellency their expression of willingness to participate in whatever movement or action His Excellency may request during the coming year.

2. SPAIN

Resolved, That the Archdiocesan Union of Holy Name Societies commends the Government of the United States in its appointment of an Ambassador to Spain and for its economic aid extended to the people of Spain. It is belated recognition of the Christian spirit of a country, which despite opposition of communistic influences, extended cooperation to the United States in time of war. We realize that this recognition has been granted in the face of an unexplained attitude of some Americans of continued disregard of the possible contribution of Spain, imbued with the Christian spirit of charity and peace, to the peace of the world. It is a spirit which is sympathetic to the liberties and ideals of the United States of America, and which will prove a most valuable ally in the campaign of freedom-loving peoples against the forces of diabolic communism rampant in the world today.

3. CHINA

While the Archdiocesan Union deplores the extended delay, nevertheless we appreciate the awakening of the American people to the dangers of communism in general.

Our union, moreover, is appreciative that the menace to world peace as represented by the Communist activities in China has finally been unmasked.

We particularly call to the attention of our fellow citizens the fact that this particular menace of communism in China was pointed out in clear and unmistakable language by His Excellency Richard J. Cushing, D. D., Archbishop of Boston, 2 years ago.

We can only urge our fellow citizens at this late hour to hearken at least to the solution proposed by our church and by His Excellency, that Americans of all faiths turn to the only source of justice—Almighty God. May we seek solace for the burden of sorrow and misery that has fallen upon us through our neglect or ignorance by praying Almighty God to bring universal peace.

4. YUGOSLAVIA

Whereas the imprisonment of Archbishop Stepinac has become a world-wide symbol of oppression of religion in Yugoslavia; and

Whereas the United States Government has demonstrated an increasing willingness to aid the Communist regime of Marshall Tito of Yugoslavia; and

Whereas it is felt that our aid at this time will serve to bolster this antireligious government: Be it

Resolved, That the Archdiocesan Union strongly protests the extension of aid to Yugoslavia until that country adopts a policy of religious freedom evidenced in part by the unconditional release of Archbishop Stepinac; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the Secretary of State, the members of the Appropriations Committee, the Senators from Massachusetts, and the Congressmen from eastern Massachusetts.

5. FATIMA

Whereas the mother of God has appeared within our generation to three children at Fatima in Portugal in six different apparitions; and

Whereas the final apparition was accompanied by visible and clearly defined supernatural signs witnessed by thousands of people, including unbelievers and completely disinterested agnostics; and

Whereas the theme of the message of the mother of God was world peace and the conversion of Russia through prayer, and particularly through the rosary; and

Whereas his excellency, the most reverend archbishop, has instituted the public recitation of the rosary each day by means of the radio: Be it

Resolved, That the members of the Holy Name Society do everything within their power to spread the message of Fatima and in particular the archdiocesan recitation of the rosary by participation and by their active financial support.

6. TELEVISION

Whereas the rapid growth of the television industry has already exerted a profound influence on family entertainment habits; and

Whereas, due to this rapid growth, and to improper safeguards by the industry, much indecent and highly objectionable matter has crept into both script and pictures; and

Whereas this medium so directly and so intimately affects the family—especially the children: Be it

Resolved—

1. That the Archdiocesan Union of Holy Name Societies deplores the introduction of obscenity and needless brutality in script and in pictures on television programs; and

2. That the Archdiocesan Union of Holy Name Societies direct its executive board to express in writing its concern over this situation, addressing letters to the four major networks and the two Boston channels; and

3. That the Archdiocesan Union of Holy Name Societies urges upon all its officers and members the need for them to guard their children against the harm which the improper type of telecast may do while at the same time stimulating an appreciation of the potential greatness of television.

7. COLLABORATORS

Whereas many American citizens have displayed an alarming apathy toward the trend of communism in our country; and

Whereas this apathy is particularly shown by those who carry on trade privately with communistic lands, and those who indirectly provide munitions, and by those who rent and provide offices, meeting halls, and store facilities for the Communist Party to meet and to distribute literature and information; and

Whereas the recent statement of the Department of Justice has made clear beyond all doubt the un-American and treasonable nature of the Communist Party and its subservience to Moscow: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Archdiocesan Union of Holy Name Societies deplores this indifference and lethargy of some of our fellow citizens and urges all patriotic fellow citizens to manifest their dismay and displeasure toward those who deliberately continue to give such aid and comfort to the avowed enemies of America, by discouraging any and all business transactions with these unpatriotic individuals and concerns.

8. IRON CURTAIN

Whereas the people behind the iron curtain—dominated by Communist Russia—through her satellite governments—are subject to all the encroachments on human rights which are characteristic of the dictatorial rule of a police state; and

Whereas they are denied the right of worship through the confiscation of their churches, schools, and imprisonment of their clergy; and

Whereas they are enslaved and denied the liberty of a free ballot to elect governments of their own choice: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That this convention requests, through our Congress, that the Government of the United States, through the Voice of Freedom and every means possible, encourage and assist these people and other countries to regain their fundamental freedoms; and be it further

Resolved, That the Archdiocesan Union of Holy Name Societies offers its sympathy and the prayers of its members to those suffering beneath these burdens.

9. AUXILIARY BISHOPS

Resolved, That the Archdiocesan Union of Holy Name Societies congratulates our former beloved auxiliary bishop, Most Rev. John J. Wright, D. D., past president of St. Angela's Parish Society, on his appointment as bishop of the new diocese of Worcester, Mass., and two stanch and beloved friends of the Holy Name Society in their installation as auxiliary bishops of the archdiocese of Boston, Most Rev. Eric F. MacKenzie, D. D., of Newton, and Most Rev. Thomas F. Markham, D. D., of Lowell.

10. PUBLIC HONOR TO THE HOLY NAME

Whereas the Holy Name Society is established to honor the name of God in words of praise and actions of virtue, especially by public devotions; and

Whereas such manifestations of love will reap countless graces and other spiritual privileges for the members: Be it

Resolved, That each member of the Holy Name Society make every endeavor to promote more visibly his love for God through constant faithfulness to the wearing of the Holy Name button, through participation in public Holy Name demonstrations, especially the monthly outdoor parish society procession, and through fervent and faithful public devotion in an oral manner on Holy Name Sundays during Mass.

11. REMOVAL OF PARTITION

Whereas a partition, unjustly maintained by a foreign power, divides the nation of Ireland, and separates the people of the north from the progress and Christian culture of the Republic of Ireland; and

Whereas by a process of political gerrymandering, coupled with intolerance, our fellow Catholics in the north are deprived of a full voice in the affairs of state and unjustly excluded from business, educational, housing, and political opportunities; and

Whereas in the partitioned area are the sites of the beginning of Christian civilization in Ireland, the see of Armegh and other religious places of devotion for the people of Irish blood;

Whereas the taxpayers of the freedom-loving American people is being disbursed in the form of European recovery aid to England, which, in turn, is subsidizing a minority form of government, and maintaining a foreign army in the north of Ireland, which is contrary to the wishes of the majority of the Irish people: Be it hereby

Resolved, That the Archdiocesan Union will urge our representatives in Congress in matters of distribution of ERA funds, to point out to the Government of England the necessity of remedying this situation immediately for the sake of justice, and to prevent further waste of the American taxpayers' money.

Presented by 1950 Resolutions Committee: Frederick D. Higgins, Sr., of Charlestown; John H. Casey, of Somerville; Edward F. Flynn, Jr., of Swampscott; Donald J. White, of Quincy; Edward F. Barrett, of Jamaica Plain; Joseph Mqlopepszy, of Chelsea; members ex officio: Rev. Francis F. McElroy, Thomas H. Buckley, of Abington.

(The resolutions committee is deeply grateful to the deaneries and their representatives, as well as the individual members who sent in resolutions to be acted upon. Deaneries submitting resolutions were: Essex, Middlesex North, Middlesex South, Suffolk North, Suffolk South.)

Revolutionary Wartime Controls

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD H. JENISON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 20, 1950

Mr. JENISON. Mr. Speaker, my attention has been called to an interesting article written back in 1779, but so appropriate to the present in the light of current discussion of the necessity for economic controls that I am sure Members of Congress will find it revealing. Under permission granted by the House, I am including the article in the Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The article was republished in the November 1950 edition of Faith and Freedom, a monthly journal of spiritual mobilization. The author was Pelatiah Webster, who first published the essay from which the present article was condensed, in Philadelphia in July 1779. At that time, too, our country was plagued with the pressures of war. The reader will find an interesting similarity between the controls of Webster's time and those of today. The article follows:

REVOLUTIONARY WARTIME CONTROLS—TO FIND GREATER ABRIDGMENT OF LIBERTY AMONG THE FIRST EFFECTS OF INDEPENDENCE WAS A SAD OMEN FOR THIS PATRIOT

(By Pelatiah Webster)

Freedom of trade, or unrestrained liberty of the subject to hold or dispose of his property as he pleases, is absolutely necessary to the prosperity of every community, and to the happiness of all individuals who compose it: this liberty will produce the following effects:

1. Every industrious man will procure all the goods he can for sale; this the way to get most money; and gain is the soul of industry, the hope of reward sweetens labor, and the most righteous have respect to the recompense of reward.

2. Every man will make his goods for market of the best quality he can, because they will bring more money and quicker sale than goods of mean quality.

THE DIRECTION OF PRICE

3. Every man will endeavor to carry to market the most scarce goods because there is the greatest demand and best price for them. All experience shows that the most effectual way to turn a scarcity into a plenty is to raise the price of the articles wanted: witness, among other instances, the most alarming scarcity of saltpeter and gunpowder, in the beginning of the present war, succeeded by the most abundant plenty in less than 1 year, affected altogether by the high price and premiums set on them.

4. Every man will go to market and return in good humor and full satisfaction, even though he may be disappointed of the high price he expected, because he has had the full chance of the market, and can blame nobody; and should he indulge fretting on the occasion, he would be the more ridiculed, and less pitied by his neighbors: and good humor and satisfaction contribute not a little to the happiness and prosperity of communities, as well as individuals; and therefore this is an article by no means to be left out or overlooked in the administration of either public or private money.

IN TIME OF SCARCITY

5. When things grow scarce and dear, every man will use them with the best economy, and make the stock on hand go as far and last as long as possible; or if he is destitute, will buy as little as will just serve his necessity. This naturally preserves the stock on hand from needless profusion and waste, and converts it to the best and most prudent use for the benefit of the community, and naturally tends to ward off high distress or total want, till the high price and great demand, by their natural operation, will bring further supplies to market.

In times of scarcity, every man will have strong inducements to bring all he can spare to market, because it will then bring the highest price he can ever expect, and consequently the community will have the benefit of all that exists among them, in a much surer manner than any degree of force could extort it, and all to the entire satisfaction of buyer and seller; by which the numberless feuds, riots, resentments, and mischiefs which usually attend forced markets, would be entirely avoided; and the market be supplied with all there is to be had. For no principle can draw into market all the supplies which are attainable, so effectively, as the cheerful good will and interest of the owners.

7. In times of scarcity, when all the goods that are to be had are exposed to sale, it is not possible the prices should exceed the degree of scarcity, for when the prices rise very high, they will soon determine whether the scarcity is real or not; for if not real the high price will bring such quantity to market as will soon lower the price; but if real, it is necessary for the above reasons that prices should continue high till supplies are produced.

Restraint of property or limitation of prices will hurt any community and probably produce the following effects, contrary to the above:

1. Every man will have as little to do with the market, and bring as few goods there as he can; for the less goods he has for sale, the less mortification and loss he sustains.

2. Every man will make his goods for market of a bad quality, or at least not the best; for they must all go at the limited price, and he therefore gets nothing for any special care or skill he may bestow on his goods to meliorate or perfect their quality; for example, musty tea, stale flour, black heavy bread, etc.

3. Every man is induced to keep such goods as are most scarce from market; for if he carries them there, he can get no more than the limited price, and stands a chance of a bad hustling in the crowd into the bargain. Whereas, if he can keep his goods from market, the scarcity will soon force a great price, and he has a chance of great profits.

4. If prices are limited, and the owner is compelled to sell at the prices limited, he considers himself injured by every sale he makes for less than he supposes he could have obtained in a free market; that his liberty is taken from him, and he can no longer call his property his own. These are hard feelings to one born to freedom almost perfect, and raised to the expectations of enjoying it in future time, in its highest perfection. These feelings fill the mind with anxiety and resentment, and when instances of this become numerous among the merchants, tradesmen, and farmers, small accidents may blow up the concealed goal, and most fatal effects may easily be supposed to ensue. This is a danger of no small magnitude, for the real strength and establishment of every government consists in the hearty union and satisfaction of the individuals that compose it.

NO INDUCEMENT TO PARSIMONY

5. In time of danger, distress, and difficulty, no man will be induced to any great efforts to supply the market; for an additional danger makes an additional expense upon the goods; but he must take the limited price and no more; he will not consequently combat or risk an increase of danger and expense without any chance of compensation.

6. When things grow scarce, every man will endeavor to lay in great stores if he can do it without an increase of price, and will not think it necessary to retrench his expenses, while he thinks his stock will last through the scarcity; the consequence of which is, that all the scarce articles at market will be scrambled up by a few hands, who will have no inducement to parsimony in the expenditure of them, by which the scarcity and distress are increased and many must be wholly destitute; and as far as this respects the necessaries of life, the consequences must be dreadful.

7. Add to the above, that in times of scarcity and great demand, every man who can possibly conceal his goods will be tempted to do it, in expectation that the great demand will soon break through the unnatural restraint of the limitation, and he shall be able to obtain a great profit in the future sale; and in spite of all the vigilance and force that can be used, many will be able to do this; which I take to be one of the natural effects of any unnatural restraint of trade, which cannot be avoided.

8. In addition to all these, the difficulties which must attend the execution of such an act of limitation, may perhaps furnish not the least objection to it. Must the owner be obliged to sell to every person who applies to purchase, without knowing whether he wants for use or sale? Must he forego previous engagements of his goods in favor of the present demandant? Must he be obliged to sell to every knave and litigious fellow, with whom he would not choose to be at all concerned in any dealing? Who shall judge how much he may reserve for his own use, and whether he may give corn to his cattle and hogs, and how much, and how many of each he may keep, etc. etc.? Must he have his house searched from top to bottom for concealment? Even the lodging rooms of his wife and daughters? I must beg to be excused from any further description of these horrors, which too many know are not mere creatures of the imagination.

9. It is not possible to form a limitation of prices which shall be just, and therefore the whole scheme necessarily implies injustice. The principles on which the just prices of goods are fixed are in a constant state of fluctuation, and therefore the prices must rise and fall with their causes: all experience proves this, and it holds true in the most excessive degree, in times of such public distress and convulsion as we now experience. And as it is much safer to bind a man in health than a man in convulsions, so it will be safer to limit trade in peaceable than convulsed times. It is not more absurd to limit the precise height to which a ship shall be fixed at a wharf, where the tide is constantly ebbing and flowing. A great force will be requisite to keep the ship from rising or falling with the tide, and a mighty little use to pay for the trouble; besides the probability of very essential damage which the ship must incur by the application of the necessary force; but, indiscreet as this would be judged, it is less dangerous in a calm than in a stormy season.

THE MORAL CONSEQUENCES

10. Another mischievous consequence of this fatal measure, and not the least, I conceive to be its unhappy tendency to corrupt the morals and integrity of the people. To escape the ruinous consequences of losing in their sales, they are in a manner compelled, but to say the least, they have very strong temptation, either by downright lying, or using little arts, shifts, and cheats, to avoid the sale of their goods to disadvantage. This naturally brings them into the habit, and gives them a facility of inventing and practicing low methods of shaming Abraham, which they never would otherwise have thought of, and which it is infintely detrimental to the public, they ever should learn; instances of this sort might be enumerated without end. But it is needless to give examples, it were better they and their causes should be removed than that they should be repeated.

THE WAY IT WORKED

For 10 months before the late limitations, we had a trade perfectly free, on which two observations are obvious:

1. That any goods at market might be bought for continental money, the speculators especially (as they are called) were fond of receiving it, and no person could be at any loss for any thing at market if he had that money to purchase the goods he needed.

2. That imported goods on an average (which were the only articles speculators dealt in) were 50 percent cheaper on the 25th of May last, than on the 25th of July preceding, i. e., any given quantity of imported goods would buy 50 percent more articles of country produce, or hard money, on the 25th of July, than on the 25th of May last; and for the truth of this, I refer to the merchants' books; from which it follows that the speculators (however numerous and however censured) have not raised the price of the goods they have principally dealt in.

On July 25, 1778, price current of imported goods, at Philadelphia, was as follows: West-India rum, 3 pounds 15 shillings; Mufcovado sugars, 30 pounds; molasses, 40 shillings; pepper, 17 shillings 6 pence; coffee, 9 shillings; cotton, 15 shillings; bohea tea, 60 shillings; Madeira wine, 400 pounds; dry goods about 8 to 1 old prices, and hard money 4 to 1, and price current of country produce, was as follows: For Indian corn, 15 shillings; oats, 12 shillings; flour, 60 shillings; bar iron, 200 pounds. Consequently on July 25, 1778, 1 gallon of West-India rum would bring 5 bushels of Indian corn, 6 bushels of oats, 1¼ hundred of flour, and two-fifths of a hundred of iron, or 18 shillings 9 pence hard money; anybody may easily compare the rest, and they will find enough to prove my assertion with large allowance. Price current 25th of May last was, rum, 7 pounds; sugars, 130 pounds; iron, 800 pounds; tea, 6 pounds 10 shillings, etc. Indian corn, 7 pounds 10 shillings; oats, 90 shillings; flour, 30 pounds (hard money 20 to 1), and consequently 1 gallon of rum would buy no more than 1 bushel of Indian corn, 1½ bushels of oats, one-fourth hundred flour, and two-fifths hundred iron or 7 shillings hard money, etc. These computations are made in the face of the world, and grounded on facts which anybody may disprove if they are not true, or correct the reasoning if it is not just. Now I have only to add—let anybody who is disposed to see, open his eyes, and see who it is that has raised our prices, or which is the same thing, depreciated our money. Is it the speculators who deal only in imported articles? Or the farmers, among whom no kind of dangerous speculation does or can exist? Perhaps it may be replied here that the articles of country produce are extremely scarce, which raises their price beyond the due proportion of other things. If you say this, you say everything and yield everything, viz, that the plenty and scarcity of goods will govern the price. You must admit, too, that the plenty and scarcity of money will determine the value of that also. Why then will anyone pretend to limit either, against the operation of this great principle?

AN INESCAPABLE RECKONING

We are now on the brink of ruin, and the worst disgrace, in danger of loss of liberty hitherto nobly asserted, and subjection to shameful slavery to enemies most cruel and insulting in themselves, and all that heightened in them to madness by the determined opposition we have given to their scheme of tyranny over us. All this danger arises not from our poverty or want, for we have officers and soldiers enough, stores of every kind enough, and zeal, union, and virtue sufficient to insure success; our difficulties arise only from our having too much money.

Every man ought to consider that his proportion of the public debt is as much a debt fastened on his estate, and becomes to all intents and purposes as much a burden and charge on it, as any of his private debts of the same amount, and must as surely one day be paid; is it not better then to pay it now than to have it lie a burden on him, to be paid in future time, which may be called for when he may not be in condition to pay it so easy as now? Every prudent man does this with respect to his private debts, and what reason can be given why the same prudence should not extend to the debt which he owes the public? Can any reason be assigned why the States should not imitate the prudence and economy of a private man, who happens to be involved for a time in great expenditures, which is, to pay up and discharge as much as possible as he goes, and leave as little as possible to be settled in future time?

LET TRADE BE AS FREE AS AIR

To facilitate this, I humbly propose one thing more, viz, to take off every restraint and limitation from our commerce. Let trade be as free as air. Let every man make the most of his goods and in his own way, and then he will be satisfied. Let every man taste and enjoy the sweets of that liberty of person and property which was highly expected under an independent government. It is a sad omen to find among the first effects of independence, greater restraints and abridgements of natural liberty, than ever we felt under the government we have lately renounced and shaken off. Let the laws point out the duty, and be the bulwark of security of every man.

Nothing gives the people such high satisfaction with any system of government they live under, as the actual enjoyment of the inestimable blessings of perfect liberty and full security under it; this will most effectively induce them cheerfully to support it. No burdens will be thought heavy, or difficulties discouraging, which the exigencies of government may require, when every man finds his own happiness involved in the establishment of the state.

Thus, I have offered my best thoughts freely to the public, and with most upright intentions; I hope they may be received with candor. The facts and reasonings are all open to the examination of everyone; if they do not convince, I hope at least they may induce some abler person to sketch out something more perfect and adequate to the great subject.

Military and Economic Problems Confronting the Pacific Northwest

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE MORSE
OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, December 21 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter which a citizen of my State, by the name of Mike Jenney, has sent to a large number of businessmen in the Pacific Northwest in which he discusses public reactions to our military and economic problems as he finds them in carrying out the duties of his work as head of a credit service agency.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PIONEER SERVICE CO., INC.,
Eugene, Oreg., December 1950.

GENTLEMEN: All of the letters that I have tried to write, and have written in the last several years, were easy compared with this one, for the simple reason that things are now moving so fast that when you go to bed at night all you know is that you will have an entirely different set of events and conditions to look at the moment you glance at your morning paper—and even more since the Korean war has been thrown into reverse.

In this letter I am going to try to eliminate mention of the war, because that is a book by itself. I am going to try to give some particular facts to quite a few of you businessmen who do not have a chance to keep up on local conditions as you should—let alone world conditions—because a man has his hands full these days in trying to run his own immediate business.

First, let us clear the decks for action, because, after the 1st of the year, the taxes that you will be paying are going to make you feel out of this world as far as making ends meet. (It is hard not to use the words "war conditions," for our great national debt now is only a drop in the bucket to what it will be if this is the start of world war III.) From what I can read in the latest financial magazines, these taxes are going to come from the small businessmen and private individuals more than from the large corporations. A glance at the December 1 issue of the United States News will show what I mean. Then, employment conditions are going to be tough, because as the Government controls are put into effect and tightened down, men will be leaving your immediate territory to go to other towns.

According to an announcement in the Portland Oregonian of November 29, Edgar F. Kaiser, of the Kaiser-Fraser automobile company, is already set to get back into the shipbuilding business again. If these war conditions continue in a big way, you will have your employees leaving to go to the larger cities where the Government program will go into effect. The automotive trade will be hard hit, due to the curtailment on cars. The building trades will be curtailed a lot, but from the information I have it will take 5 or 6 months to complete the dwellings now under construction. After that, the building trades will suffer, and a lot of men will be laid off, such as carpenters, bricklayers, plumbers, electricians, and common laborers. It is to be supposed, naturally, that these, later, will be absorbed into the Government program of war preparations. But while the Government program is getting under way there will be a lull and quite a lot of unemployment. Therefore, men who are good credit risks now will cease to be such, because their earning power will have stopped. Another hardship, as an effect of this, will fall on the merchants who have become heavily involved in consumer credit; and there will be a lot of repossession of such merchandise as cars, television sets, ice boxes, radios, washers, and other electrical contrivances. Merchants who have been doing an extensive credit business will be hit hard, as a lot of these people will be leaving their present homes and moving into the manufacturing centers of war supplies. In Eugene, and Lane and Douglas Counties—in fact in most of the lumbering territory between Portland and Ashland, Oreg., and between the Cascades and the Pacific Ocean—the lumber industry is not enjoying the good business that it did some time ago. All that is needed to realize this is to observe how the businessmen here in Eugene (which is the lumber center of the world) started in before Thanksgiving decorating their stores and broadcasting their Christmas programs and putting on big sales to help promote business. (Personally, I have heard a lot of complaints from individuals that the merchants were commercializing the season too much, and putting Christmas ahead of Thanksgiving.) But, on the other hand, you can't blame the merchant. I am afraid that after Christmas there is going to be an awful kick-back, because the average person who carries the dinner bucket and works for wages (I mean the unskilled person, like the clerk, the bookkeeper, and the laboring man who doesn't belong to the unions) makes up two-thirds of the population; and this two-thirds is supporting the other one-third—the skilled labor that is organized, such as workers in steel mills and in the automotive and building trades, factories, and lumbering.

For instance, listen to this:

"A boss roller in the steel mill, working with his hands, can earn $15,000 to $18,000 a year. Die-sinkers with an income of $10,000 a year are fairly common in the automobile industry. Top mechanics in big cities, who never thought of college, often are taking home $12,000 to $15,000 a year. Bricklayers on a 40-hour week who are working the year round are making from $6,760 a year up; and the bricklayer who works 50 hours a week for 6 months earns $4,280 a year. Plasterers generally have the same opportunity as bricklayers and get the same wage. A carpenter working full time can earn $8,000 a year."

Now, the reason I am citing these figures is to give you an idea of how labor is organized to fight for higher wages. In reality, you cannot always blame these men in the steel game, and in the automobile game, when you figure the amount of profit these big organizations are realizing. But here is the rub: the other two-thirds of the people (such as clerks, bookkeepers, white-collar workers, and unskilled workers generally), these people are fortunate if they can earn $200 a month, though some of the more fortunate may come under the $250 rap.

Reading the morning papers today (November 29) I see where the high cost of living reached an all-time high October 15; and the latest dope is that it is going to keep on rising. That may be all right for the laborer who is tied in, say, with General Motors in their system of "If living prices rise, wages will rise also," but I would say that the average laboring man, and even the average businessman who is not in position to get a rise in wages, or the businessman who has a fixed salary and is not earning at least $5,000 a year, is certainly up against it.

I wish our lawmakers would get out and circulate among the laboring class of people—the farmers who are not classed as wheat farmers or stockmen, or farmers who did not have a good acreage of sugar beets, as in the Snake River Valley and certain parts of eastern Oregon, as well as parts of Utah and eastern Idaho. I am speaking of the broad area that we ourselves circulate in (Oregon, Idaho, Utah, and Nevada).

When I was in Nevada, a short time ago, and contacting a large number of merchants in the towns of Winnemucca, Elko, Wells, and Battle Mountain, I found that those merchants were having as hard a time to make all ends meet as the merchants here in Oregon in the timber belt. I found that even the gambling houses this year have not been doing too well, due to the fact that the tourists, whom they have to bank on for the biggest part of their revenue, were not spending their money. Naturally, the cattle industry and the mining industry were functioning on high; but when I got into the Magic Valley of Idaho I found that the farmers who were raising beans were getting a good price because there was a priority. Red clover seed was paying a fair profit; but I found that they had to take a good percentage of the profit they made from raising beans to pay for the potatoes they couldn't have dug if it hadn't been for the profit on their bean crop—because it took money to dig those potatoes, sack them, and store them, as many farmers were doing and hoping for a stronger market later on. But when the priority is taken off, it is going to be just too bad for these potato men unless the war increases the demand (which undoubtedly it will).

Over in the Snake River Valley where the row croppers were depending on their potatoes, onions, and lettuce, they were all behind the eight ball. The onion situation was terrible. I have seen thousands of sacks of onions that I don't think were ever marketed, any many acres that were never dug. In one city I saw a big dump-yard of onions, and people were going out there and getting all the onions they wanted. The lettuce situation was bad also; and that goes for potatoes as well. The sugar beets were a life-saver, because they had a good priority. They really paved the way.

Here in the State of Oregon, the lumber industry has had a boom year, but a lot of small mills have suffered—first by car shortage and then by the drop in the lumber market. Of course the lumber business had started in gaining momentum again when the market leveled off; but weather conditions will be hindering; snows in the mountains, and rain and mud will make the logging roads to the main highways almost impassable. Then the curtailing by the Government of the building trade will have its effect, also. When you consider that some 65 percent of the business between San Francisco and Vancouver, B. C., hinges on lumber, you can see what the reflection will be on business in general.

Now, gentlemen, I am speaking for the Northwest. Naturally, the wheat people in Washington and Idaho and Eastern Oregon—I mean the wheat farmers—have really gone to town. Weather conditions this fall in most cases have been ideal for good crops this coming year. Millions of bushels have been dumped on the ground (no storage); and yet the cost of bread hasn't dropped any, nor the cost of breakfast cereals either.

Here is one thing I am going to criticize our Congress for: These men (I don't say all of them, because WAYNE MORSE, GUY CORDON, HARRIS ELLSWORTH, LOWELL STOCKMAN, and HOMER ANGELL, I am sure, have done all they could to get price controls put back to help hold wages and prices of foodstuffs in line), some of these Congressmen worked persistently to block price and wage controls, even when they should have known that people who cannot afford to pay these prices and the high cost of rents are being hurt. For the life of me, I cannot understand why Congress cannot see this. One of these days they are going to ask for a bond drive. The businessmen and the public have already been asked for funds for the Community Chests, the Red Cross, and other charitable causes. I ask you this question: How in the name of common sense can a man with a wife and two or three children buy meat and bread and butter and milk and eggs and (if he is trading in town) the greenery and fruit that are needed for a balanced diet (especially when so many of these people have obligated themselves through the medium of consumer credit and have withdrawn most of their savings, and in many cases all of them)? And take a look at the E-bonds that have been drawn out and put into circulation to buy cars, refrigerators, television sets, washing machines, radios, and furniture. One city recorder told me (he was from one of the towns in the Magic Valley) that virtually everybody in his town had a mortgage on his home. If you will take a glance at the mortgage debt of the people of the United States, it will astound you.

Now, the businessman is on the spot in a big way because his inventory during these war conditions is going to cut, it is going to be harder for him to get the merchandise he needs to sell; and the people he is carrying on his books (I mean the good ones), when they start going bad—well, he is going to have to learn all over again. According to the Morning Oregonian and financial magazines I have read, the Federal Reserve Board is bearing down on the banks to hold down on their loans to the businessmen. That means less money for operating costs.

This is not a pretty picture, is it? Now, with consumer credit considerably over the one billion mark (which means an individual debt of at least $125 for virtually every man, woman, and child), you can see what this inflationary spiral of wages and prices is going to do, and is doing, to the average American family.

I have had big cattlemen tell me personally that they knew the cost of beef was out of line; and I have heard some of them holler their heads off because of the price that they had to pay for a good steak. I asked one cattleman how long these retail prices of beef would last, and he said, "Just as long as people will pay them." We cannot blame the cattleman for what he is taking because it is a condition that the man is forced into. Some of these fellows have blamed this condition on the retail butcher; and, when you talk to some of the retailers, they try to lay the blame on the packer; and the packer, so I have been told, lays it on the stockman who is getting such a high price for his cattle and sheep.

Now, to me there has got to be a source of everything, and I believe in going to the very bottom of this situation and finding out just what is wrong.

One time when I was in Lakeview, Oreg., a big buyer for the steamship lines had just bought the wool clip for 11 cents a pound. I asked him if the grower could make any money on this. He said he thought they made a little. This was before the war. Now, naturally, conditions have changed a lot, but I really doubt if they have changed as much as that.

From what I can gather by reading of these vast food sales that appear in the Portland papers (Portland being one of the high spots in the whole United States), it looks as if there is too much of a spread in prices to justify these prices remaining so high.

Now, talk to the average layman you meet on the street, regardless of whether he is an attendant in a service station, or a clerk in a grocery or dry goods store, or a stenographer (or any of these men who carry the dinner bucket, who are not working with organized labor), and you will find that he is having a terrible time to make ends meet, because after he has bought his food and paid his rent he hasn't much left. And these people who have been buying cars, homes, furniture, and electrical contrivances are having an even harder time.

If you could see the thickening of our monthly credit reports that we issue to some 1,400 business and professional men throughout the States of Oregon, Idaho, Utah, and Nevada, and see the number of delinquent debtors whose names are being turned in to us daily, you would understand better what I am trying to tell you.

You may feel that this picture is quite gloomy, but this is why the Government had to put regulation W back, and why it had to cut back on the building trade. Many of our veterans were paying virtually nothing down on the homes they were buying, and many of our people were being forced out of their apartments and homes and forced to build some kind of a house because the monthly rentals they had to pay were higher than what they had to pay in installments on the homes they were building or buying.

Anyone who gets around over our four States as I do, and as my men do, can see exactly what we see and know it is the truth.

All of our clients that we have organized throughout these four States of Oregon, Idaho, Utah, and Nevada, through the media of our Pioneer Service Co. county and Statewide credit boards, are in a better position to meet conditions because the information that each one is giving the other members through the medium of our State and division office here in Eugene is giving that protection which is going to be invaluable from now on because, undoubtedly, people will be asking for more credit than ever before.

Conditions will get better as time goes on, but we are now in the leveling-off period. One boom is over (this war stopped it cold); but when the Government gets to spending all the money they will need for war production and ships and airplanes, another boom will start. Times should be good in the future; but this period in between is going to cause some business failures because there are just too many in business, as I think you businessmen will agree. To undertand what I mean, all you need do is remember how many vacant buildings there were on your main and side streets during the last war. Your wholesale houses are aware of this fact, and your banks know the danger. If this war turns out to be world war III, the grandfathers and the grandmothers will be called on to take over and run a lot of the small businesses (as they did during the last war) because manpower and labor will be so scarce it will be pathetic.

Now, I want you to know that this is a true picture of what the future looks like to me. What I have written here is what I have gathered from the biggest and best financial magazines and newspapers, plus my personal contacts and the contacts of my men who are moving about among the businessmen in these four States throughout the entire year.

But remember, gentlemen, every cloud has a silver lining. Our present conditions may clear up more than we expect them to, because past history has proved that we come through in a big way when the chips are down. I think that if all of us American people put our shoulders to the wheel, cut out this political battle (regardless of whether we are good Democrats or good Republicans), and place America first, and take time out to write to our Senators and Representatives back in Washington, giving them all the support we possibly can, as well as our ideas, telling them what we suggest they do, and ask them to cut out these political battles and play ball, remembering that in a time of crisis such as this we are "all for one and one for all," a united America, we will get results.

Now, I want to take this opportunity to thank all of our clients who are members of our Pioneer Service Co. State-wide organizations for your fine cooperation. You have not only been helping yourself during these trying times, but you have been helping to build up an organization of business and professional men and are making conditions better by so doing.

Here's hoping that you will get out your Pioneer service books and service any of your accounts that need it. Keep this information flowing in to our State and division office so we may in turn be able to place this information on our monthly credit reports, which give each businessman a better chance to know whom to loan his money to.

Due to the fact that so many people will be moving around, be sure to watch your skip list, that you receive every month, closely.

Be sure to check your monthly credit reports carefully.

Use our application form for credit card at all times in opening up new accounts.

This is a long letter, but I think after you have read it you will feel that it contains much food for thought.

Sincerely yours,

MIKE JENNEY,
General Manager.

The Battle for Freedom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 6, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to direct the attention of my colleagues to the following address by Conrad N. Hilton, president, Hilton Hotels Corp., at a dinner meeting of the National Conference of Christians and Jews, at Hotel Waldorf-Astoria, November 21, 1950, at which the conference presented its brotherhood award to Mr. Hilton:

THE BATTLE FOR FREEDOM

Mr. Chairman, honored guests, ladies, and gentlemen, it would be interesting to speculate how the historians of the future will characterize our times. Most of us here this evening will admit that our age must be distinguished by a tremendous onslaught of pagan ideas against our traditional western occidental state of society, and even state of mind. Those future historians cannot fail to see that all of our ideas of peace, of human dignity, of freedom, of all the values considered universal and basic, have been discarded by a great bloc of our human family.

It is in the spirit of that peace, of that human dignity, and of that freedom that we are thoughtfully gathered here this evening in our Conference of Christians and Jews. You have especially honored me tonight, honored me in a fashion that I greatly appreciate, for which I am deeply and humbly grateful.

With you I am eager to promote justice, unity, understanding, and cooperation among Protestants, Catholics, and Jews—happy to one day eliminate intergroup prejudices which disfigure our religious, social, and political relations. It will be a day of great thanksgiving when we possess a social order in which the religious ideals of brotherhood and justice shall become the standards of human relationships.

If there is one thing that this world of ours needs today, ladies and gentlemen, it is that ideal of brotherhood and justice.

In 1917 many of us here this evening went off to the wars to achieve exactly that. We were freemen fighting for freedom, fighting for peace, fighting a war to end war forever. I took part in that war and I was in Paris the day President Wilson was driven down the Champs Elysees acclaimed by hundreds of thousands of people. His 14 points were to bring peace to all peoples. Just a few months later he was to die of a broken heart. His 14 points were ignored, even violently opposed, at Versailles.

PEACE ELUDES US

Twenty-five years later our sons went off to successfully fight another battle for freedom, temporary freedom. Again we lost the peace, for we blindly destroyed our mighty arsenal of military power before we had peace firmly in our grasp. We surrendered the opportunity and the power to demand a just and lasting peace. We must ask: To what purpose have we spent our blood and wealth in two World Wars? American boys who were 13 years old on VJ-day (in 1945) are now being drafted for military service. Perhaps it is simple retributive justice that compels us to face the awful prospect of another war; for we have neglected, abandoned, and betrayed those great principles to which we dedicated ourselves for the establishment of peace. We have broken faith with those who fought and died for freedom and who warned us—

"If you break faith with us who die
we shall not sleep."

If we believe what they said, we here tonight know that these boys do not sleep in peace, and we also know that we do not live in peace—and why? Because when the boys had won their victories at arms we permitted the forces of hate, injustice, and appeasement to take the victories from them.

Across the world the boys of two wars have been betrayed. And in solemn truth I say to you, if we allow the forces of evil to refashion the world to their image and likeness, if we let hate, injustice, and appeasement guide us during these next few years, if we break faith with those boys who are now fighting and dying in distant lands, we shall never live in peace again.

Freedom, my fellow Americans, is foremost in our minds and hearts this evening; it is in the minds and hearts of all the world who look to us as the last sanctuary, the last bastion of free men. Since that first dawn when man stood before his Maker, all men have cherished this tremendous thing, this magnificent thing, that makes man a man—his freedom.

FREEDOM AND HUMAN DIGNITY

But what is this freedom? What right have we to it? Why are we unhappy unless we are free men? This is why: because we possess an intrinsic human dignity, an inner majesty, which gives us an appetite, a passion for freedom. But that human dignity is not ours because we are Americans or because we belong to the United Nations nor because we live in the twentieth century. It is not a veneer acquired by education or a national environment. Man possesses human dignity because he is made to the image and likeness of God. This image is found personally in every man; each one possesses it entirely and undividedly. It is this image that makes man different, that makes man a son of God. Without this image man has no free will and consequently neither liberty nor the capacity for liberty.

I am talking with you in this fashion, ladies and gentlemen, because I know you are religious men and women. Powerful adherents of great religions are here assembled in this Conference of Christians and Jews. We know that man has no meaning, no worth, no dignity apart from the image of God in him. It is through each of us, as persons, that all greatness springs; great art, great music, great accomplishments of a nation are born in the mind of the person. It is the person through whom God has chosen to manifest Himself. To many of the youngsters of 1950 this does not mean too much, but if they only knew, as we know, it is the basis of everything they fight and die for; the privilege to remain free men.

Whenever our boys go off to war we should make them aware of what they are doing in defending their liberty. Whether they know it or not they are going out to defend the image of God in themselves, in their families, in their countrymen, and to preserve it for unborn generations yet to come. To wage war for anything less, for economics or politics—especially total war—is monstrous. Edmund Burke once said, "The blood of man should never be shed but to redeem the blood of man." Only then will war ever bring a real, a lasting peace.

GOAL OF HUMAN PROGRESS

Peace, ladies and gentlemen, is more than the absence of war. It is a tranquillity of order, it is security, liberty—religious, political, and economic freedom. Peace permits men to traverse the high seas without hindrance; it permits all people to choose the form of government under which they will live; it permits all nations to dwell in safety within their own boundaries; it is abandonment of force and aggression; it is life with honor, life with the dignity of the children of God. It is both the implement and the goal of human progress. And because we are children of God, and hungry and thirsty for that strange freedom and stranger peace of religious men, we must never again cease our struggles until they are secure forever.

It was for that freedom and that peace we fought in 1917 and we did not get it. For that freedom and peace we are fighting now, we must be ready to fight tomorrow, and this time we had better get it or we shall see the end of our civilization.

This impending assault on human freedom is no new thing, no suddenly erupting danger insofar as history is concerned.

It was in the fourth century A. D. that Attila ravaged Europe in a mighty attempt to impose his dynasty upon the wreck of Rome. Eight centuries later it was the Mongols under Genghis Khan who embarked upon the conquest of the world. And again, the pagan tide was swept back by the defenders of freedom.

Now, after slumbering another eight centuries, the godless hordes are on the march again. They are fomenting trouble and dissension in every land. While the peace-loving nations demobilized and disarmed, they forged a military machine of terrifying proportions. They are endeavoring to add hundreds of millions of Chinese and other nationals to their manpower; they are the masters of the greatest land area of the world and are now arming with terrible atomic weapons. While this juggernaut, dedicated to the expulsion of God and the enslavement of the whole world, is gaining momentum, we have lagged on the road of preparedness and have hopefully pursued the mirage of peace.

NEW CONCEPTS OF WAR

War. Peace. The old notions of war and peace have gone out of the world. It could be that in our time we shall never have war and perhaps never have peace again. When we were younger and all down through history war meant armed hostility with another nation. Peace meant harmony, and friendly relations between nations.

But today are we at war with Russia? Are we at peace with Russia? Are we at war with China, with Poland, with Eastern Germany? Are we at peace with these nations? No, the old concepts of war and peace belong to a world which the Communists have destroyed. Communism is always at war. These evil men of the Kremlin are constantly feeling around the perimeter of their vast world, like a great spider—feeling, probing incessantly for military or political soft spots which will permit them to enmesh the world with their web of tyranny. They are satisfied with fragments of nations or whole nations. They took all of Poland, the Baltic States, all of Czechoslovakia, half of Germany, half of Korea, all of China. What about Rumania, Hungary, Bulgaria? We watch as their tentacles grasp for the colonial peoples of Asia, who, weakened by their struggles for freedom, may be a ready prey.

I have said that Communists wage war all the time, not only with guns, bombs, planes, and ships. In fact, the old concept of weapons is no more adequate than the old concept of war, or that of peace.

These dangerous and evil men are preoccupied with the intellectual and moral sabotage of free men everywhere.

They advocate class hatred, treason, and insurrection. Their spies and agents infiltrate into governments, industries, schools, and unions.

As their emissaries to the United Nations, they send trained obstructionists, whose chief mission is to harass, insult, slander, and vilify other members of the Council.

COMMUNISM CORRUPTS, DESTROYS

The essence of communism is the death of the individual and the burial of his remains in a collective mass. While the democracies of the world appeal to an individual's reason and morals, the Kremlin persuades its subjects with the slave camp and grave. To corrupt the minds and hearts of the individual or the nation they would destroy is much more satisfying than the destruction of that nation's factories or ports. They even conscript a part of the population in the very country whose ruin they plan. What evil is this that can make a captive American deny his wife, his children, and his country? What evil is this that can make a captive churchman repudiate his church and his God? What barbarous tortures were used to destroy the minds of these men? To the free nations bordering the iron curtain this is a fearful and terrifying menace. Its spreading, deadly poison has seeped into the councils of our own Nation. The entire diplomatic and political world of honest men seems confused as children in the presence of this monstrous reality. And the insidious thing, the frightening thing is this: It can win even when it is losing.

We have been following the path that is most helpful to the Soviet program. They want to keep us in our present state of imbalance, of war scare, while they go on annexing more countries or half countries, enslaving more and more populations. They want us to impose more and more controls on our free economy. They want us to curtail our most cherished liberties while we live with uncertainty and fear. They want us to live more and more on a constant war footing without being at war, without being at peace.

EUROPE WEARY OF WAR

Ladies and gentlemen, I returned yesterday from a 3 weeks' trip to Europe that took me to England, France, Italy, Greece, and Turkey. Communism and its inroads on the people were constantly on my mind. In the countries I visited, the people are weary and tired of war, and there seems to be a pervading fear, a hopelessness that a deluge of communism cannot long be stayed. Only in England and in Turkey is there a determined will to fight at any cost. In Turkey it is a crime to be a Communist, punishable by 20 years' imprisonment, and they are now proposing a law to inflict the death penalty for anyone convicted of being a Communist. The open defiance of communism by this little nation that lives precariously on the border of the iron curtain is a most courageous and heartening sight.

I wish everyone here this evening could have experienced my feelings when an Italian citizen handed me a newspaper in Rome one day. The head lines in one column said "28,000 American casualties in Korea." In another column was a Moscow date line of November 6 and I quote from it: "The United States Ambassador in Moscow, Alan G. Kirk, today sent a message to Soviet Deputy Foreign Minister Andrei A. Gromyko, conveying to the people of the Soviet Union the best wishes of the people of the United States on the occasion of the national holiday in Russia." This Roman citizen said to me, "Are your people so blind that they do not know who is responsible for those deaths in Korea? Or if they do know, how can your Government send best wishes to those responsible for killing your boys?"

Valiant little Greece, bled white by her long struggle against nazism and communism, is sustained by her spirit and the help she has received from America. A fine old gentleman in Athens, who lived through the successive invasions of Italy, Germany, and the Communists, told me of the many villages where every man and child had been kidnapped, where some villages had been left with as many as 1,500 women but not a single man, not one child. To this very day they have not been returned to their former homes, and they may never be. He knew the ruthlessness of the Communists; he knew that no crime was too foul when Communists seek to fasten their yoke on a free people. He said to me, "Your people act as children in your dealings with the Communists." And so we have. For five long fateful years we dallied with the belief that Communists could become loyal members of the world family, that their word could be respected and trusted. It seems that we were the last to learn that communism is a deadly peril to free nations.

REARM FREE PEOPLE

This is a crucial time in the destiny of our Nation; in the destiny of all mankind. The remaining free peoples of the world must be strengthened and defended. The infant United Nations must be fostered, encouraged, and stanchly upheld by all of its free members. But this is not enough.

We must speedily rearm Western Europe or it will be taken from us and used against us. We have not a moment to lose. We must give increasing aid to those countries who will bear the first shock of battle.

Should there come a time when this Communist flood overwhelms these free nations, we must be prepared to stand alone. In preparation for that day, there can be no limit to our effort or expense. We must make any economic sacrifice and learn to live a hard and restricted life. We must eliminate all internal expenditures for hand-outs and see how much we can give to our country instead of how much we can get from it. There must be no more appeasement, no more sacrifice of principle for expediency, and never shall we abandon a free nation that stands with us against the common enemy.

In this struggle for freedom, at home and abroad, our greatest weapon, both a sword and a shield, will be our love of and faith in God. To open the hearts and minds of men to this truth will require a mighty river of faith and effort. Each one of us is a drop to swell that river and augment its force.

We are approaching our final hour, our final opportunity to secure the peace that has twice in our lifetime escaped us.

In the grim determination of America to carry the struggle through to the bitter end, I see a new promise, a new assurance, that remaining free people shall not become enslaved. Together if we can, but alone if we must, we will find the strength to meet our common danger and overcome it, for the destiny of our people is to hold high the banner of freedom for all men everywhere.

The Senate on Trial

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE MORSE
OF OREGON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, December 21 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an exceedingly able article which appeared in a recent issue of the American Political Science Review, by one of our colleagues, the distinguished junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], entitled "The Senate on Trial."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SENATE ON TRIAL

(By Hon. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, United States Senate)

Now that we are knee-deep in the second session of the Eighty-first Congress, it is timely to review the record and to ponder the performance of the Senate of the United States since it assembled in Washington on January 3, 1949. I confine myself in this article to the upper House of our National Legislature because it was the Senate which was in the main responsible last year for prolonging the session for more than 11 weeks beyond the July 31 adjournment date fixed by the Reorganization Act of 1946.

The major legislative achievements of the Senate during the first session of the Eighty-first Congress were truly impressive. It authorized the continuance of the Marshall plan, and approved the refinancing of the European recovery program, as well as aid to Greece and Turkey. It voted to extend the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act for 3 years and to restore its former provisions. It approved the military-aid program to Western Europe and extended the Institute of Inter-American Affairs. It ratified the North Atlantic Pact and passed several measures designed to strengthen our national defenses. It authorized the President to reorganize the executive departments in line with the recommendations of the Hoover Commission and approved seven reorganization plans, even as it rejected President Truman's plan for a Department of Welfare. It approved the establishment of the new General Services Administration, salary increases for Government executives and employees, and extension of rent control.

During the first session, the Senate also passed several bills affecting the national economy, including a bill to establish a national monetary commission. It enacted a public housing and slum clearance law, approved $300,000,000 a year in Federal grants-in-aid to State school systems, a school construction bill, and passed bills establishing a National Science Foundation, expanding the hospital construction program, and providing local health services. It ratified the international wheat agreement, revised the farm price support program, extended and broadened the crop-insurance program, and facilitated the fixing of fair acreage allotments for cotton. It increased the minimum wage. The Senate also passed half a dozen bills during the session affecting veterans' benefits, created 27 new Federal judgships, and did its part to grant home rule to the voteless District of Columbia. Although the House did not concur in all these measures, it cannot be denied that the legislative output of the Senate during the session, both in quantity and quality, was of a high order of magnitude.

It is not the productivity of the Senate on the side of law-making that I am interested in for this article. It is rather the persistence of certain archaic procedures and the lack of effective party discipline, which make for frequent criticism and serious concern on the part of those interested in maintaining not only the dignity of the Senate but its efficiency and its response to the public will, that concern me. It is not so much its sins of omission alone which bring forth criticism of the upper Chamber, but rather its unlimited debate, its tolerance of dilatory and obstructive tactics, and its frequent absenteeism.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE

One of the least defensible, and to my mind most undemocratic procedures in the Senate of the United States, is that which permits a minority of its Members to prevent a majority from acting. There have been many important cases down through the years in which the Senate, through obstructions to the will of the majority which are possible under its rules, has failed in its duty to enact measures which the people desired and which a majority of its own membership favored. By the devices of filibustering, organized blocs of Senators take advantage of its traditional right of free and unlimited debate in order to paralyze the Senate completely and prevent it from acting on any proposal to which the bloc is deeply opposed. Thus, for 3 decades, filibusters against the civil-rights bills have always been effective in preventing a vote upon them.

When opportunity for debate is so narrowly restricted as it is in the House of Representatives, it is essential that there should be ample opportunity in at least one house of our National Legislature for free speech, free debate, and free amendment. But the power of full and free debate should be used to secure the enactment of wise and necessary laws, not to frustrate the will of the Senate itself. The means to promote the end ought not to be used to defeat the end itself. If four judges out of the nine on the Supreme Court undertook to prevent it from reaching a decision in an important case by endless discussion and by reading extracts from the United States Code and from law treatises, they would probably be severely condemned and perhaps subject themselves to impeachment charges. Yet there have been many times in the history of the Senate when it has been unable to perform its legislative functions because of minority obstruction. Senators with great measures in their charge have been forced to sit, impatient and often angry, while other Senators poured out an endless stream of irrelevant and empty chatter.

The filibuster is an evil. It is the attempt by minorities to prevent the constitutional action of majorities whenever the minority happen not to like it. The Senate has tried twice to limit the practice, first in 1917, and again in 1949. It adopted a cloture rule to limit debate in 1917 after a filibuster against President Wilson's armed ship bill had rendered the Government of the United States helpless and contemptible. But in the 32-year history of this rule it was successfully applied in only four instances out of 19 attempts; to limit debate on the Versailles Treaty in 1919, on the World Court issue in 1926, on a branch banking bill in 1927, and on a bill creating a Bureau of Customs and Prohibition in the same year. Since 1927 cloture has never been successfully applied to debate in the United States Senate.

The failure of the 1917 rule led to an abortive bipartisan attempt to tighten it early in 1949. The Senate Rules Committee, after hearings, recommended an amendment which would have plugged the loopholes in the old rule. This proposed change in the rules precipitated a 3-week filibuster which was finally compromised by the adoption of a new rule on March 17, 1949. Under the new rule, adopted by a vote of 63 to 23, the Senate decreed that after certain preliminaries, 64 Senators—two-thirds of the entire body—can limit and eventually end debate on any question before the Senate, except a proposal to change the rules of the Senate itself. "This issue," writes Senator MYERS of Pennsylvania, "is placed in a separate category of sacredness, and no motion to limit debate * * * can lie against it."

Of the various amendments offered to the old cloture rule, the least liberal amendment was adopted. Under the Senate's new cloture rule, it will hereafter require the favorable vote of 64 Senators to close debate, compared with the requirement of two-thirds of those present and voting under the 1917 rule. The loopholes in the old rule have been plugged, but at a price which makes it well-nigh imposible ever to liberalize the cloture rule. For, as Senator MYERS points out, by decree of the Senate itself, no machinery whatsoever for ending a filibuster on future changes in the rules is now in existence. And, of course, any future attempt to strengthen the cloture rule will run head-on into a filibuster. By giving up the power to filibuster the Journal and the power to filibuster a motion to take up, the Southerners gave up something which the framers of the 1917 rule never intended anyone should have. "The action of the Senate on March 17, 1949, was a retrogressive step," concludes Senator MYERS, "an action designed to make it harder rather than easier to cut off debate when the debate is not for the purpose of persuasion or instruction, but rather for the sole purpose of obstructing and preventing the Senate from disposing—ever—of certain matters before it."

The remedy for endless talk in the Senate is a simple one. The Senate should amend its rules so as to enable a majority of all its Members, or a majority of those present, to limit debate on any motion, measure, or other pending matter, after a period of unlimited debate for a specified number of days, say, 1 or 2 weeks. There is no subject under the sun of which the essential facts and the pros and cons cannot be thoroughly explored and ventilated in a week's or 2 weeks' debate. In the House of Representatives it has been possible since 1789 to terminate debate and bring the matter under consideration to an immediate vote, if a majority of those present and voting so desire, by adopting what is called the "motion for the previous question." This simple remedy has been proposed by many Senators down through the years, including Senators MORSE and MYERS and myself in our time.[1]

There is one other very important problem in connection with any discussion of senatorial debate. It has been said that no music is sweeter to a Senator's ear than the sound of his own voice, and far be it from me to deny that Senators belong to the talking classes. More important, however, than the fact that each session millions of words are poured into the research archives of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is the fact that a large percentage of these forensics is irrelevant to the pending business of the Senate. On June 13, 1935, Senator Huey Long, of Louisiana, addressed the Senate for nearly 16 hours. The pending business was a joint resolution proposing to extend the National Industrial Recovery Act. Senator Long devoted less than half an hour to a direct discussion of the business before the Senate. For at least 15 hours, writes George Haynes, historian of the Senate, "nothing was too irrelevant to serve his purpose. He gave recipes for fried oysters and 'pot-likker,' for coffee and turnip greens. Cards from the press gallery brought welcome suggestions: The life of Judah P. Benjamin, the history of Frederick the Great. For hours he expounded the Constitution, section by section * * * it ended at early dawn. It had lasted nearly 16 hours. In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD it fills about 80 pages."

On June 20, 1936, Rush Holt, of West Virginia, while the Senate was considering a coal-conservation bill, read at length from Aesop's Fables.

During the filibuster fight in March 1949, when the business before the Senate was a motion to consider a proposed amendment to the cloture rule, 15 Senators made extended speeches on subjects entirely irrelevant to the pending business. One Senator spoke on American foreign policy and the military trials. Another made three long speeches on the North Atlantic Pact. A third discussed the appointment of Louis Johnson to be Secretary of National Defense. Still another attacked the Wallgren nomination in a 9-hour speech, and one more spoke at length about Federal publications. No subject was too remote from the business at hand; no parliamentary device could restrain the speakers.

In Jefferson's Manual of Parliamentary Practice there is a section providing that "No one is to speak impertinently or beside the question, superfluously, or tediously." But the last time a Senator was called to order for irrelevancy was back in 1848. Since 1872 the practice of the upper House has been that a Senator cannot be taken from the floor for irrelevancy in debate. During the Civil War, Senate debate in secret session on subjects relating to the Rebellion had to be germane and limited, but that was a passing aberration. On the other hand, the House of Representatives has had a rule of relevancy since 1789 and it has been quite strictly enforced. The fact that debate in the lower House must be germane and limited is the chief reason why the House is often ahead of the Senate on the legislative timetable. The simple remedy for irrelevancy in Senate debate is to amend the rules so as to require debate to be germane to the pending business.

Senator O'MAHONEY summed up the case for relevancy in his remarks in the Senate on March 11, 1949. "We are here as Members of the legislative body of the United States," he said, "and the business of a legislative body is to legislate. It is not to spend hour upon hour splitting hairs * * * or talking endlessly about irrelevant subjects. * * * Are we in the Senate impervious to the rule of common sense? Shall the great majority of a body wear itself out because a small minority is willing to exercise its muscles and its lungs * * * in discussing irrelevant questions? * * * A body which cannot govern itself will not long hold the respect of the people who have chosen it to govern the country * * * the time has come when the Senate should demonstrate to the people of the United States and to the people of the world that it can function."

[1] S. Res. 322, introduced on August 2, 1950, by Senator MORSE and Senator HUMPHREY, provides for majority cloture.

A PREMIUM ON DELAY

The first session of the Eighty-first Congress, which adjourned on October 19, 1949, was one of the longest peace-time sessions of Congress in history. The session drew its weary length along through the hottest Washington summer since 1872, far beyond the July 31st deadline fixed by the Reorganization Act of 1946. The late adjournment can be attributed largely to procedure in the Senate, where there were frequently signs of a "deliberate slow-down" of the legislative process. This was in part caused by the use of only 21 percent of the time available for legislative sessions during January and February, during most of which essential preparatory work was being undertaken. More relevant explanations are to be found in the 3-week filibuster against the civil-rights program in March, in frequently irrelevant speeches throughout the session, and in the unprecedented delay in acting on the annual appropriation bills.

In contrast with the speedy passage of all the general appropriation bills by the House before the April recess, due to certain improvements in the internal organization and procedure of its Committee on Appropriations, the log-jam of appropriation bills in the Senate and in conference reached an all-time peak during the session. All the major supply bills are supposed to be enacted before July 1 of each year when the new Federal fiscal year begins. Those money bills originate in the House and then go for review and revision to the Senate, which had 11 weeks to act upon them before the July 1 deadline. Seven of the ten general supply bills passed the Senate by July 1, but the Independent Offices, Foreign Aid, and Interior appropriation bills did not clear the Senate finally until August 2, 8, and 25, respectively. Half a dozen of the major money bills were not approved until late summer or fall. The delay made it necessary for Congress to pass six resolutions providing temporary funds to keep the Government going.

Two remedies have been suggested for legislative delays. One is the proposal to consolidate all the general appropriation bills into one omnibus measure. This step, which has been adopted in 1950, not only should expedite the appropriation process, but also will give Congress a comparative view of total proposed expenditures and estimated revenues and thus lay the basis for a balanced budget. In the absence of the right to an item veto, however, it does have certain glaring weaknesses.

The other proposal is that of Senator MYERS of a legislative timetable for Congress. His resolution proposes that early in each session the majority leaders of the two Houses, after consultation with the chairmen and ranking members of the standing committees, shall prepare a legislative program for scheduled committee and floor action on the major legislation of the session. This program would be revised at monthly intervals. In this way, Senator MYERS hopes hereafter to avoid the familiar end-of-the-session legislative log jams.

ATTENDANCE IN THE SENATE

One of the important problems which any legislative body faces is that of frequent absenteeism on the part of its Members. The Senate, too, falls subject to this criticism. Vice President BARKLEY recently remarked that absenteeism in the Senate grows each year. There are several reasons for this growth in recent years. With the rising burden of congressional business, many Senators are attending meetings and hearings of Senate committees which have received permission to sit while the Senate is in session. Others make calls at various Government departments in downtown Washington on behalf of their constituents. Still others are meeting visitors in the lobbies of the Capitol or escorting them through the halls. Some Senators who have already made up their minds on the bills being debated are hard at work in their offices in the Senate Office Building. A few may be out of town on speaking trips or visiting their home districts to consult with the voters, or on campaign tours. Some, too, may be on private holidays taking rests from the ceaseless grind of legislative work. In addition, a number of Senators may be abroad on committee "junkets" of varying importance. The latter was particularly true during the closing weeks of the 1949 session.

However legitimate the reason for their absence, the net effect of growing absenteeism in the Senate on the prestige of the Senate and on the legislative process is unfortunate. Hardly a day passes during a session of the Senate when several Senators do not ask and receive leaves of absence from its proceedings for a period of time varying from a few hours to several weeks. More than 250 official leaves of absence were granted Senators during the first session of the Eighty-first Congress. During 23 business days last March, for example, 29 Senators were absent on leave at various times for a total of 77 days. The records do not reveal how many were absent without leave or continued to be absent after their official leaves expired.

This condition is bound to affect the fate of legislation. Many visitors to the galleries of the Congress do not fully understand or appreciate all the extenuating and frequently reasonable explanations for absences, and the daily sight of empty seats makes a poor impression on them. This must have some effect on their respect for the product of the legislative process. Senator O'MAHONEY has frequently expressed the fear that poor attendance on the floor of the Senate undermines popular confidence in representative government. Furthermore, bills are passed or defeated or postponed with barely a quorum of the Senate present which might be disposed of otherwise with a fuller attendance. On October 15, 1949, for example, the displaced-persons bill was sent back to committee by a vote of 36 to 30, in the absence of 30 Senators whose presence might well have resulted in the passage of this long-delayed measure.

The problem is indeed a crucial one. With the growth of "big government" and the need to solve increasingly complicated questions of public policy, it is clear that the burdens upon Congress and upon Congressmen are great, and perhaps too great. Members of the Senate cannot be in two places at once. They cannot, without the sacrifice of their health or the sacrifice of their political future, pay proper attention to all of the responsibilities which are theirs. Furthermore, as the people of the United States rightfully respond to the increasing number of calls upon them to "write your Senator," legislative officers and Members of Congress find themselves spending an increasing amount of their time replying to letters at the expense of their other duties.

The Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 made an attempt to deal with the problem of absenteeism from the floor by providing that "no standing committee of the Senate or the House, except the Committee on Rules of the House, shall sit, without special leave, while the Senate or the House * * * is in session." This was an attempt to supplement the rules of the Senate which provide that "no Senator shall absent himself from the service of the Senate without leave" and that the "attendance of absent Senators" may be compelled whenever a quorum is not present. These attempts to correct the problem, however, have not been in the main successful. The spirit of the rule established by the Reorganization Act is often violated by the pressure of committee business and by the practice of senatorial courtesy; a request of a Senator from leave of absence is never denied. Nor is the suggestion ever seriously made today that section 39 of title II of the United States Code should be enforced. That section provides that the Secretary of the Senate and the Sergeant at Arms of the House should make proportionate salary deductions each day that a Congressman is absent for a reason other than his illness or illness in the Member's family.

THE ANCIENT RULES OF THE SENATE

Underlying the procedural defects which handicap the Senate in the efficient performance of its constitutional functions is a code of rules which has not been revised since 1884. The rules of that far-off day may have been adequate to the parliamentary needs of the legislative process in the leisurely days of the nineteenth century; but the need of a new up-to-date codification has long been evident and often expressed by twentieth-century Senators.

The Senate's code is simple and insignificant compared with the strict and complicated procedure of the House, even though both Houses had a common inheritance in the same ancient experience of the English Parliament. It began with 19 brief rules adopted in 1789. They have been revised only 4 times since then: In 1806, 1820, 1868, and 1884 when the original 19 rules had grown to 40. There has been no general revision of the Senate rules in 66 years, and only two important modifications have been made in the meantime: First in 1917, when the cloture rule was adopted, and, second, in 1949, when the cloture rule was regressively amended. The smallness of its membership, the absolute voting equality of the States in the Senate, the early leadership of the agricultural South, and the western pioneer's deep-set resistance to restraint have thus far combined with the seniority custom to maintain within the Senate Chamber the old order against the new, sectionalism against nationalism, minority against majority rights.

Despite the direct election of Senators by the people since 1913, several factors tend to keep it out of harmony with the popular majority: (1) Its territorial basis of representation with the wide disparities in State population; (2) the practice of assigning committee chairmanships according to seniority of committee service, which has operated in favor of those States which are most conservative in changing their Senators; and (3) the regional concentration of committee chairmanships in New England and the Northeast when the Republicans are in power, and in the South when the Democrats control. These are some of the reasons why the rules of the Senate have advanced at a snail's pace.

The archaic character of the Senate rules is also due to several other influences. Senators have long believed that their rules should be conservative, not creative; weapons for the defense of the minority rather than tools of the responsible majority; devices to promote local sovereignty rather than a more effective legislative system. The constitution makers intended that the upper Chamber was to sit as a council of revision rather than as an active initiator of the laws—a purpose which, as Woodrow Wilson observed, is promoted by "simple, comparatively unencumbered forms of procedure." The fact that two-thirds of the Members always continue in office makes for a stable and continuing membership which is partly responsible for the decentralizing tendency in the Senate. The rules of the Senate, as a continuing body, remain in force from Congress to Congress without reaffirmation, whereas the discontinuity of the House requires the adoption of a set of rules at biennial intervals. The fact, moreover, that the average age of Senators is 60, and that the Senate is governed by its older members under the seniority rule, gives the conservatism of old age much influence.

Operating both as cause and effect of slow parliamentary progress in the Senate are the large powers of individuals and minorities. Senators often tend to think of themselves as "ambassadors of sovereign states," though state sovereignty has in fact passed away forever. They feel a large independence of one another, of their committees, of caucus decisions and platform pledges. The Senate's smaller number makes each voice and vote correspondingly more valuable. Individual Senators have conducted famous filibusters against the majority will and individual absentees have effected the passage or defeat of important measures and nominations. When party ratios on committees are close, a single defection can defeat a Presidential nomination. Witness the seven to six vote by the Armed Services Committee against Mon Wallgren to be chairman of the National Security Resources Board. Single Senators have held up great appropriation bills until they have been amended to provide for pet projects in their States. In 1903, for example, Senator Tillman of South Carolina filibustered against a deficiency appropriation bill because it failed to include an item paying his State a war claim; the item was finally replaced in the bill. Senate history is replete with similar examples. In a body much of whose business is transacted by unanimous consent, the power of the individual Member is manifest.

Senator Henry Cabot Lodge wrote in 1893 that "the rules of the Senate are practically unchanged from what they were at the beginning." Former President pro tempore Ingalls remarked that "rules are never observed in this body; they are only made to be broken. We are a law unto ourselves." "The rule of the Senate has been its own sense of propriety and dignity," said Senator Anthony. Mutual respect, tradition, custom, courtesy, forbearance, honorable obligation have been the unwritten rules of the Senate over the years.

But many Senators believe that the time has come to modernize their legislative methods to avoid the difficulties faced by our legislative machinery under its tremendous modern burdens. Dr. George B. Galloway has said that "the cookbook of congressional reform contains many recipes." George H. Haynes, historian of the Senate, wrote in 1938 that "a general revision of the Senate rules is much to be desired. There is need of a new codification to bring order and clarity into the patchwork of 50 years. Senate rulings and precedents show many uncertainties and inconsistencies."[2]

A CONSTITUENT'S WASHINGTON REPRESENTATIVE

The public business is also detained in the Senate, as it is in the House, by the huge nonlegislative workload which the American people impose upon their Representatives in Congress. This burden consists in large part of errand-running for the folks back home. It consists in part of the hundreds of private bills for the payment of tort claims and for suspending the immigration and naturalization laws in individual cases which Senators introduce on behalf of constituents and follow through their committee and floor stages. The Senate spent 2 hours one afternoon last October debating the claim of a war nurse for damages for injuries she suffered in an accident in India back in 1945. Much Senate time and attention is also consumed in the performance of its duties as the board of aldermen for the District of Columbia, which has been deprived of local self-government since 1874. It takes an act of Congress to change a street name in Washington or kill weeds or destroy starlings or do a hundred other trivial chores for the Capital City.

Congress ought to be relieved in the atomic age of these local and private trivia which sap its energies and divert its attention from the great national and international problems of our time. The remedy here, as Senator KEFAUVER has urged, is to stop asking Senators and Congressmen to be our errand boys and to delegate the settlement of private claims and immigration matters to appropriate administrative and judicial agencies, thus completing the evolution begun by the Reform Act of 1946. Home rule should also be granted to the people of Washington. If we want to expedite the public business and see Congress function efficiently, we must, so far as possible, limit national legislation to matters of national importance.

THE NEED FOR PARTY RESPONSIBILITY

A final and formidable obstacle to the efficient dispatch of the public business in the Senate is the lack of effective party government. The American people have long believed that political parties are the principal instruments of democratic government and that the majority party should have the power to govern the country. The Democratic Party won control of the Presidency and both Houses of Congress in the 1948 elections, yet several of its platform pledges have been defeated or frustrated by hostile coalitions on the floor of the Eighty-first Senate. Dixiecrats from the solid South, who sat on the Democratic side of the aisle, ignored their party's program on civil rights and repeal of Taft-Hartley and formed an alliance with northern and western Republicans to defeat these measures and weaken the cloture rule. On many crucial issues the real control of the Senate rested not with the majority party but with this Dixiecrat-Republican coalition.

The internal divisions within the Democratic Party, coupled with the control over legislative action exercised by the standing committees, the diffusion of political power within Congress, together with the long-standing custom of unlimited and irrelevant debate, were heavy handicaps to the development of effective party leadership in the upper Chamber. Although Senator LUCAS was both chairman of the party conference, chairman of the majority policy committee, and majority leader of the Senate, all he could do was cajole, wheedle, and persuade; he could not direct his followers.

As long as varying economic and social conditions produce different habits of thought and regional attitudes in the United States, as long as some Senators feel obliged to subordinate national to provincial interests, and as long as political parties are loose coalitions of dissident elements, so long will it be difficult to achieve effective party government in the upper House. But some progress in this direction can be made, I believe, by strengthening the machinery of party government in Congress. I suggest four steps:

1. Revival and more extensive use of the caucus as an instrument for the formation and promotion of party policy. The caucus is the general assembly of the party in the Chamber. Both political parties have used it effectively in times past. It is the only known means by which the parties may formulate their legislative policies and by which the majority party can execute its decisions.

2. Creation of joint congressional policy committees in each party, with their officers rotating between the members of the two Houses, and with expert staffs to plan legislative strategy and program and to be held responsible for the legislative implementation of party policy.

3. Allocation of the function of making standing committee assignments and of selecting committee chairmen to the party policy committees, the chairmen to be chosen upon the basis of ability and willingness to cooperate in carrying out the party program.

4. Reconsideration of the committee assignments at certain intervals, say every 2 years, so as to allow the shifting of uncooperative members.

CONCLUSION

The United States is the leading democratic world power. Its governmental structure and operation are continually the center of the eyes of the world. The functioning of its national legislature is of general concern. Any successes or failures of our legislative process have world-wide repercussions. The organization and operation of the Senate of the United States must be viewed in that context.

The voters in the several States are responsible for the quality of the membership of the Senate. The Senate itself, however, is responsible for its internal methods and operation. The people of the United States must join with their elected representatives to shape and direct the procedure of the Senate so that it will increase in public esteem and become truly a noble example of efficiency and response to the democratic process.

[2] S. Con. Res. 87, introduced on April 26, 1950, by Senator HUMPHREY, would establish a Joint Select Committee on the Reorganization of Congress, to make a continued study of the organization and operation of Congress. The bill was introduced in the House of Representatives by Congressman HOLIFIELD, of California.

Letter to Mr. Vishinsky of Communist Russia and to All the People of the United States of America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. ROONEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 21, 1950

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, under permission heretofore granted me by unanimous consent of the House, I include the following communication addressed to Mr. Vishinsky of Communist Russia and to all the people of the United States of America, by Paul P. Milling, president, local No. 9, John Wanamaker, RCIA, American Federation of Labor:

Mr. VISHINSKY: It is reported that at the UN meeting in Paris you announced your country had acquired the atomic bomb, developed in the United States of America. This is the first time in modern history that a nation has admitted to acquiring a secret of another nation without its consent. That bomb was developed at an initial cost of $2,000,000,000, paid for by us, the people of these United States. It was not developed as a threat to Russia or as a threat to world peace. It was developed to save millions of lives as our contribution to winning a war in which you were our ally and we were yours.

If you have acquired the atomic bomb, you probably believe you have our greatest asset. But you haven't. You can, however, acquire our greatest asset without any spy work, without any underhanded techniques. We gladly hand it to you free, and with our blessing. That great asset of ours is the United States Constitution and Bill of Rights.

You, Mr. Vishinsky, with Premier Stalin and 16 others of the Supreme Soviet, hold in your hands the destiny, the lives, and the liberties of over 200,000,000 people. They, literally, are serfs of your Communist state. You cannot give them the atomic bomb. But you can give them the life, liberty, and freedom of spirit that all people can enjoy under our Constitution and Bill of Rights; and you can drop this upon your people and upon the world with greater effectiveness for world peace than the destructive power of our entire stockpile of atomic bombs.

You claim, Mr. Vishinsky, that the supreme Soviet, in governing the lives, the thinking, and the activities of all the people of Communist Russia, desires only to free the world from its political, social, religious, and economic chains. You speak of world freedom as an endowment invented by communism. You are convinced that Marx invented socialism. You seek world revolution for the people's freedom.

Mr. Vishinsky, have you ever studied the United States Constitution?

It is not only a plan for government that has given us all we have, it is a logical pattern for world government because it puts government precisely where it belongs, at the source from which it must forever derive—the hands and the minds of the people. Our Constitution, on which we have no copyright, makes government the servant and not the master of the people. It is more truly socialistic than anything Marx ever wrote, advocated, or dreamed of. It makes all people potential capitalists, but it puts capitalism in the hands of a free people and not in the hands of the state, which uses capitalism to keep liberty and freedom from the people. In all of your damning of capitalism, you damn only free capitalism when you damn the United States.

You must believe in capitalism because the Union of Soviet Russia is the only state on the face of the earth that monopolizes all capital.

We are going to have an election on November 2. We are going to elect a new President, a lot of Senators and Representatives. Three major contenders are seeking the office of President. Hundreds are seeking the other offices. Under our Constitution, the people will vote precisely as they please for these officials, who, under our Constitution, are elected as servants, and not masters, of the people. Some of the candidates are actually making a bid for control over the people. They want superior powers not constitutionally granted to the President. If our people want that, they will vote for it, and get it.

Communism holds, Mr. Vishinsky, that man must be free from the chains of religion and the domination of God. It maintains that all religions for the worship of God are bad for the people and bad for the state. You have displaced God and have set up the state as the supreme authority.

Has your state, in any of its scientific laboratories, ever created seeds which would sprout into food to feed your people? Only God can do that. Have any of your state laboratories managed to upset a single natural law? Can the Kremlin lengthen a day, or shorten a night?

Do you think you can destroy the cosmic longing of all men and women to seek and to worship the source of their being? No. All you can say is "Everyone in Russia owes his life to the state, because the state has not yet seen fit to destroy him for cause." That is not giving life; that is withholding sudden death. That is refraining from liquidation, but always holding over your people the threat of liquidation precisely as the Nazis and the Fascists did it.

To eliminate belief in God, you must change man from a human being into an animal. You must reverse all the forces of evolution and reduce man to the equivalent of a unit in a herd, a hive, or a nest. You must stop man's progress in thinking and action. You must control his mind. You have had some success—temporary success—in this approach. So did Hitler. So did Mussolini. So did the war lords of Japan. So did Nero. They have passed.

Any effort to control the thinking of man is in opposition to the laws of God and of nature, and must fail. You cannot stifle man's inner desire to make personal progress, to increase in importance, to have friends, to have knowledge to have possessions, to have liberty of mind, and freedom of spirit. You cannot kill, no matter how much you suppress, the spirit that nature's God has put into man, to make him human.

What would happen in Soviet Russia if you took the United States Constitution and Bill of Rights and made them your very own? What would happen if you gave to all the people of Russia freedom to worship God in any way they pleased? What would happen if you reopened all the churches, permitted entry and activity of missionaries, and restored all of the religious rights and privileges of Jews, Catholics, Protestants, Greeks, Mohammedans and all other religions.

All of your people would have an inward lift. Pravda, carrying the announcement as news, would be kissed on the streets of Moscow. You, who announced it, would be blest by the people on their knees.

What would happen in Russia if you said to all your people, "You have complete freedom of speech without fear of reprisal?" Your people would go wild with joy, and you know it. Imagine how your people would react to be told that they could work where they pleased, and at what they pleased, without any dictation by the State. What would happen if you offered your people the right of private enterprise, to create a telephone system, a new railroad system, a new broadcasting system, and the right to produce all kinds of merchandise and services? What would happen if you gave your people the right to build and use radios, to listen to world-wide programs, and to uncensored programs of Russian stations? Your people would believe that at long last communism had become a heaven on earth.

You should like the United States Constitution for one particular thing, even if you do not like the rest of it. The United States Constitution provides, within itself, the means of change without revolution and without counterrevolution. We, the people, living under the Constitution and the Bill of Rights, can change that Constitution, wholly or in part, and provide for ourselves any other kind of government we want—totalitarian, communistic, planned economy, or no government at all. The Constitution provides for amendment by vote of the majority of the representatives of the people in three-fourths of the States.

So you could appropriate our Constitution and say to your people: "Here is a new plan. Not a 5-year plan. Not a 10-year plan. A 1-day plan. All over Russia we shall have 1 day of complete liberty and freedom. One day of living without fear of reprisal. One day of doing precisely as we like." You would like to do a few things, wouldn't you, Mr. Vishinsky?

You could say to your people, "This bombshell of liberty and freedom is yours for a day, and if you like it it is yours forever, but with this proviso: If ever you don't like it, as a majority, you can vote it out of action and return to any other form you like, without war, without bloodshed, without revolution."

You have the atomic bomb, or so you say. So do we. That makes us equal as to destructive power. But that is not establishing parity. You should be equal also in constructive forces, the only force that nature's God smiles upon and blesses those who use it. The constructive force, far more important than the destructive force, doesn't have to be stolen. It is yours, for all the people of Russia, free. Free. Free. Take it. We are only a people lucky enough to have it. We didn't invent it. We have no copyright or patent on it. Yet it is the greatest force in the world because it frees the creative powers of every man and woman.

In our Constitution is the secret of all our productive success; all of the secret of our happiness, our standard of living, our wages, our short hours—everything we have, even the development of the atomic bomb. (The foregoing article was written in its entirety by Edward F. Hutton.)

As stated in my opening remarks, the poisonous venom of the Soviet delegates continues in 1950. These twin snakes crawl and dig as far as dirt and other filth will permit them. We have exposed them for what they are worth—we will continue to do so. Their counterattack is inevitable. They have already changed the cold war to a hot war by their attack in Korea. They have violated all the rules of peace just as they flagrantly violate rules of war. Yes, they even tied the hands of our gallant prisoners of war behind their back and shot them in the head.

I have said it before and I repeat it again—red fascism and communism are birds of a feather and the twin enemies of our America. We will fight them with our every thought, word, deed and action. In God's holy name, we will win.

Fraternally yours,

PAUL P. MILLING,
President, Local No. 9, John Wanamaker R. C. I. A., A. F. of L.

Are We Worthy of Our Heritage?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE MORSE
OF OREGON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, December 21 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very fine speech by the vice president of Edison Industries, George E. Stringfellow, entitled "Are We Worthy of Our Heritage?"

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ARE WE WORTHY OF OUR HERITAGE?

I'm highly complimented to be asked to speak before the Masons of the Bell Laboratories. The members of Bell Laboratories are all seekers of truth and light and the results of your efforts have helped to make this a better world in which to live.

For a number of years I was a daily business associate of Thomas Alva Edison who, as you know, was the inventor of the carbon telephone transmitter without which the telephone would not have been a success. The Genius of Menlo Park often referred to your organization which he once described to me as one of mankind's great benefactors.

However, I wish to talk to you tonight about another subject, a subject which disturbs all people who love liberty and who place their trust in the existence of a Supreme Being.

There is a gloomy outlook today. Defeatism and lack of hope and faith have made their mark on our people. World strife has caused many to lose hope for future happiness and peace. While courageously facing these facts, we must keep our perspective for there have been other somber moments in the history of man when the portents of disaster indicated universal calamity.

"It is a gloomy moment in history," said an editorial in Harper's Weekly 93 years ago. "Not in the lifetime of men who will read this editorial has there been such a grave and deep apprehension. Never has the future seemed so incalculable as the present. In France," continued the editorial, "the political pot seethes and hub-bubs with uncertainty. Russia hangs like a dark and silent cloud over the horizon of Europe. * * * All resources and energies of the British Empire are sorely tried."

That editorial, written 93 years ago, could have been written yesterday and it would have been fairly accurate today.

However, the world continues to progress. Faith and hope continue to stir men's souls and minds. Great economic progress has been made since the Harper's editorial in 1857. We would, of course, be immeasurably better off today than we are if our spiritual gains had kept step with our economic advances. Those dark and foreboding clouds of 90 years ago were dispelled by men of faith, hope, and courage. The same characteristics of faith, hope, and courage will triumph in the future if we keep close to realities and do not substitute false gods for the Great Architect of the universe.

There is an atheistic movement called communism that's spreading throughout the world today like a prairie fire. This atheistic movement substitutes belief in a figurehead, currently Joe Stalin, for belief in God. Communism is embraced by citizens of our country who brazenly tell us that in time of war, if that war were with Red Russia, they would follow the Red flag instead of Old Glory. That, I submit, is an admission of treason in advance of the act.

Loyal and God-fearing Americans cannot read their newspapers or listen to their radios without recoiling emotionally at the very thought that we have in our country an organization whose leaders owe their loyalty to a foreign government, that asserts that belief in God is an opiate of the people and that belief in God must be exterminated everywhere before communism is safe anywhere. That assertion, I think, is a great indictment of any movement whose leaders proclaim that it cannot live in a cool, clean, crisp atmosphere of the Ten Commandments or the Golden Rule.

The enemy of our way of life and the enemy of our fraternity is a formidable foe. It is more formidable than any enemy we have faced in the history of our Republic. This enemy can destroy us if we permit him to divide us as he is attempting to do. For example, there are a number of instances where Communists have infiltrated Masonic lodges. We Masons must ever be on the alert to avoid contamination by this Godless force.

The basic foundation of Masonry, as you know, is faith in the existence of the Supreme Being.

Our form of government was virtually born in Masonic lodges. The Boston Tea Party was engineered by Masons. Paul Revere, on the occasion of his midnight ride, was an officer of his Masonic lodge. A large majority of the signers of the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States were Masons. Masons, therefore, in my opinion, have a greater responsibility to keep America American than any other segment of our human family. There are more than 3,500,000 Masons in the United States. If a large percentage of them would emulate Paul Revere and George Washington, we would need have no fear of the future of our country.

Our founding fathers placed their belief in the existence of the Supreme Being. As proof of that, one cannot read the Declaration of Independence or the Constitution of the United States, nor can one read the constitutional debates out of which our Republic was born without realizing that our forefathers recognized that a government of free men must rest upon spiritual values. Was it not Paul who said, "Where the spirit of God exists, there will be found freedom"? Kill the spirit of God in America and our freedom will evaporate overnight.

While the visibility at the moment is poor, the courage of our people is good. Courage and character are the things that made America great. The exercise of these priceless ingredients will sustain us in this hour of peril. It was the courage and the determination of one man that led the world from confusion, despair, and darkness at Dunkirk. Winston Churchill sparked the spirit of freedom and decency that electrified men of honor who conquered those who would have enslaved the world. It was this spirit that helped Washington hold together his little band of patriots at Valley Forge and thus made us a free people.

When Washington's troops retook Philadelphia in the Revolutionary War, instead of engaging in revelry, he and 300 of his key men celebrated their great victory by attending religious services conducted by a Masonic lodge.

A great historian asserts that our civilization can escape suicide only by returning to the more general practice of faith in God. How truly he reflects the basic concepts of the teachings of freemasonry. That is why freemasonry has stood the test of time. That is why freemasonry has been and is a humanizing world force. There has been a spiritual thread which has held masonry together since its inception. It is that spiritual thread, the spirit of hope and faith that can lead us from the gloom of today's outlook to a brighter and greater place in world history.

Our forefathers built on this continent a civilization which for prestige, wealth, and power has no equal in the annals of history. Our material success has brought with it hazards of great magnitude. In our gains we have suffered important losses. We have lost, in a measure that assurance of faith in divine guidance which motivated the pioneers who laid the foundation of America. It was divine guidance that gave them faith and courage to push forward the frontiers of world commerce and thus increased the living standards of all people. Sadly lacking, but not without hope of reviving, are those religious convictions that put granite in the character of our forefathers. We must regain our spiritual losses.

When the peoples of the world recognize God as the Great Architect of the Universe, as we Masons must, when they practice brotherly love; advocated by our fraternity, then and only then will the world withstand the winds of adversity. Then and only then will the dissent and strife melt into a harmonious note, symbolized by the square and compass which we Masons so proudly display. If we are worthy of our heritage, we will emulate our founding fathers and America will remain great.

Speech of Hon. Herbert Hoover on Saving America, the Gibraltar of Western Civilization

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. RANKIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 21, 1950

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, last night I listened to one of the greatest speeches I ever heard. It was delivered by a great American, ex-President Herbert Hoover.

It came like a voice inspired, as did Washington's Farewell Address and Jefferson's first inaugural address, in which they warned us against those very foreign entanglements that are now dragging our country, or have already dragged our country, to the very brink of disaster.

We have just gone through a Second World War in which our boys won the fight, and then saw the victory turned over to the worst enemy civilization has ever known.

We have seen the establishment of this modern Tower of Babel, known as the United Nations, with its confusion of tongues, which was instrumental in inducing our President to send our boys to Korea, without consulting the Congress of the United States, in what he called a "police action," in which our country has suffered the greatest disaster of all time.

Our casualties in that police action have already amounted to more than the casualties in the Revolutionary War, the War of 1812, the War with Mexico, and the Spanish-American War, all combined.

The other members of the United Nations have hung back and waited for the United States to send her boys to do the fighting and dying, and are now expecting us to pay the costs.

Sending our boys into Korea was one of the greatest blunders of all time. I agree with President Hoover. We should bring them home now, build up our own defenses, and strengthen our own country. We should then follow the policies laid down by Washington, Jefferson, Adams, Hamilton, Madison, Monroe, and the other great leaders who founded this Republic, established the Monroe Doctrine, and built the greatest government on earth. In that way we can build the strongest nation the world has ever known, meet our obligations, and lead the world by precept and example into a more glorious civilization with peace, happiness, and prosperity for all mankind.

We may not agree with everything Mr. Hoover said last night, but, taken for all in all, it will go down in history as one of the greatest speeches ever delivered by an American statesman in all the history of this Republic.

The text of Mr. Hoover's speech follows:

I have received hundreds of requests that I appraise the present situation and give my conclusions to our national policies.

I speak with a deep sense of responsibility. And I speak tonight under the anxieties of every American for the Nation's sons who are fighting and dying on a mission of peace and the honor of our country.

No appraisal of the world situation can be final in an unstable world. However, to find our national path we must constantly reexamine where we have arrived and at times revise our direction.

I do not propose to traverse the disastrous road by which we reached this point.

THE GLOBAL MILITARY SITUATION

We may first survey the global military situation. There is today only one center of aggression on the earth. That is the Communist-controlled Asian-European land mass of 800,000,000 people. They have probably over 300 trained and equipped combat divisions with over 30,000 tanks, 10,000 tactical planes and further large reserves they can put in action in 90 days. But they are not a great sea power. Their long-range air power is limited. These congeries of over 30 different races will some day go to pieces. But in the meantime they are cannon fodder.

Facing this menace on the eastern front there are about 200,000,000 non-Communist island peoples in Japan, Formosa, the Philippines, and Korea. Aside from Korea, which I discuss later, they have probably 12 effective combat divisions with practically no tanks, air, or navy.

Facing this land mass on the south are the Indies and the Middle East of about 600,000,000 non-Communist peoples. There are about 150,000,000 non-Communist peoples in North Africa and Latin America. Except Turkey and Formosa, these 850,000,000 people have little military force which they would or could spare. But they could contribute vital economic and moral strength.

Facing this menace on the Continental European front there are about 160,000,000 non-Communist people who, excluding Spain, have less than 20 combat divisions now available, few tanks, and little air or naval force. But their will to defend themselves is feeble and their disunities are manifest.

Of importance in military weight at this moment there is the British Commonwealth of 150,000,000 people, with probably 30 combat divisions under arms, a superior navy, considerable air force and a few tanks.

And there are 150,000,000 people in the United States preparing 3,500,000 men into a gigantic Air Force and Navy, with about 30 equipped combat divisions.

SOME MILITARY CONCLUSIONS

If we weigh these military forces as they stand today we must arrive at certain basic conclusions.

(a) We must face the fact that to commit the sparse ground forces of the non-Communist nations into a land war against this Communist land mass would be a war without victory, a war without a successful political terminal. Any attempt to make war on the Communist mass by land invasion, through the quicksands of China, India, or Western Europe is sheer folly. That would be the graveyard of millions of American boys and would end in the exhaustion of this Gibraltar of western civilization.

Even were Western Europe armed far beyond any contemplated program, we could never reach Moscow. The Germans failed with a magnificent army of 240 combat divisions and with powerful air and tank forces as contrasted with the 60 divisions now being talked about.

(b) Equally, we Americans alone with sea and air power can so control the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans that there can be no possible invasion of the Western Hemisphere by Communist armies. They can no more reach Washington in force than we can reach Moscow.

(c) In this military connection we must realize the fact that the atomic bomb is a far less dominant weapon than it was once thought to be.

(d) It is obvious that the United Nations have been defeated in Korea by the aggression of Communist China. There are no adequate forces in the world to repel them.

Even if we sacrifice more American boys to hold a bridgehead, we know we shall not succeed at the present time in the mission given to us by the 50 members of the United Nations.

OUR ECONOMIC STRENGTH

We may explore the American situation still further. The 150,000,000 American people are already economically strained by Government expenditures. It must not be forgotten that we are carrying huge burdens from previous wars, including obligations to veterans and $260,000,000,000 of bonds and currency issues from those wars. In the fiscal year 1952, Federal and local expenditures are likely to exceed $90,000,000,000. That is more than our total savings. We must finance huge deficits by further Government issues. Inflation is already moving but we might with stern measures avoid the economic disintegration of such a load for a very few years. If we continued long on this road the one center of resistance in the world will collapse in economic disaster.

THE DIPLOMATIC FRONT

We may appraise the diplomatic front. Our great hope was in the United Nations. We have witnessed the sabotage of its primary purpose of preserving peace. It has been, down to last week, a forum for continuous smear on our honor, our ideals, and our purposes.

It did stiffen up against raw aggression last July in Korea. But in its call for that military action, America had to furnish over 90 percent of the foreign forces and suffer over 90 percent of their dead and injured. That effort now comes at least to a measurable military defeat by the aggression of Communist hordes.

Whether or not the United Nations is to have a moral defeat and suffer the collapse of its whole moral stature now depends on whether it has the courage to—

(a) declare Communist China an aggressor;

(b) refuse admission of this aggressor to its membership;

(c) demand that each member of the United Nations cease to furnish or transport supplies of any kind to Communist China that can aid in their military operations. Such a course honestly carried out by the non-Communist nations is not economic sanctions nor does it require military action. But it would constitute a great pressure for rectitude;

(d) for once, pass a resolution condemning the infamous lies about the United States.

Any course short of this is appeasement.

WHAT SHOULD OUR POLICIES BE?

And now I come to where we should go from here.

Two months ago I suggested a tentative alternate policy for the United States. It received a favorable reception from the large majority of our press.

Since then the crisis in the world has become even more acute. It is also clear that the United Nations are defeated in Korea. It is also clear that other non-Communist nations did not or could not substantially respond to the United Nations' call for arms to Korea. It is clear that the United Nations cannot mobilize substantial military forces. It is clear continental Europe has not in the 3 years of our aid developed that unity of purpose, and that will power necessary for its own defense. It is clear that our British friends are flirting with appeasement of Communist China. It is clear that the United Nations is in a fog of debate and indecision on whether to appease or not to appease.

In expansion of my proposals of 2 months ago, I now propose certain principles and action.

First: The foundation of our national policies must be to preserve for the world this Western Hemisphere Gibraltar of western civilization.

Second. We can, without any measure of doubt, with our own air and naval forces, hold the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans with one frontier on Britain (if she wishes to cooperate), the other on Japan, Formosa, and the Philippines. We can hold open the sea lanes for our supplies. I devotedly hope that a maximum of cooperation can be established between the British Commonwealth and ourselves.

Third. To do this we should arm our air and naval forces to the teeth. We have little need for large armies unless we are going to Europe or China. We should give Japan her independence and aid her in arms to defend herself. We should stiffen the defenses of our Pacific frontier in Formosa and the Philippines. We can protect this island chain by our sea and air power.

Fourth. We could, after initial outlays for more air and navy equipment, greatly reduce our expenditures, balance our budget, and free ourselves from the dangers of inflation and economic degeneration.

Fifth. If we toil and sacrifice as the President has so well asked, we can continue aid to the hungry of the world. Out of our productivity, we can give aid to other nations when they have already displayed spirit and strength in defense against communism. We have the stern duty to work and sacrifice to do it.

Sixth. We should have none of appeasement. Morally there is no appeasement of communism. Appeasement contains more dangers than Dunkerques. We want no more Tehrans and Yaltas. We can retrieve a battle, but we cannot retrieve an appeasement. We are grateful that President Truman has denounced such a course.

Seventh. We are not blind to the need to preserve western civilization on the Continent of Europe or to our cultural and religious ties to it. But the prime obligation of defense of western continental Europe rests upon the nations of Europe. The test is whether they have the spiritual force, the will, and acceptance of unity among them by their own volition. America cannot create their spiritual forces; we cannot buy them with money.

You can search all the history of mankind, and there is no parallel to the effort and sacrifice we have made to elevate their spirit and to achieve their unity. To this date it has failed. Their minds are confused with fears and disunities. They exclude Spain, although she has the will and means to fight. They higgle with Germany, although she is their frontier. They vacillate in the belief that they are in little danger and the hope to avoid again being a theater of war. And Karl Marx has added to their confusions. They still suffer from battle shock. Their highly organized Communist parties are a menace we must not ignore.

In both World War I and World War II (including West Germany) they placed more than 250 trained and equipped combat divisions in the field within 60 days with strong air and naval forces. They have more manpower and more productive capacity today than in either one of those wars. To warrant our further aid they should show they have spiritual strength and unity to avail themselves of their own resources. But it must be far more than pacts, conferences, paper promises and declarations. Today it must express itself in organized and equipped combat divisions of such huge numbers as would erect a sure dam against the Red flood. And that before we land another man or another dollar on their shores. Otherwise we shall be inviting another Korea. That would be a calamity to Europe as well as to us.

Our policy in this quarter of the world should be confined to a period of watchful waiting without ground military action.

NATIONAL UNITY

There is a proper urge in all Americans for unity in troubled times. But unless unity is based on right principles and right action it is a vain and dangerous thing.

Honest difference of views and honest debate are not disunity. They are the vital process of policy making among freemen.

A right, a specific, an open foreign policy must be formulated which gives confidence in our own security before we can get behind it.

CONCLUSIONS

American eyes should now be opened to these hordes in Asia.

These policies I have suggested would be no isolationism. Indeed they are the opposite. They would avoid rash involvement of our military forces in hopeless campaigns. They do not relieve us of working to our utmost. They would preserve a stronghold of Christian civilization in the world against any peradventure.

With the policies I have outlined, even without Europe, Americans have no reason for hysteria or loss of confidence in our security or our future. And in American security rests the future security of all mankind.

It would be an uneasy peace but we could carry it on with these policies indefinitely even if the Communists should attack our lines on the seas.

We can hope that in time the millions of other non-Communists peoples of the world will rise to their dangers.

We can hope that sometime the evils of communism and the disintegration of their racial controls will bring their own disintegration. It is remote consolation, but twice before in world history Asiatic hordes have swept over a large part of the world and their racial dissensions dissolved their empires.

Our people have braved difficult and distressing situations in these three centuries we have been on this continent. We have faced our troubles without fear and we have not failed.

We shall not fail in this, even if we have to stand alone. But we need to realize the whole truth and gird ourselves for troubled times. The truth is ugly. We face it with prayer and courage.

South Carolinian Reports on the Korean War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. L. MENDEL RIVERS

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 22, 1950

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New York Herald Tribune of December 20, 1950, by Ansel E. Talbert, now war correspondent, and was on Gen. Jimmie Doolittle's staff in World War II. The above-mentioned follows:

RHEE STEPS UP RECRUITING FOR SEOUL'S DEFENSE—WOMEN, CHILDREN, AGED TO BE EVACUATED; RECRUITS SEEN EAGER FOR ACTION

(By Ansel E. Talbert)

SEOUL, December 19.—The Korean republican government was completing plans tonight for the evacuation of women, children, and aged persons from this capital city. At the same time it called up thousands of military recruits for a fight against the Communist forces.

Partial evacuation will represent a stripping for action, and not necessarily a decision to abandon Seoul to the enemy. A dawn-to-dusk survey by this correspondent in an open jeep over many miles of icy roads around the city disclosed beyond any question the existence of a tremendous mobilization effort by the Government of President Syngman Rhee.

South Korean military recruits with small bundles of personal effects slung over their shoulders were lined up along the roads at many points in formations approaching the density of spectators at a Fifth Avenue parade in New York. Tonight, large groups could be seen warming themselves around campfires scattered across the snow-covered countryside.

SHARP CONTRAST IN ATTITUDE

There was little in the demeanor of the recruits to indicate that they considered themselves followers of a lost cause. A sharp contrast was evident between their behavior and the resigned attitude of the refugees plodding southward from the Seoul and Pyongyang areas or who gathered in groups awaiting transport by truck or rail. (Pyongyang, former North Korean Communist capital, now is held by the Chinese Communists.)

Most of the recruits I saw today gave every sign of being in good spirits.

Further evidence that the United Nations army in Korea is at present anything but a beaten force was obtained during a tour of the areas along roads to the battle front occupied by contingents from the various democratic nations participating in the Korean war. These areas include those occupied by the Dutch, French, Greek, Turkish, Thailand, and Filipino forces.

Several of these national contingents have not yet been committed to action, and this was the chief complaint made by members with whom I conferred. Almost to a man they had volunteered for their present duty, and their reason for being in Korea in general agreed with sentiments expressed by Capt. Cornelius van Marion, of the Dutch unit, who has a wife and four children in Holland.

He said: "Why are we here? Probably because we remember what happened a decade ago when we stayed in our homes and waited to see what Hitler would do. Today the situation is the same, except that Stalin has replaced Hitler. Now we know that it is better to die trying to keep aggression away from our fireside than it is to wait and be shot dead on our doorsteps."

A FRENCHMAN EXPLAINS

Col. Ralph Monclair, Inspector General of the French Foreign Legion, who voluntarily accepted demotion from the rank of general in order to come to Korea as commander of the French detachment, said tonight at dinner in his unheated field headquarters that his action was motivated by a single wish.

He explained: "I have a young son, and some day I want him to be able to say that his father was a member of the first United Nations army.

"This is an army that is trying to carry out the wishes of the democratic nations of the world after they banded together for the first time in history to stop an act of aggression. Even if the effort should not succeed, the attempt is something to be remembered with pride because it is a step toward an ideal that one day will certainly be realized."

The most eager for action of all the contingents is the Greek brigade, made up entirely of volunteers from among military units which cleared the mountainous northern areas of Greece of Communist guerrillas.

Already Awake

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. HARRY McGREGOR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 22, 1950

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, under permission to revise and extend my remarks, I include the following editorial from the Mount Vernon (Ohio) News:

ALREADY AWAKE

While some measures to deal with the critical situation, including declaration of a national emergency, were under consideration it was stated at Washington they were designed partially to awaken the public to a realization of national danger.

We don't know where those who made such statements got the idea that the American public isn't awake. It is and has been for a long time; far wider awake than responsible officials whose duty it is to plan national defense measures and then put those plans into execution.

There has been some sleeping at the switch, but that sleeping has been done at Washington.

The National Capital is described as being in a state of confusion, with officials running around in circles trying to get done in a few weeks things that should have been started long ago, and well on the way to accomplishment by this time.

As a matter of fact our Federal Government hasn't even a well-organized plan for marshaling the Nation's strength to meet what could be the greatest test in the history of this Republic.

We haven't a goal to work toward; the Nation's brains and muscle have not been harnessed for a concerted effort; the public has not been furnished with the leadership that could inspire complete unity of purpose.

Through the years when we should have been prepared to defend ourselves, the national administration was depending upon lavish expenditure of money and creation of domestic bureaus and international organizations to halt our deadly enemy, communism.

And during those years our diplomats were depending upon kid-glove tactics to checkmate the strategy of an enemy who is not bothered by ethics, the sanctity of international agreements or the rights of humanity.

Domestic and international policies were wholly inadequate to cope with this ruthless enemy and the task of building up defenses that would give reasonable assurance of our security.

Not only were these responsibilities neglected; the American people were deceived as to the steps which were being taken to protect them and the country from the Communist aggression.

We were told that the national-defense system was in better shape than ever before.

That myth exploded with a loud bang when the Korean war broke out.

We also have been told of the remarkable progress of other undertakings designed to marshal the forces of the anti-Communist world. These claims had not much more foundation than those regarding our armed strength.

Washington has been shocked by startling developments out of some of its lethargy. But still things that should be done to remedy the situation are not being done.

We still have not been provided with the quality of leadership which we most desperately need. Just why has not been satisfactorily explained.

The claim that the people needed to be awakened to the national danger sounds like an attempt of responsible officials to so cover up their own shortcomings.

A Realistic Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. L. MENDEL RIVERS
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 22, 1950

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, the foreign policy of this Nation has been the subject of discussion by men in all walks of life. Never before in the history of our country has this policy so deeply affected more of our people. At this very moment when the world is threatened by another total war it is fitting that our policy toward the remainder of the family of nations be examined and reexamined. Quite frequently men of theology are unable to discuss affairs of state in a realistic manner. Quite frequently men of this segment of our society are too idealistic. It is more than refreshing, therefore, when a theologian can command the thought, attention, and approbation of those vitally affected by our conduct and policies in the field of diplomacy.

On December 14, 1950, Rev. Ralph Meadowcroft, rector of the Grace Episcopal Church, in Charleston, S. C., delivered a masterpiece on the subject of our foreign policy. It was on the occasion of a meeting before the Rotary Clubs of Charleston and of St. Andrews Society. This eloquent address should be made available to more than those immediately privileged to hear it. With this in mind, Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to insert in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for all Americans to read, Reverend Meadowcroft's important contribution on the appraisal of a realistic policy among nations. His remarks will not only inspire but will be a worthy reference to those who work in this vital field during our page in history. It follows:

A REALISTIC FOREIGN POLICY

(By Rev. Ralph Meadowcroft)

Those men and women who crossed the Atlantic Ocean 300 years ago to establish a new home in a new world would be startled to see the phenomenal growth of that which they planted. Their tiny settlements, established so precariously along the eastern strip of this vast acreage, have spread west, and south, and north; population counted in dozens is now numbered in millions; southfield and northfield have grown into the huge granaries of Kansas and Nebraska; cattle on the village common have become the herds of Texas and Wyoming. Out of the hills men have dug coal, iron and copper; from their surface they have cut billions of board feet of lumber, while from deep in the earth they have tapped the oil stored there before the dawn of history. A colossus has grown in this wilderness.

Through these three centuries America has been largely bounded behind her own shores. A few citizens recrossed the ocean to tour or be educated in old Europe, but the overwhelming majority were glad to be done with that cesspool of conflict. Still fewer of our people sailed to the Orient for purposes of trade, for the average American looked upon the Far East as another world, mysterious and unreal as a fantastic novel. For 300 years, except for a few naval vessels which attacked the Barbary pirates, and the battle for the Philippines, Americans in combat were seen only within or upon the borders of our own hemisphere. Then in 1917 Yank and Rebel went to France, and in the silence which followed November 11, 1918, the fulcrum of world power had shifted 3,000 miles westward from London to Washington.

Incredibly, America possessed a man who was ready for this realinement of world balances; indeed, perhaps the only statesman of the time who foresaw both the opportunity and the way to inaugurate a new world dominated by peace rather than war, but America was not ready for Woodrow Wilson, and turning its back upon his funeral, gaily embarked upon the most gigantic spree in history. Even the awful morning-after of the 1930's found us unrepentent and irresponsible, so we drank the sobering medicine of European appeasement, then donned our battle dress to fight World War II.

But a major change has occurred in the world as a consequence of this last conflict. The United States did not emerge as the undisputed big brother of mankind. Now another vast union, also born in revolution, inspired by an ideal of human society, raised in adversity with toil and sweat, unified in its own blood, and unlike our Nation disciplined by the omnipotent rule of tyrrany, has grown to challenge the American way of life. Since 1945 terror has gripped the chancellories of Germany, France, Britain, Japan, and India. They knew, as Russia knew, that two giants walked the earth and that collision was inevitable. Only these United States, with a strange innocence almost criminal in significance, seemed unaware of the coming encounter. Until last summer a shot was heard around the world, and men became aware that a day had dawned in which the fate of mankind was to be determined perhaps for centuries to come.

Let there be no mistake concerning the decisiveness of this hour. It is not merely a matter who shall be first nation of mankind, the Soviet Republics or the United States. Would to God that was the only issue to be determined. Tragically, that is merely the surface of the matter. Behind and beneath this is the ponderous question whether mankind shall continue to pursue those goals to which it has been reaching forward since written history began, or whether men shall seek a barbaric way of life; industrialized barbarism, efficient and technologized, but barbarism nevertheless. The world has reached the crossroads; it must choose one or the other of those roads.

And let me hasten to say there is no guaranty the right road will be chosen. When the Goths battered through the gates of Rome and destroyed the capitol of the world in flame, 700 years of civilization was eclipsed. The light of Egypt, of Greece, and Rome was extinguished in the fires of barbarism. For more than four centuries Europe lived amid the ashes of her ruin. She might never have been reborn had it not been for the spiritual heroism of the Christian Church and the flickering influence of the Bishop of Rome. In our time we have witnessed another such era of destruction. Many of us can recall those better days prior to 1914 when the British flag symbolized a universal regulation of mankind and when the name Britain was both revered and feared through the seven seas. But in the closing days of 1918 a giant had become impotent and rude men were on the road challenging the rule of law. When Rome collapsed there was no other power to take her place. When Britain became exhausted the United States was ready to occupy the rampart. She has not done so and already much ground has been lost. Now we must prove whether we are worthy to hold our place, or be one of those nations which must pass because it knew not God.

For a Godly nation is not one which is content to sing hymns, say prayers, and go to church; it is one which faces its responsibility. God knows we are not a perfect people. Our national evils, our crime, our exploitation of citizen by citizen cry to heaven. Our concern with material possessions, our test of achievements by earthly standards blot the record of our history. The cry of penitence should resound throughout the length and breadth of the land. Yet, despite our unworthiness, it has pleased that inscrutable Ruler of Destiny to place us in this hour as the people who must lead mankind through the valley of dark shadows into a future where freedom and justice and honesty and man's concern for man can still regulate the peoples and rulers of the earth.

To do this, three things are required. First, we must be prepared for war. We are already at war, under the decisive vote of the United Nations. For 6 months our soldiers have been fighting and dying in that pitiful peninsula which is the Spain of world war III. Now they are reeling back in hopeless defeat, not because of their own failure, but, partly at least, because we wanted to continue life and business as usual at home. Except for a 20-percent increase in income tax thus far we have not matched their sacrifice with a single sacrifice on our part. Through the devious channels of diplomacy, we are at this moment negotiating with the aggressors, and Washington may appease them unless you and I and our fellow citizens deny the opportunity to do so. I do not know, nor do you, whether world war III has begun or is about to begin. I do not know, nor do you, whether we can overawe the Soviet Union. I do know that world war III is almost certain and that while we should pursue every honorable channel of negotiation, we should be prepared for the coming of that war. If the war comes now, we bear a portion of the responsibility because we already have too little and it is too late. We are directly responsible in that we have given to imperial communism the very opportunity it seeks. The Chinese attack in Korea would almost certainly never have occurred if we had shown a more resolute spirit and more determined preparation in the last 6 months.

This condition is created by a refusal, or strange inability on the part of so many, to face the actuality of another global conflict. It is one thing to talk about it, to play thrillingly with its terrifying possibility; it is a totally different thing to soberly face the reality that world war III is dawning. When you insure your home against fire, you do not actually believe it is going to be destroyed. You are simply playing safe: insuring against the possibility. Your attitude is a very different one when you telephone the fire department because the house is already in flame. Our attitude has been that of an insurance policyholder; it must become the spirit of the man who sees his house being destroyed. What more signs are needed to stir America from complacency? We have been engaged in cold war ever since hostilities ceased in 1945; now we are fighting a hot war. Must we wait till bombs blast our cities to finally become aroused to the situation? War has begun. It is barely possible its extent can be restricted for a time, perhaps for a considerable time, but war has begun. God save America from blindness. We are already engaged in the early phases of world war III.

The second conclusion which must be accepted is that America leads the struggle against imperialistic communism. There is a price which must be paid for leadership: It is the obligation to lead. When Mr. Attlee flew to Washington 2 weeks ago, Americans feared Great Britain was unwilling to continue marching side by side with this Nation; in which unwillingness France was apparently joined. The awful word appeasement was noised abroad, and many openly spoke of another Munich. What was even more appalling, however, was the sudden retreat into isolationism which for a moment caught hold of many people. It was suggested that as Europe would receive the brunt of the Russian attack, this was Europe's war. And that if they were willing to appease the Russians, we should leave them to their just reward. Fortunately, in the past 2 weeks it is apparent that Great Britain and some of the continental powers are not so spineless as had been feared. But we need to be on guard against our own weakness. This conflict will be the concern of France, Western Germany, Great Britain, and other European powers, but it will continue to be first and foremost our concern. It is our high calling to lead the civilized forces of mankind; it is, therefore, our solemn responsibility to lead them, whether in concert or alone. We are leader, not follower. True, we work in concert with other peoples within the United Nations, nevertheless, it is surely obvious that United Nations as a force for world justice depends upon the leadership of the United States. If your child was drowning, and your friend refused to assist you in rescue, would you stand upon the shore and watch him drown? Even so, we desire the cooperation and association of all nations opposed to imperialist communism, but whether they give us full cooperation or not, we still have a responsibility to the world and to ourselves.

Nor is this only an idealistic obligation. It is basic to our own self-preservation. If the Soviet Union gained control of the Ruhr industrial area in West Germany, and added its productive capacity to that of its own industrial facilities and those of its satellites, in 3 to 5 years it could out-produce us. Under those conditions, a war in 5 years time would probably result in Russian victory and American defeat. Helping Europe is not a Santa Claus policy on our part; it is the inescapable responsibility of our supreme position and an unavoidable necessity for our own self-preservation.

It seems probable the President will declare a state of national emergency, perhaps tomorrow night. That declaration is long overdue. Ceilings on prices and wages will probably be enacted within the near future. They are at least 3 months late. The armed forces are moving to double their strength; they should have done so in the late summer. Taxes have increased; they will increase again. It is right that they should do so. At long last, Washington promises rapid speed-up in armament production; the delay is almost criminal in its neglect.

The third element in a realistic foreign policy is the drawing up of a constructive war program. It is entirely possible, and a condition to be devoutly hoped for, that such a program is already prepared. For security reasons this plan cannot be divulged to the citizens. Yet there are certain factors in the situation which naturally must enter into such a program. Though you and I are not even amateurs in military strategy we can clearly discern those elements. At the moment, we are fighting the first phase of the war in Korea and there we have been completely defeated. It is not a matter of who is responsible; the defeat is a fact which the punishment of a scapegoat cannot expunge. If General MacArthur has failed he should be removed; if he is not responsible, he should be sustained. But what should be clearly realized is that in the global situation Korea is of minor importance. If a line can be held at the thirty-eighth parallel or below, it should be done; if not, our troops should be withdrawn. This will be a serious setback, but, and I would emphasize this, it is not irreparable if we do not appease the Chinese Communists. Under no circumstances must these aggressors be then admitted to membership in the United Nations We should arm Japan as quickly as possible and set her industries to full-scale military operation. The American Navy should be strengthened in the Straits of Formosa and Formosa defended. Nationalist Chinese and Philippine troops should be dispatched immediately to Indochina and Japanese troops added to that area as rapidly as they are ready. This will not be appeasement; on the contrary, it will be a containment of the Chinese Communists within China itself, and possibly Tibet. China will thus become a gigantic fortress, closed off, walled in and neutralized from the rest of the world. It may break apart in civil war, but in any case, will be unable to markedly affect the ensuing contest. They have no navy, so the sea becomes our ally. If we can hold them in Indochina or Burma, their vaunted army of two and a half million men will be reduced to fighting among themselves or against their Russian ally, an event which might in time come to pass.

In Europe the situation is far more complicated. Today and probably for another year, the continent is indefensible. The Russian armies can march to the Atlantic without serious opposition. Such a campaign may be concluded within a few weeks. Therefore, the arming of West Germany, Holland, Belgium, and France should be undertaken with great caution, until we are prepared to equip them completely and with great rapidity. Until that time comes, any army or equipment in continental Europe is for delaying action only and is expendable. I think we must face the grim fact that the Continent, with two possible exceptions, will be closed to us, as it was by Hitler in 1940.

How then shall we strike back? First from Britain by air. The Ruhr, Saar, and Lorraine industries must be totally destroyed even before the Soviet armies reach the Rhine. I desire to say this with deepest solemnity; those American planes now standing ready on British runways, containing their dreadful weapons, must fly. A million or more western Europeans will die within the first week. This is the nightmare of Europe, my friends, and who dares blame them for their terror. Yet it is obvious to them, as it is obvious to us, that those industrial facilities in the heart of western Europe dare not be allowed to function under Soviet dominance. We shall be the most hated people on earth for a time but the price of holding back may well be defeat. This is why President Truman is entirely right in refusing to grant the decision to use the atom bomb to the United Nations. No nation save our own will be able to make that decision. It is a terrifying responsibility but it is one we dare not shirk. We shall have to do it in any case: the sooner the better.

The further strategy of the war will be concentrated in three main areas. Britain and Spain must serve as vast air bases. Both of these countries will be comparatively safe from Soviet troops: Britain because the Russians possess no known means for large scale amphibious operations across the channel and Spain because we can seal the passes through the Pyrenees. Our main ammunition and military preparation area will be North Africa and when in the fullness of time, the free nations are prepared to attack, I suggest it will be in two great prongs. One line will proceed across the Mediterranean through Greece and Yugoslavia, assuming we have been able to hold those countries, into the Balkans, Czechoslovakia, and Russia; the other through Anatolia, i. e. Asiatic Turkey, into the Ukraine. The first prong can neutralize or destroy the huge Skoda armament works in Czechoslovakia and the oil fields of the Balkans, while the second line of advance will attack one of the three main industrial areas within the Soviet Union. It will also cut off the oil supply from the Baku fields in the neighborhood of the Caspian Sea and any supplies the Russians may be securing from the oil districts of Iran and Saudi-Arabia. Both lines of attack will menace Russian occupation of Western Europe and force a partial or total abandonment by the Soviet armies of all territory now west of the iron curtain. Thus Russia will be in exactly the same dilemma we now face in Korea but on a vastly more prodigious scale. By thus crippling the Soviet's ability to replace its military weapons, its vast reserve of manpower will cease to be so menacing. A soldier without a gun is useless in modern war, while a gun without ammunition is useful only as a crutch. The main war effort, as I see it, will not be fought in Western Europe, but as gigantic thrusts into the heart of the Soviet Union.

During this time our own land will also be visited with death and destruction. Our great cities, especially those where war equipment is being manufactured, will know the fury and terror of atomic explosion. We are vulnerable to air attack, especially the industrial triangle marked by Buffalo-Detroit-and-Pittsburgh, which are almost our closest cities to Russia by trans-polar airflight. It is more than probable we shall be seriously crippled in industrial capacity. Yet the final outcome between two so evenly matched adversaries will depend upon the resolution and sacrificial effort of the two peoples. Thus it will depend finally upon you and me and our fellow Americans whether victory shall be ours, and mankind be given an opportunity to rebuild the old waste places and transform the cities of desolation into habitations for free men to dwell in. It is not our problem now what shall happen after war is over. The immediate task is to face the almost certain conflict, to prepare with might and main, and to quit us as free men should. When victory is ours we will tackle the awful tasks of rebuilding a world in which, God willing, barbarism shall not be powerful enough to threaten the citadel of civilization. We enter the future, whatever that future may be, in the sure confidence that we have done all that is humanly possible to maintain peace, that we fight because we are being fought, and can do no other. God help America to prove herself the home of the free and the land of the brave.

Must Reset Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LINDLEY BECKWORTH
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 22, 1950

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to include in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an editorial which appeared recently in the Tyler Courier-Times of December 13, 1950, in connection with the splendid work of our junior Senator from Texas, Senator LYNDON JOHNSON:

MUST RESET FOREIGN POLICY

There have been those who have thought of LYNDON JOHNSON as a politician rather than a deep-thinking statesman. Evidence came in Tuesday that they may be wrong in their appraisement of Texas' junior Senator.

JOHNSON called the defense effort to date "adolescent nonsense." He condemned the United States foreign policy of "wait and see" as "insincere and incompetent."

"We must have immediate and complete mobilization," he said. "We must end the double talk in Washington. The American people are fed up on it. They are anxious to unite—but they cannot rally around a vacuum—they cannot give their united support to policies which do not exist. The United States is right now at war. It is at war not only with Communist China but with all the power and strength of the countries behind the iron curtain. Our Government has thrown up a chicken-wire fence when what we need is a wall of iron and steel.

"The present situation bears no resemblance to World War II or any other war mankind has ever known. The magnificent unity at the outset of the Korean crisis is deteriorating before our eyes. Our 6-month waiting period should end. What are we waiting on? We have been underwriting makeshift mobilization with only a vague hope that the real thing would come along, sooner or later.

"We, all of us, in Congress, in the executive branch, in the military, have had 6 months in which to cause the situation to make sense. We have had 6 months in which to give the people some answers, to find out where we are going—and when we are starting. But we have not done so."

JOHNSON, as chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, has three immediate steps which he proposes. He urges:

1. A long-range global plan of strategy.

2. Immediate full mobilization of available manpower, which he says is long overdue.

3. Prompt mobilization of our economy.

His No. 1 proposal is strictly No. 1 in any national foreign policy. We must first decide on our long-range objective. We have not done this. Less than 2 years ago we had decided that Korea was outside our outer defense chain and moved our Army out of it. Then suddenly President Truman decided we should help the South Koreans, and our men were dispatched there into a battleground prepared by Russia and her satellites. We have so far incurred some 40,000 casualties there. It is practically an impossible position. Of course, it will hurt the standing of the United States to take our men out. But the killing of a few more thousand of them in that spot will serve no good purpose. And when we get down to the realities of the situation, we are, right now, in the process of getting out. We should, of course, save every man possible and every bit of material, destroying what cannot be moved out to keep it out of Communist hands. When we have done that, we should then take an inventory of what we have and how much of the world we can help and still defend our own country. We may have to modify Mr. Truman's glorious purpose of helping oppressed peoples anywhere on the globe.

We should also reexamine the United Nations, whose membership, as of now, contains both the most noble nations and the most cruel conquest-mad nations. Of course, we should never agree for Red China to become a member. But the reason that she would be a bad member is that she is a stooge of Red Russia. So, if it is bad to have Red China in our club, it is much worse to have Red Russia in the peace organization. We should see that Red China does not get in—and should see that Red Russia is thrown out and that the representatives of both leave this country at once and stay out. Russia expects that kind of treatment. That is the reason she is having conferences of satellite nations in Europe. She plans a "united nations" of her own when she is thrown out of the UN and barred from the United States. We must end the disgracefulness of having representatives of other countries come to our country as guests and use this hospitality as a forum from which to abuse our Nation.

The United States also is prepared for the day when the UN is dissolved. The Atlantic Pact is a going concern and can be enlarged to contain nations which are peacefully inclined. The others we do not need on our team, using our hospitality to sabotage our peace efforts.

The President of the United States and a lot of other Members of the Senate and House could do a good turn for their country and for themselves if they surveyed our foreign affairs in just as candid a manner as has Senator JOHNSON and, without attempt to save anybody's face, figured the best thing to do for the United States of America and then did something about it. There will be claims that this is isolationism. But it is not. We are merely saying: Help other peace-loving nations who are helping themselves within the limits of our ability and resources, but keep the interest of the United States first. It has reached the point where we must do this to survive.

Capitalism—Nothing Is Superior Except by Comparison

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE N. ASPINALL
OF COLORADO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 22, 1950

Mr. ASPINALL. Mr. Speaker, we as a Nation and as individuals of that Nation, are now engaged in a no-holds-barred struggle between freedom and slavery; freedom best represented by America, its peoples and its institutions, and slavery forced by the imperialistically minded tyrants of Russia. Currently there is all too much nonconstructive criticism about the shortcomings of capitalism both within and without our boundaries. Far too many of our uninformed citizens are shouting that America is on the road to financial bankruptcy and ruin, a status undesired by all good Americans. For the past 2 years I have been seeking concrete information to confound these critics whether they be well-intentioned or otherwise.

I recommend the study of the following article by Mr. Thomas J. Watson. It is an enlightening portrait of the greatness and strength of free America. To those who would forsake or destroy the economic ideology which has brought us thus far, I voice the challenge for them to bring forth something that has greater possibilities of strength and good. I voice the challenge for them to dare to place the candle of Russia beside this glistening beacon of the evidences of freedom founded upon the dignity of individual man and his right to pursue his own economic ambition. What comparison can be made between the blessings of embodied collective individuals and collectivized masses; between inveterate freedom obtained for us by the unselfish services of past patriots and the invertebrate slavery of the conscienceless robots in Russia? The article explains beyond successful contradiction some of the values of our way of life against which the carping clamor of these prophets of doom cannot prevail. Let them silence their voices forever.

[From the Washington Post of December 20, 1950]

CAPITALISM—NOTHING IS SUPERIOR EXCEPT BY COMPARISON

When we compare the conditions of nations and people in anticapitalistic countries with the security, prosperity, happiness, and well-being of our people under United States capitalism, we appreciate our privilege of living in a capitalistic, democratic country.

The basic principle of the free, capitalistic system which we have developed in our country affords opportunity to the individual who is willing to use his talents to the extent of his ability and desire to produce—to accumulate something for investment in a home, a farm, in savings accounts, bonds and other securities, life insurance, the education of his children, and comforts of life—and become a capitalist.

The following facts give us a deep appreciation of what capitalism has done and is doing for our country and its people.

Private capital in the form of taxes and purchases of United States Government bonds made it possible for us to spend $330,000,000,000 in carrying out our part of the program in winning World War II. This, of course, is unimportant when we consider the loss of life and permanent and partial disability which our youth sustained and which cannot be measured in dollars.

Our participation in World War II has left us today with a national debt of $257,000,000,000, but on the credit side we find that our annual national income, at the current rate, is equal to 90 percent of our total national debt. Of this total national debt, $39,000,000,000 are in Treasury obligations owned by Government agencies, so our next debt is slightly over $218,000,000,000.

The United States free enterprise business system is operating at its highest level, furnishing employment to 62,000,000 people at the highest hourly and weekly earnings ever recorded. Stockholders and corporations, after paying the highest peacetime taxes in the postwar years, have had the highest net average earnings in history from their investment.

Our farmers had cash income from marketing last year amounting to $27,500,000,000, the highest on record.

Total farm assets of our country amount to slightly more than $127,000,000,000, against which there is an indebtedness of only $12,- 400,000,000. Thus our farmers have ownership equity of over 90 percent in their farms.

In nonfarm homes, counting apartment buildings with four or less families, and all valued at a total of $200,000,000,000, our home owners have an equity of $158,000,000,000—a substantial ownership of 79 percent.

Therefore, as a result of the opportunity provided by our free-enterprise capitalistic system, the people of our Nation have a free and clear ownership in their homes and farms of 83.4 percent.

Our people have savings of more than $136,000,000,000 in Government bonds and savings accounts.

An additional $97,000,000,000 are on deposit in commercial bank accounts.

Our men and women have a cash investment of $60,000,000,000 in life-insurance policies.

A high percentage of our working people are provided with unemployment insurance, sickness, accident, and retirement benefits, financed by employers, employees, and Government. Others who are not covered by these plans and who find themselves in need are provided for by governmental and social institutions.

We are increasing our efforts to improve the standard of living of the people in the lower income brackets.

The United States, with only 6 percent of the world population and 7 percent of its land area, under its democratic, capitalistic system, before World War II, produced 47 percent of the world's manufactured goods, but what is more important, 90 percent of that production was consumed within our own borders. Today we are producing over 50 percent of the world's manufactured goods, of which a substantial percentage is for other countries.

Capitalism is backing freedom of worship and providing increasing educational opportunities by constantly giving more and more support to the two things upon which our democratic, cultural civilization depends—spiritual and educational values.

We have a permanent investment in churches and schools of $18,500,000,000 and are spending annually $8,000,000,000 for religious and educational purposes.

Membership in the churches is increasing at a much faster rate than the increase in the population, and in our Sunday schools at an even greater rate.

In the past 30 years elementary-school enrollment has increased 13.5 percent, high-school enrollment 146.1 percent, and college and university enrollment 351.6 percent.

Our public-school expenditures per pupil enrolled have gone up from $48.02 in 1920 to $132.06 in 1947, or 175 percent.

Since 1920 the population of our country has increased 43 percent, and the investment in school and college equipment has increased 571 percent.

Since the beginning of our industrial and scientific development in the early 1800's, the capitalistic system, due to individual freedom, initiative, and ingenuity, has given the world more of the comforts and conveniences of life than mankind had received in the previous 5,000 years of civilization.

Under this system our people as a whole are happy and united, are increasing their capital and enjoying a fuller spiritual, cultural, and material life.

Today our scientific and industrial knowledge and experience in the various fields of peaceful activity are open to the rest of the world, and in this respect we have joined with other like-minded nations in contributing to the technical-assistance program of the United Nations.

No nation, no individual, no venture, no private or public institution, no program for the welfare of people can progress without capital.

It is each individual's duty to contribute to the preservation, protection, and improvement of our democratic civilization on a basis which is sound and fair to all our people.

THOS. J. WATSON,
Chairman of the Board, International Business Machines Corp.

Wages and Prices in the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. S. J. CARNAHAN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 22, 1950

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include herewith the English-language version of an article appearing in the January issue of Amerika.

Over the next few months many thousands of Russian people will have the opportunity to study a striking picture of the United States economy at work through the pages of Amerika, the Russian-language publication of the International Press and Publications Division of the Department of State.

An article entitled "Wages and Prices in the United States" graphically portrays the immense gains in the standards of living in this country in the past decade. It shows the Russian people—through graphs and charts—just what commodities an American worker's weekly wage will purchase.

In these days it is of the greatest importance that the Russian people understand the people of the United States, thoroughly and without distortion.

It is my understanding that despite some recent restrictions on circulation this magazine still sells 21,000 copies in the Soviet Union every month and that the copies are passed from hand to hand over long periods of time.

This article, Wages and Prices in the United States, follows:

WAGES AND PRICES IN THE UNITED STATES—MASS PURCHASING POWER IS NOW GREATER THAN BEFORE WORLD WAR II

(By Robert L. Heilbroner)

The John Winters family of California would probably not like to think of themselves as ordinary or average, but in one respect at least they are as average as a statistic. Their economic history during the last 11 years—since the outbreak of war—has been exactly typical of the average American family.

In both 1939 and 1950 John Winters' weekly pay was almost equivalent to the national average for all wage earners. When war broke out in Europe, he was working in a small factory in the Middle Western city of Kansas City, earning about $24 ($1 equals four rubles at the official rate of exchange) a week, enough to support his wife, Julia, and small son, John Jr., comfortably and provide them with a few luxuries, but without much margin for savings. With the rapid growth of wartime industries, however, prices rose, and in 1941 John Winters decided to move out to the Pacific coast, where wages were higher, and shipyards and airplane factories were springing up like mushrooms.

John's was only one of several hundred thousand families that moved to California during the war years, some to work in factories, some to spend their older years in the sunny climate. Cities were very crowded at first, and for nearly a year the Winters shared a house with some relatives of Julia's. But getting a job was easy. Two weeks after they arrived John found work in a big machine shop at a higher wage than he had ever earned.

"It wasn't long," he says, "before I was making $40 or $45 a week. And it was around then that the Government put price ceilings on all kinds of goods. Guess they had to, with everybody earning good money. I started buying savings bonds and putting money away. Came the end of the war, and even though I wasn't making much more than in 1942, I had put away nearly $2,000."

After their early rise, both wages and prices were stabilized during the war by temporary laws. With peace, all wage controls and most price controls were lifted, and in the middle of 1946 a second race between earnings and living costs began. Manufacturers of consumer goods were making up for war-caused shortages, and, under union leadership, workers were insisting that higher production be matched by even higher wages. By 1949 production of most goods had caught up with demand, and some prices began to decline slightly. Only rentals still had to be kept under legal control. Today, with this second round of increases apparently nearly over, John Winters finds that his standard of living is considerably better than it was in 1939.

"I get $56 a week now," he explains, "and that's nearly two and a half times what I got 11 years ago. Of course living costs are up—costs the three of us about three-quarters more to live than it used to. We pay twice as much rent as we did before the war—$60 a month—but we have a nicer place now: Three large rooms and a good kitchen. We save on clothes. Julia doesn't buy such expensive dresses as she did, and she makes some of Johnny's things herself. I get a new suit about once every 2 years; they cost me about $30 these days. And a good pair of shoes will run me anywhere from 5 to 10 dollars. Of course, some things are still pretty cheap, a bar of soap only costs about a dime.

"It's food that has gone up most. We can't get a restaurant meal that's any good for under a dollar any more, so we eat at home most of the time. I guess we spend about $20 a week for food. And then with gasoline, and a movie now and then and vacations, I don't save as much as I'd like to. But I bought a good car 3 years ago, for seventeen hundred in cash, out of our savings, and when we finish paying for the refrigerator we're buying, we may get a television set. Maybe some time next year."

John Winters' story of prosperity is the story of how America has grown in the decade since the outbreak of the war. There are 60,000,000 people in the United States working force, some luckier than the Winters and some not as fortunate. But the change that came to John and Julia Winters happened to nearly everyone.

Together, in 1950, Americans reaped a total income of approximately $210,000,000,000 (840,000,000,000 rubles) as much as they earned during the whole 4 years 1932 through 1935. To put it differently, since billions are intangible at best, the average American family is now enjoying a standard of living—after making full allowance for higher prices and increased taxes—that is a good 40 percent better than prewar. It will be the highest standard of living the Nation has ever known.

It is a standard of living that is fundamentally different from even the best of previous eras of prosperity. For by every economic indicator, this postwar model prosperity is wider spread and more firmly rooted than ever before in history. What distinguishes today's economic situation is not simply the height of prosperity, although this is unprecedented, it is the strength and stability that have been added to the economic system.

Certainly the economist looking back over the past is struck by the fluctuation of good times and bad which have characterized American history. But viewing what is called the trend line of growth the economist finds that America has approximately doubled its national income—that is, the sum of all individual incomes—every 20 years. One hundred years ago, for example, 7,000,000 workers, working more than 70 hours each week, produced a national income of about $5,000,000,000 (20,000,000,000 rubles). Today the output per man-hours has gone up by over 500 percent. In a century, working hours have been cut to 40 a week, and national income—in terms of the actual goods and services—has gone up about twenty-five-fold.

Not lack of growth, but the fact that growth was uneven, has troubled the Nation in the past. If one or two key industries ran into difficulties there were no buffers, no obstacles to keep a minor economic reversal from snowballing into a major setback. Progress was not a steady upward line, but by jumps—up two steps and back one. Sometimes it seemed as though business and industry had progressed two steps and fallen back three. All this was wasteful of economic potential and enormously destructive of individual and social morale.

The striking feature of the present prosperity is the fact that it is more widely and more evenly shared than at any prior time. National wealth, of course, means nothing except in terms of the sum of individual wealth. Growth does not envelop a country from outside; it comes from within. To say that America has grown and is richer means that its citizens have gained in purchasing power.

To understand what the growth of national income means to all the citizens of the United States, the Nation's economy might be pictured, for the sake of simplicity, like a cross-section diagram. On such a chart, the majority of men and women would not be shown crowded at the bottom of an economic pyramid but clustered in the middle. In fact there no longer is, in the United States, a pyramid, with a large, low-paid economic base, and a tiny peak in the clouds. For example, one of the four large income groups in the United States lies between $2,000 and $3,000 a year. This is the group to which John and Julia Winters belong and where the ordinary workingman with a wage of $56—the national average—will be found. Of course, if his wife works, he is in a higher level, but if, like John, he gets along on his own earnings, this will be his category. There are in this group about 8,000,000 families, more than a fifth of the Nation's total.

The level into which John will move, if he gets a promotion at his job, lies between $3,000 and $5,000. It consists of skilled workingmen, families where two people earn incomes, small shopkeepers, clerks, and many Government employees. This is the largest of the four large income groups and consists of about 13,000,000 families.

Above $5,000 a year—and this is a more than comfortable income—there are 8,000,000 more families, more than the combined populations of Canada and Australia. At the very top of this group are 1,000,000 families whose incomes are over $10,000; this section of the Nation includes Congressmen and doctors, managers of large-scale enterprises, and many trade-union leaders. Very small indeed is the category of astronomical incomes enjoyed by a few Hollywood stars and a handful of extremely wealthy businessmen. Here, of course, the steeply graduated income tax takes its full effect; at the topmost income bracket, income taxes today take 80 percent of all earnings.

At the other end of the scale there are some 10,000,000 families, who earn a cash income of less than $2,000 a year; more than half of these receive over $1,000 a year. Some are farm families whose small cash earnings are compensated for by the food they grow and the houses they own. Others are domestic workers and factory workers in some sections of a few industries like textiles, grain milling and tobacco, which are among the lowest paid occupations in the United States today. Others are the aged or physically handicapped to whose support their local communities contribute. Still others are partially or fully unemployed.

In total it is a very different picture than it was a decade ago. In 1939, three Americans out of four were in the bottom of the four levels described (under $2,000), and now only one in four is in the lowest stratum. Then, only 10 percent of all the population was in the groups over $3,000; today 35 percent are found above this line.

Of course, a dollar before the war was worth a good deal more than it is today. But an enormous upward shift of "real income," or purchasing power, has taken place, even allowing for the rise in prices since 1939. Although in 1950 the average American is paying more for daily goods and services than he paid in 1939 (plus a much higher income tax), he is also receiving (after taxes) more than double the earnings of 1939. All in all, he can buy more with his income than he could in 1939.

A significant factor in the present economic picture in the United States has been a changed pattern of Government expenditure, which has aided in stabilizing earnings. In 1950 total spending of the Federal, State, and local governments came to about $60,000,000,000 (240,000,000,000 rubles). Such public expenditures covered activities as varied as building roads and running the weather service, delivering mail and administering soil-conservation programs, equipping schools and hospitals, and helping to pay for new homes and better education for war veterans.

In more direct ways Government expenditure has helped forestall what might have been the beginnings of a decline in effective purchasing power. By supporting the prices of crops, the Government prevented the disastrous fall in income which undermined the American farmer after World War I. Similarly, as a result of the broad social security program enacted into law in the 1930's, persons who lost their jobs during the changeover from wartime to peaceful industry or due to the slow-down of a particular industry—like other unemployed persons—received a regular weekly income, for about 20 weeks, in the form of unemployment insurance.

Perhaps equally important for the sake of future stability is the kind of growth which occurred in the United States in recent years. There have been dynamic processes working to channel this growth into the middle economic layers, rather than the top. Largely as a result of effective trade-union organization, bottom income groups have been boosted by a general rise in wages—average pay (after taxes) has nearly tripled in two decades. And upper-level incomes have been squeezed down by income taxes.

The economic spectrum has been narrowed—there are fewer rich, fewer poor, and more people in the middle. The 40-percent rise in average living standards which took place between 1939 and 1950 reflects a 51-percent upward movement of the lowest income groups and a much smaller 18-percent improvement for the topmost fifth.

This economic movement toward the middle has worked to the benefit of the Nation as a whole. For it has broadened the mass market on which American prosperity has always been built. This has brought about something close to a mass luxury market. Between 1939 and 1950 this is what happened to consumption of expensive goods: The number of radios in use jumped from 39,000,000 to 62,000,000; the number of electric washing machines from 15,000,000 to 26,000,000; and the number of refrigerators from 14,000,000 to 30,000,000. Television sets are already a mass product—the industry expects to sell 6,000,000 sets this year and is looking ahead to an eager market for several more years to come.

Today there are about 49,000,000 cars operating in the United States—the ratio is one to every four Americans, as compared to one to five before the war. Food consumption is also up—10 percent higher per capita, and better quality food as well. And personal savings—always an index of well-being—are at the highest peacetime level in history, though lower than they were during the war, when a scarcity of many commodities caused a certain amount of involuntary thrift.

And so it is not merely the fact that steadily growing productivity has brought the American people in the aggregate a record personal income of $210,000,000,000 (840,000,000,000 rubles) that builds confidence in the future. It is the far more important fact that purchasing power is better distributed than ever before.

CHART I.—Real wages (income in relation to cost of living)

[Index numbers: 1939=100]

Per capita income:	Consumer prices
1939: 100	100
1940: 107	101
1941: 129	106
1942: 162	117
1943: 181	124
1944: 189	126
1945: 202	129
1946: 210	140
1947: 220	160
1948: 240	172
1949: 234	170
1950: 242	169

Consumer prices have gone up since 1939, but per capita personal income after personal taxes (which was $536 in 1939 and $1,298 in 1950) has gone up even more, proportionately, making a gain in real income between 1939 and 1950. Nineteen hundred and fifty figures, which are estimates based on the first 6 months of the year, reflect the stabilized prosperity which has been typical of the postwar period.
